PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES OF THE 95th CONGRESS, SECOND SESSION

SENATE—Wednesday, May 24, 1978

(Legislative day of Wednesday, May 17, 1978)

The Senate met at 9 a.m., on the expiration of the recess, and was called to order by Hon. ROBERT MORGAN, a Senator from the State of North Carolina.

PRAYER

Let us pray.

Almighty God, for this brief moment we hush all other sounds except the divine knocking of the Master and His voice saying, "If any man will open the door, I will come in." We would open the door of our hearts and bid Thee enter, Thou Spirit of Love and Purity, expelling all that is ugly and unclean. Fill us with life anew that we may love what Thou dost love and do what Thou dost do.

Be with this Republic that it may take its rightful place among the nations, strong and free and great and good. Make us a people compassionate and generous, industrious and frugal, supporters of the weak and the oppressed.

By the power of Thy Spirit reinforce the President, his counselors, and all others in positions of authority that justice and righteousness may prevail at home and peace may abide among the nations.

We pray in the Master's name. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

The assistant legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., May 24, 1978.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable ROBERT MORGAN, a Senator from the State of North Carolina, to perform the duties of the Chair.

JAMES O. EASTLAND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. MORGAN thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF LEADERSHIP

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio is recognized.

THE JOURNAL

Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Journal of the proceedings of Tuesday, May 23, 1978, be approved.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER).

SPECIAL ORDERS

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I understand there is a preference of the two Senators on this side who have special orders that the order of those speeches be reversed.

I ask unanimous consent that that might occur. I understand it will make Senator BARTLETT first and then Senator DOLE.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I would inquire of the distinguished acting majority leader if he has any requirement for the remainder of his time under the standing order and, if not, if we might combine it with mine which is remaining and yield it to the distinguished minority whip?

Mr. METZENBAUM. I have no objection. That is agreeable.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The Senator from Alaska (Mr. STEVENS).

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished acting majority leader and the minority leader for yielding me their time.

FEDERAL LANDS IN ALASKA

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, one of the most difficult problems that I have ever faced in the 25 years of my career in public life has been the question of the so-called d-2 lands in Alaska.

This question concerning what is the proper action for Congress to take with regard to determining the criteria for the use of Federal lands in Alaska is a most unique one. One of the difficult things about the subject today is that, as the House of Representatives has proceeded with the consideration of H.R. 39 there has been increasing rhetoric about that bill. It is said that the bill will unlock the Federal lands in Alaska.

I have had comments to make in the past about this approach and about the statement and I wish to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner of Wednesday, May 17, 1978, which is entitled "What Can One Say."

This editorial reflects the feelings that I expressed when the ad appeared in the Washington Post which was entitled "The Unlock Bill."

In that ad it was stated that in Alaska, land area 2½ times larger than California will be open for development if the Interior Committee bill becomes law. The ad also said that 90 percent of Alaska will be open for oil production if H.R. 39 becomes law, and 96 percent of the lands with favorable potential for oil.

Mr. President, I asked for this time this morning, and I am indebted to the two leaders for allowing me to use their time, to report that I have had a conversation with at least one of the principal sponsors of this bill and I have told him that any time the proponents of H.R. 39 want to fashion a bill which will make the ad that they placed in the newspaper truthful, I personally will be ready not only to work on the bill but to be a sponsor of it.

If they are ready to present to the Senate a bill that will open for development in Alaska an area 2½ times larger than California, if they are ready to present a bill that will permit 90 percent of Alaska to be open for oil production and 96 percent of the lands with favorable oil potential to be available for leasing, then I think they would be acting in the national interest and I would be more than willing to help them.

I think that the Senate should know that Alaskans are ready to work with anyone who would approach the question of H.R. 39 and the problem that it poses in a balanced way.

It is not balanced, in my opinion, as it stands. As it stands, it would create almost 70 million acres of wilderness in the State of Alaska when there are only 15 million acres of wilderness in the whole United States, including Alaska, after almost 15 years of the Wilderness Act.

H.R. 39 would double the area of the National Park Service notwithstanding the fact that we already have 25 percent of the National Park Service in our State. I think it would create such havoc in terms of proper land use planning it would be impossible for Alaskans for many years to restore the concept of proper land use planning.

As I pointed out yesterday to the Senate Energy Committee, Alaska is the only State that for 5 years now has paid half the cost of maintaining the Federal-State Land Use Planning Commission for Alaska and its duty was to plan for the use of Federal lands.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this editorial entitled "What Can One Say" be printed in the RECORD at this point, and I urge those who are the proponents of H.R. 39 to come forward and make this ad that appeared in the Washington Post a truthful ad.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Fairbanks (Alaska) Daily News-Miner, May 17, 1978]

WHAT CAN ONE SAY

We must be winning the d-2 battle—our opponents are stooping to new lows in their campaign for H.R. 39.

A full-page advertisement in the Washington Post May 4 called H.R. 39 "The Unlock Bill". It was sponsored by the "Americans for Alaska" group, a bunch that's about as concerned with Alaska as Idi Amin is concerned with the Yukon Native claims.

Their message is that putting 100 million acres of Alaska into wilderness will open the rest of Alaska for development. Both Morris Udall and John Seiberling said similar things many times last year, arguing that they were only taking one third of Alaska in their bill, and the rest was state selection and Native corporation land open to development.

The list of sponsors in last week's ad includes many of the wealthy and powerful names in America. There's James Buckley, Cathy Douglas, Dan Evans, Marshall Field, Leonard Firestone, Mrs. Lyndon Johnson, Nancy Kissinger, Henry Cabot Lodge, Elmo Zumwalt, Theodore Roosevelt IV, Laurence Rockefeller and George Romney.

There are also a few more familiar names like Bishop William Gordon, Juneau State Rep. Mike Miller and Nathaniel Reed.

"An Alaskan land area 2½ times larger than California will be open for development if the Interior Committee bill becomes law," the ad says. "Ninety percent of Alaska will be open for oil production if H.R. 39 becomes law—and 96 percent of the lands with favorable potential for oil."

It says that federal land status has been uncertain and "H.R. 39 will end that uncertainty, allow investment decisions to be made and development to proceed."

It says once H.R. 39 is passed the State of Alaska and the Natives can select the 149 million acres open to them and "a second 100 million acres . . . of remaining federal land will be open to mining, timbering and oil production."

One should think at least some of the people who sponsored that ad know better. We know Mike Miller does.

For one thing, who says the state and Native lands will all be open to development? Surely not the state and Natives. We have already created more state parks than any other state in the U.S. Much of the state land, we hope, will go for homesites. One careful look at Native land selections shows they are greatly interested in protecting villages and hunting areas from outside interference.

The Americans for Alaska also overlook the fact that H.R. 39 takes back many existing state land selections and closes a lot of good land off from future selections.

As for that other 100 million acres of federal land left out of H.R. 39, it comes under Section 603 of the BLM Organic Act and meets that law's criteria for placement in wilderness study areas. That means nothing can be done on that land that would ruin its value as a future wilderness area until the Interior Department comes up with a wilderness proposal and gets it through Congress. That's likely going to be a long time.

And that 100 million acres of land in H.R. 39 is drawn so that it either takes in known mineral reserves or blocks access to minerals on state, Native or federal d-1 lands.

Of course all this leaves out the argument this newspaper has advanced time and again. If H.R. 39 is to protect us from overdevelopment, why doesn't it allow Alaskans to hunt, farm, build homes and live in these wilderness settings? Without a special dispensation from the Secretary of Interior the bill would close most of this land to motorboats, snowmachine travel and aircraft landings. One wouldn't even be able to carry a firearm on more than 40 million acres where such freedom exists now. We fail to see how barring our cabins and hunters keeps the land safe from Anaconda Mining.

It wouldn't be so bad to see these lies in advertisements if so many people didn't believe them. For instance a routine Associated Press article on the House Rules Committee debate last week ended with, "In addition to the lands picked by the state and Alaska Natives, roughly another 100 million acres of federal land left out of the parks bill would be open for development."

What can one say?

SPECIAL ORDER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Oklahoma (Mr. BARTLETT) is recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes.

THE GEOPOLITICS OF SALT

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, in the next few months we shall all be involved in the ongoing debate over the difficult, technical problems associated with SALT II. As the ranking Republican member of the Research and Development Subcommittee of the Senate Armed Services Committee, I already find myself spending many hours sorting out the complex issues associated with strategic weaponry.

As I listen to the discussions of SALT II which are so frequent these days, I see many of my colleagues preoccupied with strategic hardware issues such as throwweight, fratricide, hardness, kill radius, circular error probable, equivalent megatonage, and the like. Equally esoteric strategic concepts such as parity, stability, deterrence, verifiability, equity, counterforce, and linkage grow out of these hardware issues. All of these technology-related issues are important, and I intend to contribute more than my fair share to the discussion of them. However, before we become so completely immersed in these cold, dry, esoteric nuclear statistics, I would like to set the record straight as I see it: SALT is more a geopolitical issue than a technological problem. Any new SALT agreement will impact upon allies and friends overseas just as much as upon the United States itself.

SALT II is not simply a cooperative effort by the United States and the Soviet Union to achieve strategic nuclear stability and reduced defense budgets. It is also a forum for Soviet-American competition. Although the arms control policies of the Soviet Union contain ample reference to the pacifism associated with Marxist-Leninist ideology, Soviet arms negotiations are characterized by a tenacious exploitation of opportunities combined with a pugnacious resistance to making even minor concessions. At SALT, the Soviets stress the Russian-American rivalry; their goal is geopolitical advantage.

Arms control decisionmaking in the United States also contains these cooperative and competitive dimensions; but the focus is less clear. The arms control constituency in the United States, dominated by dovish hawks and hawkish doves, is far more diverse and divided than that which exists in the Soviet Union, and its policy objectives seem more vague. The American approach to SALT is influenced by competing circles of technocrats, bureaucrats, politicians, academics, clerics, and the media. For this reason, it should not be surprising that American arms negotiations are more intense within the United States than at the table with the Soviet Union.

For a sizable number of American arms controllers, technology, not the Soviet Union, drives the arms race. They see the United States as primarily responsible for the arms race because it is the world leader in technology. Often they ignore the consistent momentum of Soviet technological initiatives and are unaware of the difficulties facing the United States in maintaining a technological lead over the Soviet Union sufficient to counter Soviet superiority in numbers. In many areas, the United States is pushing technology about as far as it can. In the case of ballistic missiles, the small size of U.S. strategic delivery vehicles makes additional improvements expensive and difficult.

The Soviet advantage in missile throwweight permits the Russians to achieve operational equality at a lower level of technology than that used by the United States, and to achieve operational superiority as they catch up in those technologies where the United States has been ahead. For the antitechnologists, however, the Soviet Union is a valuable ally in their efforts to keep more American weapons genies in the bottle by hobbling the dynamism of the Pentagon. In the process, this school hopes to persuade the Kremlin that new weapons technologies accelerate the arms race. They hope that Moscow will rein in its extensive weapons development programs.

I doubt, however, that the Soviet Union will limit its own technological advancement in the name of arms control. On the contrary, the consistency and force behind all Soviet foreign policy reflects a clear effort to exploit technology to gain geopolitical advantage over the West. For example, the United States has not deployed an antiballistic missile defense system or an extensive civil defense network because Americans do not believe that anyone in their right mind would initiate a nuclear exchange. The Soviet Union, on the other hand, has stressed ballistic missile defense, civil defense, and the possibility of nuclear war, not because it wants nuclear war, but because Moscow believes that the Soviet Union should not only survive, but win a nuclear war if it should occur.

Also, obtaining political leverage from strategic forces requires that the threat of the Soviet Union surviving and winning a nuclear exchange be seen as credible. Thus, the U.S.S.R. hopes to gain political advantage from superior strategic nuclear forces. The United States, on the other hand, seeks merely to neutralize strategic weapons as a factor in the Soviet-American rivalry. The impact of these different goals can be seen in the arms development programs of the two superpowers following SALT I.

Since 1972, the year SALT I was ratified, the Soviet Union has tested 10 models of 5 ICBM's, including 4 entirely new intercontinental ballistic missiles. They have at least four additional new land based intercontinental missiles under development. In the same period, they have tested five models of four submarine launched ballistic missiles, including three new SLBM's and have at least one additional new SLBM under development. This contrasts sharply with the United States which, since SALT I, has developed only one new strategic ballistic missile, the Trident I SLBM, which will be deployed in 1980.

America's arms control difficulties grow not only out of nuclear weapons policies, but also out of the absence of a coherent American foreign policy—in Europe, in Africa, in Asia, in the western Pacific, and around the world. It is in this context that some of America's concessions at SALT II become most worrisome.

The world has grown small, and America's vital economic and political interests are spread throughout the globe. If the United States had had a choice, it might have decided not to position its vital interests on the periphery of the Soviet Union, but the geography of our planet has placed them there.

Following World War II, our Nation adopted a policy of "containment" designed to protect these interests against threats from the Soviet Union. We formed alliances and provided a nuclear umbrella for our friends overseas and for our own interests. Since then, the immediate goal of Soviet foreign policy has been to counter these developments. Today, our overseas alliances are in trouble, and the linkage between our strategic nuclear forces and the protection of our allies is questionable. U.S. arms control efforts, consummated or under negotiation, frequently make them worse. Take SALT II for example. Even if SALT II should serve to make the strategic nuclear balance more stable at best, an uncertain outcome, it will not reduce Soviet threats to our allies and interests overseas. Although not yet concluded, it contains tentative provisions which have already served to disrupt the unity and effectiveness of NATO. Most significant in this regard is the proposed protocol to SALT II.

With its limits on technology, America's counterweight to Soviet numbers, the proposed protocol makes the actual SALT II treaty worse for the United States than it would be otherwise and promises to make SALT III negotiations more difficult for the United States. It is the protocol which places limits on cruise missiles and the MX missile, both of which are necessary to counter the Soviet strategic buildup. Worse, the protocol has already caused our allies in NATO and the Pacific great concern.

Many of our NATO allies have been unhappy that they were not consulted before the formulation of the concessions on the ranges and testing of cruise missiles which were included in the protocol. Many were disappointed and alarmed that later consultations seemed designed by the American administration to close off criticism and debate in Europe. Certainly, SALT is not a domestic matter of importance only to the United States.

Our NATO allies, who have their own cruise missile programs, are also alarmed at the noncircumvention, nontransfer provisions of the protocol which add insult to injury by the possible restrictions on the transfer of cruise missile technology to our allies. NATO sees the United States stressing closer cooperation and greater NATO standardization on the one hand, and on the other hand, they see the United States and the Soviet Union concluding a formal agreement to shut off Western Europe from important new defense technologies. Soviet compromise on the technology transfer issue does not remove the lack of confidence in the United States which was created in Europe in the first place, and which still exists due to certain noncircumvention provisions.

Europeans ask why the United States limits theater systems such as the conventional and nuclear ground launched cruise missile at SALT while excluding Soviet systems such as the SS–20 and Backfire at present which have similar missions. Some remember that the United States would not conclude the 1972 SALT I Interim Agreement on Strategic Offensive Arms until the Soviet Union abandoned its insistence on the inclusion of U.S. "forward based systems" (FBS). At that time, everyone recognized that the "forward based systems" issue was designed to drive a wedge between the United States and its allies. Certainly the SALT II protocol has already permitted the Soviet Union to place the tip of the wedge between the United States and Western Europe. We must act quickly and decisively to insure that they do not expand the crack.

The 600-kilometer restriction on submarine-launched cruise missiles and ground-launched cruise missiles and the 2,500-kilometer restriction on air-launched cruise missiles add support to the Soviet definition of strategic systems as being those weapons which can hit the homelands of the superpowers from wherever they are based. This contrasts with the American approach which has focused on weapons with a generally intercontinental range.

The danger in accepting this Soviet definition of "strategic" is that it calls into question the legitimacy of U.S. nuclear (and nonnuclear) military forces deployed on the periphery of the Soviet Union in order to aid our allies and protect our interests. Under this Soviet definition of strategic, Soviet weapons designed to attack Western Europe appear legitimate while U.S. forces designed to defend NATO appear illegitimate. This notion, should it become widespread, would provide the Soviet Union with considerable leverage in its geopolitical efforts to divide the United States from its allies and to pry the United States away from the rimland of the Soviet Union.

Although the United States should never lose sight of its ultimate goals in arms control, it must take Soviet-American competition more seriously in its arms control negotiations. Magnanimity in arms control is counterproductive and destabilizing. Only a strong defense and tough negotiation by the United States will make arms control a necessity for the Soviet Union rather than an opportunity for Moscow to further itself around the world. Failure to stand firm will weaken the United States, divide it from its allies and overseas resources, and force nations on the periphery of the Soviet Union to reach an accommodation with Moscow or deploy nuclear weapons themselves. In short, the overall foreign policy objectives of the United States would be undermined by an inadequate SALT II agreement.

Mr. President, I yield the remainder of my time to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senator is very thoughtful and gracious.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 137—REAFFIRMATION OF THE UNITY OF THE NORTH ATLANTIC ALLIANCE COMMITMENT

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I send to the desk a joint resolution on behalf of myself, Mr. BAKER, Mr. STENNIS, Mr. SPARKMAN, Mr. KENNEDY, Mr. NUNN, Mr. GRIFFIN, Mr. TOWER, Mr. PERCY, and Mr. DANFORTH, and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I simply wish to express to the Senate what the distinguished majority leader already knows, and that is that this resolution is fully supported on both sides of the aisle, and it is my privilege, along with others on this side, to cosponsor it with the majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished minority leader.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A joint resolution (S.J. Res. 137) reaffirming the unity of the North Atlantic Alliance commitment.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Senate will proceed to its immediate consideration and without objection, the joint resolution will be considered to have been read the second time at length.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, June 11 will mark the 30th anniversary of a historic and farsighted resolution that laid the cornerstone of U.S. foreign policy following World War II.

The Vandenberg resolution, which took its name from the distinguished Senator from Michigan who served in this Chamber for more than two decades, paved the way for U.S. membership in the North Atlantic Alliance and helped to create a community of nations unprecedented in power, but dedicated to the preservation of peace. It demonstrated to all nations this country's bipartisan commitment to stand firmly for the ideals in which we believe.

The extent of the alliance's achievements has been even greater than could have been imagined when the North Atlantic Treaty was signed in 1949. Not only has the alliance preserved peace and stability on the European continent, but it has helped establish the foundation for a freer, more prosperous, and more dignified way of life.

The alliance has evolved into a true community of states, each acting freely on the basis of its own sovereignty to maintain the common values of democracy which bind the Western World together.

As NATO moves toward its 30th anniversary, we have probably come to take it too much for granted—yet its role is as crucial as ever, if not more so. We must insure that it retains the capability to deter aggression, particularly in view of the continuing military buildup of the Warsaw Pact nations.

NATO can only fulfill its purpose of providing collective security to its members if it has adequate military strength. From a base of strength, it can also best pursue possible agreements on arms control—agreements which would enhance allied security and help stabilize the military balance and reduce tensions in Europe.

As the leaders of the NATO countries prepare to gather in Washington on May 30 and 31 to discuss these and other vital issues facing the Atlantic community, I believe it is appropriate for the Senate to express once again its strong and continuing commitment to the North Atlantic Alliance.

It is for this reason that I have introduced on behalf of myself and the other Senators aforementioned and that I strongly urge the adoption of this resolution reaffirming that commitment and expressing our support for the strengthening of NATO's defensive capabilities.

As I have already stated, I am pleased to be joined by the distinguished minority leader, Mr. BAKER, in sponsoring this resolution, along with Messrs. STENNIS, SPARKMAN, KENNEDY, NUNN, GRIFFIN, TOWER, PERCY, and DANFORTH, all of whom have a strong interest in NATO.

Mr. President, it is particularly appropriate that the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Armed Services (Mr. STENNIS) and the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations (Mr. SPARKMAN) are cosponsors of this resolution. Both were Members of the Senate at the time of the Vandenberg resolution in 1948 and when the NATO Treaty was approved in 1949, and because of their committee responsibilities, both of them have had and continue to have a special interest in the alliance.

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I am pleased to consponsor this resolution which reaffirms the support of Congress for the North Atlantic Alliance as a vital commitment and cornerstone of U.S. foreign policy.

We consider this resolution in connection with the forthcoming NATO summit meeting in Washington, which will surely underline the common foundations and common aspirations of the alliance.

It is a mark of NATO's success that we have secured the peace in Europe, achieving unparalleled prosperity and security, and permitting the West to pursue détente with the East, with confidence in our own strength. We should never forget that NATO is not just a military alliance, but a political alliance in which diplomatic and strategic consultation has become increasingly important and intense.

This political dimension will be crucial as we seek to resolve the fundamental issues of relations with the Soviet Union: strategic and theater arms control (SALT and MBFR); the imperative of mutual restraint; respect for fundamental human rights; and the possibility of expanded East/West cooperation in the future.

So it is only fitting for the Congress to express our appreciation for the success story of NATO and our expectation of an increasingly vital North Atlantic Alliance in the future.●

● Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I am pleased to join with the distinguished majority leader and eight of our colleagues in sponsoring a resolution that recognizes and reaffirms the commitment of the United States to the North Atlantic Alliance. The Alliance remains after 30 years the cornerstone of the foreign policy and defense of the United States. It is not, however, only an alliance for mutual defense, it is a community of shared interests and ideals—a standard against which the world community at large can measure its progress toward the achievement of political and individual freedom.

It is with a strong measure of pride that I remind my colleagues that on this side of the Atlantic the initiative for forming this Alliance came from this Chamber. It was a resolution proposed by the distinguished Senator Vandenburg, which encouraged President Truman to approach the newly formed Brussels Pact and proceed to the "progressive development of regional and other collective arrangements for individual and collective self-defense * * *". That resolution marked a recognition by the United States that the democracies of Europe and North America could not again afford to await complacently the fact of aggression before preparing to defend against it.

That recognition was well founded. From the ashes and destruction of World War II, NATO has become a strong and vital bulwark against the threat of aggression and there is, to be sure, little reason for complacency. In the statement by the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff on the Defense Posture of the United States for fiscal year 1979, General Jones noted:

NATO conventional strength has not kept pace with the Warsaw Pact. . . . NATO's qualitative advantages which have offset Warsaw Pact numerical advantages in the past have diminished.

We must recognize and deal with the reality that the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact have every intent of establishing a clear superiority over the defense capabilities of the NATO Alliance.

So it is all together fitting and proper, Mr. President, that we recognize this 30th anniversary of a successful Alliance tempered with the realization that the threat against the Alliance not only remains after 30 years, but continues to grow. It goes without saying, I believe, that the capabilities of the Alliance must begin to keep pace with the strength of the Warsaw Pact, and the Alliance must be unquestionably able and determined to deter, if possible, and defeat, if necessary, the threat poised against it.●

The joint resolution (S.J. Res. 137) was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

The joint resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S.J. RES. 137

Whereas thirty years ago the Congress passed the Vandenberg Resolution, which has come to represent the highest qualities of bipartisan statesmanship; and

Whereas the North Atlantic Alliance has preserved the peace in Europe for an entire generation, allowing its members to attain unprecedented levels of prosperity and well being for their people; and

Whereas the leaders of the Alliance will gather in Washington, D.C., on May 30 and 31, 1978, to renew their adherence to its principles and rededicate themselves to its objectives; and

Whereas this meeting will be the capstone of efforts to ensure that the needs of collective security will be met over the next decade: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the North Atlantic Alliance be reaffirmed as a vital commitment and cornerstone of United States foreign policy, and that the bipartisan spirit that inspired its birth be rededicated to the purpose of strengthening it further in the cause of peace and security.

SEC. 2. The Congress recognizes the extraordinary success of the North Atlantic Alliance in fulfilling its goals of safeguarding the freedom, common heritage and civilization of its peoples, founded on the principles of democracy, individual liberty and the rule of law.

SEC. 3. On the occasion of the NATO Summit meeting in Washington, the Congress declares its support for efforts to reaffirm the unity of the North Atlantic Alliance, to strengthen its defensive capabilities to meet threats to the peace, and on this basis to persevere in attempts to lessen tensions with the Warsaw Pact states.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, will the majority leader withhold that motion just for the moment?

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, indeed.

Mr. BAKER. The reason is, as I notice, there were certain minor language changes that were done, and I have been unable to check with one member who is a senior member of one of the jurisdictional committees, and if we can reconsider the motion and table that motion later I shall appreciate it.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Surely. I withhold it.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the motion to reconsider is withdrawn.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Yes, by unanimous consent.

(Later the following occurred:)

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the majority leader will yield to me, I am now in a position to proceed to the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the minority leader. I so move.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the motion is in order. Without objection, the motion to lay on the table is agreed to.

(Conclusion of later proceedings.)

DRUG ABUSE OFFICE, PREVENTION, AND TREATMENT AMENDMENTS OF 1978

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar Order No. 751.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, and I will not object, that item, as the majority leader knows, is clear on our Calendar, and we have no objection to proceeding to its consideration and its passage.

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2916) to amend the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972 to extend the programs of assistance under that act for drug abuse prevention, education, treatment, and rehabilitation, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Human Resources with amendments as follows:

On page 2, beginning with line 3, insert the following:

On page 2, line 6, strike "(c)" and insert "(d)";

On page 2, line 15, strike "(d)" and insert "(e)";

On page 5, beginning with line 8, insert the following:

SEC. 6. (a) Title V of the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 504. Scientific Peer Review

"The Secretary acting through the Institute, shall, by regulation, provide for review of all research grants and contracts, training, treatment, and prevention activity grants, and programs over which he has authority under this Act by utilizing, to the maximum extent possible, appropriate peer review groups, composed principally of non-Federal scientists and other experts in the field of drug abuse.".

"504. Scientific Peer Review.".

On page 5, line 22, strike "6" and insert "7";

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Drug Abuse Office, Prevention, and Treatment Amendments of 1978".

SEC. 2. (a) Section 1 of the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972 is amended by striking "Office" and substituting "Office, Prevention,".

(b) The first sentence of section 409(a) of such Act is amended (1) by striking out "and" after 1977,", and (2) by inserting after "1978," the following: "and September 30, 1979,".

(c) Section 410(a) of such Act is amended by inserting after "Secretary" a comma and the following: "acting through the National Institute on Drug Abuse,".

(d) Section 410(b) of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, there is authorized to be appropriated (1) $153,000,000 for grants and contracts under paragraphs (3) and (6) of subsection (a) for drug abuse treatment programs, and (2) $24,000,000 for grants and contracts under such subsection for programs and activities, (other than for grants and contracts under paragraphs (3) and (6) of subsection (a)).

(e) Section 503 of such Act is amended (1) by striking "and" after "1977"; and (2) by inserting after "1978" the following: "and $7,000,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979".

SEC. 3. (a) Section 405(b) of the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972 is amended to read as follows:

"(b) The Secretary shall transmit a report to the President and the Congress with respect to each fiscal year on—

"(1) the health consequences and extent of drug abuse in the United States,

"(2) a description and evaluation of the effectiveness of the drug abuse prevention functions carried through any entity of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in the fiscal year for which the report is made,

"(3) a description of the manner in which such functions were carried out, the amount of funds expended, and a description and evaluation of the coordination within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare in carrying out such functions,

"(4) a description and evaluation of the effectiveness of experimental methods and programs implemented in carrying out such functions, recommendations for implementation of such methods and programs by others in carrying out their drug abuse prevention functions, and a description and evaluation of the effectiveness of the means used to disseminate information respecting such methods and programs, and

"(5) proposals for changes in the drug abuse prevention functions carried out through the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (including recommendations for legislation).

The report required by this subsection shall be transmitted not later than January 15 of each year.".

(b) Section 405 of such Act is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection (c) as follows:

"(c) Within one hundred-twenty days of the date of enactment of the Drug Abuse Office, Prevention, and Treatment Amendments of 1978, the Secretary shall submit to the Congress a report on the extent and nature of drug abuse in rural areas, the special needs and circumstances which must be addressed in providing drug abuse prevention function to these areas, and specific recommendations to alleviate drug abuse in rural areas. For purposes of this subsection, 'rural areas' means areas that are nonurbanized areas as defined by the Bureau of the Census.".

(c) Section 502(b)(3) of such Act is amended by striking "control and treatment" and substituting "prevention, control, and treatment".

SEC. 4. Section 303(2) of the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972 is amended by inserting immediately after "used" the following: "and shall include a mechanism to identify, provide for, and evaluate effective drug abuse prevention programs, especially for primary prevention designed to discourage persons from beginning drug abuse with equal attention to the needs of metropolitan areas and areas which are not urbanized areas as defined by the Bureau of the Census".

SEC. 5. (a) Section 409(e)(7) of the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972 is amended to read as follows:

"(7) provide assurance that the State agency will coordinate its planning with local drug abuse planning agencies, and with State and local health planning agencies and educational agencies, as appropriate;".

(b) The first sentence of section 409(e) of such Act is amended by striking "July 15" and substituting "July 31".

SEC. 6. (a) Title V of the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 504. Scientific Peer Review

"The Secretary, acting through the Institute, shall, by regulation, provide for review of all research grants and contracts, training, treatment, and prevention activity grants, and programs over which he has authority under this Act by utilizing, to the maximum extent possible, appropriate peer review groups, composed principally of non-Federal scientists and other experts in the field of drug abuse.".

"504. Scientific Peer Review.",

SEC. 7. Section 502 of the Marihuana and Health Reporting Act (Public Law 91-296) is amended by striking out "annually" and inserting in lieu thereof "biennially",

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the amendments be considered en bloc.

The amendments were considered and agreed to en bloc.

● Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, S. 2916 revises and extends the authorizations of appropriations for 1 year under the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972 (Public Law 92-255) to continue the drug abuse research, prevention, treatment, and rehabilitation programs of the National Institute on Drug Abuse (NIDA) in the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. It proposes a total of $229 million in authorizations of appropriations during fiscal year 1979 for these programs. Under existing law, $212 million is appropriated for fiscal year 1978.

The bill provides greater emphasis on prevention and demonstration activities within the special grants and contracts program, and on evaluation of such activities. It requires a report on drug abuse in rural areas, and encourages the general drug abuse strategy to focus on prevention and on the needs of both urban and rural areas.

It encourages greater coordination of drug abuse planning at the State and local levels with the planning activities of health and educational agencies. It stipulates activities peer review of grant and contract proposals within the National Institute on Drug Abuse. S. 2916 provides for an annual report on the health consequences and extent of drug abuse.

HISTORY OF LEGISLATION

On March 21, 1972, the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972 (Public Law 92-255) was signed into law. The purpose of the 1972 act was to "focus the comprehensive resources of the Federal Government and bring them to bear on drug abuse with the immediate objective of significantly reducing the incidence of drug abuse in the United States within the shortest possible period of time, and to develop a comprehensive, coordinated long-term Federal strategy to combat drug abuse."

In 1972, illicit drug abuse was widely perceived as having reached epidemic proportions, afflicting between 200,000 and 300,000 individuals. A message from the President to the Congress stressed that in New York City, narcotic deaths rose from 200 in 1969 to over 1,000 in 1970. At the same time, federally funded community treatment facilities had the capability of providing services for only 16,000 addicts. The linkages between drug abuse and other societal problems and costs were also widely recognized. These other factors included increased crime rates, rates of death, increased health costs, lost productivity, and other associated costs.

In response to the drug abuse problem, the 1972 act established several programs. First, it established the Special Action Office for Drug Abuse Prevention (SAODAP) within the Executive Office of the President. It required the Director of SAODAP to provide overall planning and policy and to establish objectives and priorities for all Federal drug abuse prevention functions. Second, it provided for the establishment of the National Advisory Council for Drug Abuse Prevention to advise the SAODAP Director. Third, it required the President to establish a strategy council composed of the SAODAP Director, the Attorney General, the Secretaries of Health, Education, and Welfare, State, and Defense, the Administrator of the Veterans' Administration, and other officials to prepare a comprehensive Federal drug abuse strategy.

Finally, it provided authority for an expanded drug abuse prevention and treatment program within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. Specifically, it established the National Institute on Drug Abuse within the National Institute on Mental Health. It provided for formula grants to States for drug abuse programs under section 409. It provided for special project grants and contracts for drug abuse treatment and prevention programs under section 410. It also contained other directives relating to other drug abuse functions and programs within NIDA and other agencies in the Department of HEW. In 1974, Public Law 93-282 removed NIDA from the National Institute of Mental Health and located the agency in the newly established Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration.

On March 19, 1976, the Congress enacted new legislation to amend the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972 (Public Law 94-237). The purpose of the 1976 amendments was to continue the focus of governmental resources on the problem of drug abuse while recognizing that drug abuse problems could not be solved as rapidly as envisioned by the 1972 act.

The 1976 amendments recognized that drug abuse was not a crisis which could be solved but rather a continuing problem calling for a continued Federal responsibility. These amendments made several changes in the drug abuse program. They established the Office of Drug Abuse Policy (ODAP) within the Executive Office of the President. SAODAP's drug abuse programmatic responsibilities were transferred to the National Institute on Drug Abuse within the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare. In addition, the authority and role of the Secretary of HEW and the Director of NIDA respecting drug abuse functions were clarified and the authorizations of appropriations for section 409, State drug abuse formula grants, and section 410, drug abuse project grant and contracts, were extended for 3 fiscal years through fiscal year 1978.

Generally, ODAP was required by statute to oversee all organizational and policy issues and to recommend and implement resource and program priorities. President Ford signed the legislation authorizing ODAP on March 19, 1976, but did not implement the Office, despite enactment of a specific line-item appropriation. On March 14, 1977, President Carter issued a memorandum to initiate the Office, urging full cooperation on the part of all Cabinet members. On May 25 a Director and Deputy Director were confirmed by the Senate.

On July 15, 1977, the President sent to Congress Reorganization Plan No. 1. Among other things, this plan proposed to abolish ODAP. Under the Reorganization Act of 1977, this plan was to take effect at the expiration of 60 days (both Houses in session) unless either House vetoed the whole plan by majority vote. Senator HATHAWAY as chairman of the Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse questioned the ODAP aspect of the plan in testimony before the Committee on Governmental Affairs on July 27, 1977.

Subsequent meetings occurred among Members of Congress, the reorganization staff of the Office of Management and Budget, and Mr. James McIntyre, Deputy Director of OMB, to discuss these issues.

The Office of Drug Abuse Policy was the successor coordinative agency to SAODAP which had been phased out.

The legislative intent made clear that Congress as a whole were dissatisfied with inconsistent and sometimes conflicting Federal drug abuse policies, with no clear overall direction. The involvement of the Justice Department, Treasury, the Central Intelligence Agency, and the State Department in enforcement issues; the involvement of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, and the Department of Labor, and Veterans Administration in treatment and rehabilitation; and the involvement of HEW, DOD, and Justice, along with the Department of Transportation in prevention and education, created special problems.

The Congress was particularly concerned with establishing a central mechanism for accountability to avoid the prior situation where individual agencies or departments were able to assert that a particular aspect of the drug problem was outside their realm of responsibility, or that the drug problem was primarily one of enforcement, or treatment, or prevention, to the exclusion of an integrated strategy.

In Title II of the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act, as amended in 1976, ODAP's functions are spelled out in great detail. Its role was to insure a coherent Presidential drug abuse policy throughout the executive branch. It was to be headed by a Director and Deputy Director, both of whom were subject to Senate confirmation. Both were by statute required to testify before congressional committees when so requested. Previously White House aides had refused to testify when requested, citing executive privilege. Other ODAP personnel were designated in the statute as well.

On September 25, 1977, Mr. McIntyre wrote to me and other concerned Members of Congress outlining the administration's proposals for continued coordination of drug policy in lieu of ODAP. He indicated that the overall functions of ODAP would continue to be carried out within the Executive Office of the President. ODAP's policy development and coordination functions would be handled primarily by the domestic policy staff, with several members of that staff assigned exclusively to drug abuse issues. He assured us that Dr. Peter Bourne, Director of ODAP, would continue to take the lead in formulating a comprehensive drug abuse policy, subsequent to the termination of ODAP as a discrete entity, including planning, enforcement, and other critical issues, in his capacity as the Special Assistant to the President for Health Issues. He would remain available to testify before congressional committees on drug abuse issues. Subsequent to its termination, the reorganization functions of ODAP would be transferred to the President's reorganization project. Mr. McIntyre also indicated that ODAP could continue to exist until April 1, 1978 to complete its ongoing studies and policy recommendations.

With respect to ODAP, the President's Reorganization Plan took effect on March 26, 1978. Its staff members were assigned to various offices in the Executive Office and in other departments and agencies of the Federal Government. A core staff of ODAP was transferred directly to the Domestic Policy Staff under the supervision of the former deputy director. All of these individuals report directly to the Special Assistant to the President for Health Issues.

NEED FOR THE LEGISLATION

Federal drug abuse policy, if it is to be effective, must be coordinated at the highest levels of the executive branch. While many problems in our complex society inevitably cut across multiple Federal departments and agencies, none appears to be more insidious in impact or intractable in cause than drug abuse. Further, to help stem these tragic social and economic costs, continued Federal support of prevention, treatment, and rehabilitation is vitally needed.

The scope of licit and illicit drug use and abuse is staggering in its magnitude. In 1977, 1.4 billion prescriptions were written—or 7 for every individual in the Nation. The per capita consumption of alcohol was slightly over 2 gallons for every person over 15 years of age. Fifty-five million Americans smoke cigarettes daily. There are between 450,000 and 500,000 daily users of heroin, and over 4 million Americans who have tried cocaine.

Active nonmedical use of other drugs, such as amphetamines, tranquilizers, and barbiturates is estimated on the part of at least 5 percent of the adult population, or among at least 7 to 8 million Americans. So-called poly-drug abuse, or use of more than one drug at a time, appears to be reaching epidemic proportions. And the deadly drug Phencyclidine, PCP, or "angel dust," is increasingly becoming a favored chemical of abuse, especially among our Nation's youth.

In this regard, three tables adapted from the March 1978, Office of Drug Abuse Policy study "Drug Use Patterns, Consequences, and the Federal Response: A Policy Review" are instructive.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that these tables be printed in the RECORD at this point.

TABLE I.—ESTIMATE OF RECENT NONMEDICAL USE (IN THE PAST MONTH) BY AGE GROUP, BY DRUG OF ABUSE

	12 to 17 yr (24,938,000 persons)	18 to 25 yr (30,553,000 persons)	Over 26 yr (117,266,000 persons)

[1] Indicates negligible use.

Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, upon analysis, table I also points out that the rate of inappropriate use of sedative/hyphotics on an age group basis is greatest among the 18 to 25 age group, next greatest among the 12- to 17-year-old group, and least among the over 26 group. In fact, the inappropriate usage rate among the over 26 group is approximately 20 percent of that for the 18- to 25-year-old group, and 25 percent of that in the 12- to 17-year-old group.

For this highly at risk youth group abuse of certain drugs appears to be growing at a disturbingly rapid rate. Table II indicates that use of heroin, stimulants, hallucinogens, sedatives, and transquilizers among high school seniors has either stabilized or declined over the 3 years 1975–77, but use of marihuana, inhalants, cocaine, and other opiates has increased at a fairly rapid rate. Daily use of these substances among high school seniors is even more alarming, both in number and trend.

Table III utilizes 1977 data to compare the medical and nonmedical use of various drugs with the number of individuals in federally funded treatment slots. This data shows that heroin users constituted only 2 percent of the combined numbers of individuals engaged in nonmedical use of drugs, while accounting for 78 percent of the number in federally funded treatment.

This historic concentration of Federal effort on the treatment of heroin addiction is appropriate given the extraordinary personal and societal destruction wrought by that substance. On both the supply and the demand side of this drug, crime and violence are concomitant by-products.

The astronomical sums of money associated with heroin trafficking and distribution make inevitable the involvement of national and international organized crime. A very substantial proportion of urban crime can be traced directly to heroin users, with over 52 percent entering treatment having prior arrest records. Estimates of the economic loss resulting from drug abuse, including narcotic-related crime, lost productivity, increased health costs, and treatment and rehabilitation programs range from $10 billion to $17 billion annually. Other intangible costs which cannot be estimated include the tragic human costs of mental and physical pain, unfulfilled potential, destruction of families, and disruption of neighborhoods.

To attempt to contain and limit all of these complex variables and contributing factors, a unified and well-coordinated Federal effort is essential. The potential benefits from a consistent, effective policy are particularly evident when examining enforcement policy, but are no less true with respect to treatment and rehabilitation. At the same time, the benefits from progress in any one area inevitably spill over into all of the others. Conversely, stagnation in any one area frustrates progress in each of the others.

In this regard, I have been most impressed with the initiatives and accomplishments of the Office of Drug Abuse Policy in the course of its 1-year existence and believes that ODAP ably carried out its legislative mandate in that brief timespan.

ODAP recognized that controlling the supplies of illicit drugs requires that those suppliers be attacked at every point in the distribution chain, from the fields to the processing laboratories, to transshipment, and the sales and distribution network. In this regard, cooperative efforts with foreign nations to attack distribution networks as close to the source of the drugs as possible, and to help in the development of substitute sources of income for the local population, offer the most promising avenue of success. Such efforts necessarily stress additional border and law enforcement forces for interdiction and concentrate on long-term programs to reduce cultivation.

ODAP devoted considerable attention to bilateral diplomatic negotiations and missions, working with the United Nations and other international organizations.

Further, to foster increased coordination among Federal departments and agencies having program responsibility for drug control, ODAP instituted biweekly meetings involving the Senior Advisor and Coordinator for International Narcotics Matters to the Secretary of State, the Director of the National Institute on Drug Abuse, the Administrator of the Drug Enforcement Administration, and the Commissioner of the U.S. Customs Service.

Concurrent with all of these efforts, heroin availability in the United States declined over the last 12 months to its lowest level in 7 years, with a national average rating purity of 5 percent and a price of $1.69 per milligram pure. One year earlier purity was 6.4 percent, and the price was $1.26. An aggressive cooperative opium poppy eradication program of the Mexican Government was a strong contributing factor to this result.

This decline in availability and purity, and increase in price resulted in a decline in heroin-related deaths to their lowest level since data began to be assembled in mid-1973. Deaths declined over 40 percent since July 1976, and heroin-related injuries showed a similar decrease. Thus, the lives of as many as 600 young Americans have been saved over the past 12 months. At the same time the crime rate nationwide has been reduced by approximately 9 percent.

These promising trends ought not to inspire complacency but rather should encourage continued Federal leadership and initiative. Drug abuse is not a problem on which a "state of war" can be waged in hope of vanquishing forever the foe. Rather, it is an ongoing Federal responsibility calling for ongoing efforts.

The improved situation with respect to heroin allowed for increase attention to the other drugs of abuse, which data indicate are far more widely used. An ODAP analysis indicated that barbiturates ranked almost as high as narcotics as a cause of death, and that three categories of drugs—barbiturates, narcotics-analgesics, and other sedatives, including those taken in combination with alcohol, accounted for over three-fifths of all drug related deaths.

As a result of these findings, ODAP coordinated a variety of initiatives directed to limiting inappropriate utilization of barbiturates. The Department of Health, Education, and Welfare has directed all health care facilities to review utilization and prescribing practices. The Department of Defense has decreased use of barbiturates by 80 percent. The Drug Enforcement Administration is auditing all 120 barbiturate manufacturers. Due to these and other programs directed at affecting the prescribing behavior of physicians, the number of barbiturate related deaths has declined by 26 percent in 1977.

In other areas, increased incidence of use of phencyclidine, or PCP, poses a particularly grave problem. Its component chemicals are widely available and have recognized industrial uses. It can be synthesized through relatively unsophisticated chemical procedures, on a fairly small and inexpensive scale.

This chemical appears to produce severe behavioral and physical changes and has many chemical variations, all equally devastating. All of these factors when viewed together distinguish this problem from those associated with control of heroin or other drugs of abuse, which have built-in economic, technological, or other constraints on availability and utilization.

Despite the very recent successes with respect to supplies and purity of heroin, declining death rates, and crime rates, and new initiatives regarding barbiturates and other drugs, there remains a strong need to maintain Federal support for treatment of drug abuse.

From 16,000 treatment slots in 1972, the Federal Government in the current fiscal year now provides partial funding through the National Institute on Drug Abuse for approximately 102,000 treatment slots throughout the Nation. The vast majority of these, approximately 95,000, are supported pursuant to Project Grant and Contract authority contained in section 410 of the act. The remainder are funded through section 409 formula grants and other Federal sources. Of the 95,000 slots, 208 are inpatient detoxification slots with an average annual cost per slot of approximately $40,000, of which $15,000 is funded from non-Federal sources. There are 10,812 residential slots, of which over 95 percent utilize drug-free treatment methods. The average annual cost per residential slot is $5,400, with approximately $2,000 funded from non-Federal sources. There are 4,647 so-called day care slots approximately 90 percent of which utilize free drug treatment. The average annual cost per day care treatment slot is approximately $2,500 with $960 from non-Federal sources. Outpatient treatment slots total 79,175. Approximately 55 percent of these are drug free, 41 percent methadone maintenance, and 4 percent detoxification. The average annual cost for outpatient slots is $1,800, with $700 from non-Federal sources.

Overall, these slots create a total cost of $226 million, with $140 million from Federal sources, and $86 million from non-Federal sources, for roughly a 60–40 funding ratio. Three-fourths of these slots are administered through the so-called statewide services contract method, which is intended to rely upon the administrative abilities of the single State drug abuse agencies—SSA's—and to encourage the development of non-Federal funding sources.

Overall, 1977 figures indicate that among all individuals admitted to NIDA-funded treatment, approximately 60 percent were users of heroin and other opiates. Among all clients during 1977, approximately 22 percent completed treatment, while only 17.4 percent of heroin clients completed treatment. For all drug abuse clients, NIDA funded and otherwise, drug-free treatment of non-opiate abusers showed the best record, with approximately 30 percent completing treatment. Depending on modality, between 20 and 60 percent of those completing treatment return again within the first year. A large proportion continue to be involved in the criminal justice system, and all face very high barriers in gaining and keeping employment.

These figures do not imply that treatment has failed, but rather that it is an extremely complex, difficult, expensive, and long-term proposition—for the individual affected, for the service providers, and for society as a whole.

It is equally clear that these problems cannot be ignored, and call for renewed attention to issues of effectiveness and cost. Treatment must be provided as an ongoing Federal responsibility to the extent that other resources are not made available. Until such time as a comprehensive national health insurance program is implemented, it appears necessary for the present level of support, with a minimum of 60 percent Federal funding, be provided. At the same time, these realities and their economics indicate that greatly increased attention must be devoted both to the areas of research and prevention. Federal efforts must be broader than simply treating the casualties lest this activity absorb a larger and larger share of a growing Federal health budget.

In research, there are a number of ongoing efforts on the part of the National Institute on Drug Abuse which deserve encouragement and continued support. These include development of LAAM (so-called longer-acting methadone), synthetic analgesics, and naltrexone (a heroin blocking agent). Other initiatives involve clinical investigation of the opiate receptors and the presence of morphine-like substances in the brain. Other areas of concern include studies on PCP abuse, studies seeking to identify the biomedical characteristics of those at risk, studies involving the social and psychological aspects of drug abuse—with particular attention to those from high risk environments who are "immune" to a drug abuse epidemic surrounding them, and studies on the effectiveness of education programs on the prevention of drug abuse.

In order to foster successful long-term approaches to the staggering problem of drug abuse it is essential that these activities continue and that the results of this research be widely disseminated to the service providers, medical, academic, and lay community.

The basic purpose of the bill is to provide a 1-year extension of the appropriations authorized under the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972. Ordinarily for programs of such obvious importance serving a compelling need, the committee would recommend at least a 3-year extension to insure program continuity and to foster long-range planning at the Federal, State, and local levels.

We have determined not to follow this pattern in this situation to assure continued scrutiny of the drug abuse policy coordination mechanisms within the executive branch. This determination allows for a reexamination of these issues in a legislative context over the upcoming calendar year and requires that prior to May 15, 1979, additional legislation be reported authorizing appropriations for the 1980 fiscal year.

I have been very favorably impressed with the accomplishments and direction provided by the Office of Drug Abuse Policy and am concerned that these functions continue to be fully undertaken subsequent to the implementation of the President's reorganization plan on March 26, 1978. Subsequent to implementation of that plan, all of the functions and responsibilities set forth in title II of the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972 which were vested in ODAP remains as continuing responsibilities on the part of the Executive Office of the President. The various functions of ODAP have been redelegated to particular elements of the Executive Office of the President, as delineated in Mr. McINTYRE's letter to Members of Congress of September 25, 1977, and it is my hope that these activities will continue to be carried out consistent with the example set by ODAP.

The 1-year extension of program authority contained in S. 2916 will allow us to monitor these matters closely, and to consider appropriate legislative action on a timely basis in the event that policy coordination difficulties arise once again, as was the case in 1972 and 1976.

The proposed legislation addresses another area of concern regarding reports to Congess under Reoganization Plan No. 2. Section 223 of the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act of 1972 requires the Director of ODAP to submit an annual report to the President and Congress on drug abuse policy and agency coordination objectives, activities, and accomplishments section 405(b) of the act requires the Secretary of HEW to submit an annual report to the Director of ODAP on new methods of drug abuse treatment and rehabilitation, their implementation and effectiveness in community programs, and administrative and legislative recommendations for inclusion in the "section 223 ODAP" report.

As a substitute for these reporting requirements, the proposed legislation requires the Secretary of HEW to transmit his information in an annual report to the Congress and to the President not later than January 15 of each year. In addition, it requires the Secretary to report other information comparable to that required for alcohol abuse and alcoholism programs under section 102 of the Comprehensive Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism Prevention, Treatment, and Rehabilitation Act of 1970.

The report will address the consequences and extent of drug abuse. It must include a description and evaluation of the drug abuse prevention functions of the department of the 1979 fiscal year, with a description of the manner in which such functions were carried out, including the amount of funds expended, along with an evaluation of the coordination within the department. It also will include particular attention to experimental programs and methods, with evaluation of the effectiveness of the means used to disseminate information respecting such programs. Finally, it is to include proposals for changes in these functions, including legislative changes.

An annual report describing the department's response to drug abuse will greatly increase the evaluation capabilities of both the executive branch and the Congress, provide invaluable information to those working in the drug abuse field, and serve as an additional mechanism by which the effectiveness of the President's drug abuse reorganization measures can be gauged.

A 1-year extension will further permit the completion of a study of drug abuse problems in rural areas. This bill requires such a study to be completed by the Secretary within 120 days after the enactment of this bill, to ensure that the Congress will be able to consider fully the findings of such a study in the context of next year's renewal legislation. The study is required to address the nature and extent of drug abuse in rural areas, the special needs and circumstances which must be addressed in meeting those needs, and specific recommendations to alleviate these problems.

Federal efforts since 1972 have largely concentrated on problems of heroin addiction which have manifested themselves most dramatically and tragically in major metropolitan areas. It has become increasingly apparent, however, that there is a less visible but no less real problem of drug abuse throughout all parts of our Nation in small towns as well as major urban centers.

At its recent hearing of this bill, and at a field hearing on March 24, 1978 in Bangor, Maine, the Subcommittee on Alcoholism and Drug Abuse received further testimony on the nature and extend of drug abuse problems in rural areas. This testimony indicated that the drug abuse client population in such areas is generally younger, often in their late teens, and tends to exhibit problems stemming from use of amphetamines, marihuana, hallucinogens, polydrug abuse, and in combination with alcohol. Data assembled by NIDA indicate that among rural populations there is a higher rate of heavy usage (2 or more times a week) than their urban counterparts for the following substances: opiates exclusive of heroin, tranquilizers amphetamines, and hallucinogens.

Treatment programs located in rural areas face difficult problems of management and resource utilization. Due to the geographic dispersal of the client population, treatment personnel must necessarily be dispersed to meet this need. Staff traveltime and transportation costs create an obvious problem of additional overhead costs, but there are other more subtle problems of administration. The committee has received further testimony that non-Federal matching requirements may be more difficult to fulfill in these areas, due to an apparent lack of recognition at the local levels of the severity of the problems involved. Also, federally imposed paperwork burdens and other regulatory constraints cause further problems for the relatively smaller staffs operating these programs.

The National Institute on Drug Abuse is to be commended for undertaking studies of some of these problems and for considering changes directed toward alleviating them. These include grants addressing programmatic issues such as outreach, linkages to their programs, or transportation.

The report required in this bill will allow for a comprehensive review of all these activities and form the basis for future initiatives. Consistent with these goals, the bill also includes a provision directing the Strategy Council to address drug abuse prevention needs of persons residing in both urban and rural areas.

Another area of serious concern in this legislation is the continued organizational integrity of the National Institute on Drug Abuse as both a programmatic and policy-making entity. Consistent with that goal, Public Law 94–737 formally established NIDA in section 501 of the act, subsection (a) of which is as follows:

§ 501. Establishment of Institute.

(a) There is established the National Institute on Drug Abuse (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "Institute") to administer the programs and authorities of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare (hereinafter in this title referred to as the "Secretary") with respect to drug abuse prevention functions. The Secretary, acting through the institute, shall, in carrying out the purposes of sections 301, 302, and 303 of the Public Health Service Act with respect to drug abuse, develop and conduct comprehensive health, education, training, research, and planning programs for the prevention and treatment of drug abuse and for the rehabilitation of drug abusers. The Secretary shall carry out through the Institute the administrative and financial management, policy development and planning, evaluation, and public information functions which are required for the implementation of such programs and authorities.

This language stressed an unmistakable intent that these programs be conducted through the institute lest the unique aspects of drug abuse as a social and health problem be submerged in a bureaucracy which might otherwise pursue other objectives more vigorously.

Recognizing at the same time that NIDA's programs ought not to function in isolation from those of its sister institutes, Congress provided at the same time that the Alcohol, Drug Abuse, and Mental Health Administration should assure cooperation and coordination in section 201 of Public Law 93–282, as amended, subsections (b) and (d) of which are as follows:

(b) The Secretary, acting through the Administration, shall supervise the function of the National Institute of Mental Health, the National Institute on Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism, and the National Institute on Drug Abuse in order to assure that (1) the programs carried out through each such Institute receive appropriate and equitable support, and (2) there is cooperation among the Institutes in the implementation of such programs.

(d) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, acting through the Administration, shall evaluate and make recommendations regarding improved, coordinated activities, where appropriate, for public education and other prevention programs with respect to the abuse of alcohol and other substances.

I am concerned that while carrying out its legitimate supervisory and coordinative functions, ADAMHA pay appropriate attention to the statutory responsibilities of the component Institutes. In this regard the high degree of cooperation which has existed among the Institutes, and the leadership which has been exerted by ADAMHA in encouraging this result is certainly to be commended. In meeting the program needs of the States, in fostering overall research objectives, in the area of primary prevention, and in insuring uniform programs and policies, this has been particularly important. This role will acquire heightened significance with the consideration of national health insurance initiatives and an overall administration emphasis on health prevention measures. I am sure that ADAMHA, working with the Institutes, will continue ably to meet these challenges.

Against this record of achievement, ADAMHA recently advanced a tentative proposal which appeared to go beyond its statutory responsibilities and contravene existing law. That plan was to restructure the initial review of all discretionary grants and research contracts of the three institutes within the Office of Administrator of ADAMHA. The expressed goals of this proposal were to improve the quality and objectivity of scientific peer review and to foster increased efficiency of the review process.

While other members of the Human Resources Committee and I strongly supported each of these goals, we questioned whether this particular proposal was consistent with the law and whether it might have the ancillary adverse effect of undermining other prior efforts on the part of each institute to assemble competent, objective review teams and structures and to conduct policy-making functions. These concerns were expressed at the public hearings and at subsequent meetings with the Secretary and the Administrator. We are gratified that the department has determined not to proceed with such centralization at the ADAMHA level, but rather to work toward further centralization within each Institute. We are in full support of this approach and trust that upon implementation it will achieve the goals originally sought.

In concert with this determination, the bill adds a new section 504 to the Act stipulating that review of all grants and contracts shall be conducted by the Secretary through the National Institute on Drug Abuse by utilizing, to the maximum extent possible, appropriate peer review groups composed principally of non-Federal scientists and other experts in the field of drug abuse. Another amendment to section 410 stipulates that special project grants and contracts shall be awarded by the Secretary through the National Institute on Drug Abuse. The new section 504 is virtually identical to section 502 of the Comprehensive Alcohol Abuse and Alcoholism Prevention, Treatment, and Rehabilitation Act of 1970, as amended.

Also included in the pending legislative proposal are two amendments to the requirements under section 409 of the act for State plans which must be submitted to receive State drug abuse formula grants. One would require assurance that the single State drug abuse agency coordinate its planning with local drug abuse planning agencies, with State and local health planning agencies, and with educational agencies, as appropriate. This latter coordination is particularly important if the highly at-risk youth group is to be impacted successfully with primary prevention programs. There is also pending on one Senate Calendar legislation amending the Alcohol and Drug Abuse Education Act to require that at the Federal level the Secretary coordinate all such school-based programs through the Office of Alcohol and Drug Education within the Office of Education. Coordination among the comparable agencies at the State and local levels is equally important. The bill also amends section 409 to require annual State plans to be due on July 31, as opposed to July 15 as in existing law.

The proposed legislation also includes an amendment to clarify the requirement that the National Institute on Drug Abuse provide technical assistance to State and local governments and individuals regarding grants and contracts for drug abuse prevention programs, consistent with the increased emphasis on prevention provided elsewhere in the bill.

The proposed legislation provides for the continuation of the marijuana and health report on a biennial basis. This report is an important health document at a time when marijuana use continues to increase and when Federal, State, and local governmental agencies appear to be shifting toward a policy of discouragement of marijuana use through prevention and education, with decreasing emphasis on a policy invoking severe criminal sanctions against its use.

With regard to ongoing programmatic activities of NIDA, the proposed legislation divides the authorizations of appropriations for drug abuse project grants and contracts under section 410 of the act between those for treatment programs and those for prevention, demonstration, and other programs and activities. This provision is intended to provide more visibility and accountability respecting expenditures for drug abuse programs and activities authorized under those subsections. Also, it more specifically reflects the committee's intent regarding the relative budgetary levels for each of these categories of activities. Other members of the committee and I are concerned that the funding levels in the President's fiscal year 1979 budget request for prevention and demonstration programs will cause a severe cutback in these programs.

The authorization level in the proposed legislation for these programs is viewed a realistic reflection of the curent budgetary needs for these programs particularly with regard to polydrug and substance abuse and those meeting the special needs of women and other population groups. It includes modest increases for growth in these programs offsetting increased costs due to inflation. It is my hope that the Appropriations Committees of the Senate and House will provide for comparable increases in their fiscal year 1979 appropriations for these programs.

The authorization level in the proposed legislation for drug abuse treatment programs under section 410 of the act is slightly higher than the President's fiscal year 1979 budget request to offset part of the increased costs of treatment and to permit a modest, expansion of treatment capacity where necessary. The authorization levels in the proposed legislation for State drug abuse formula grants under section 409 of the act and special addictive and therapeutic substance research under section 503 of the Act represent the minimum amounts needed to maintain and continue these programs during fiscal year 1979 at current levels of effort and support.

I am supportive of the effort of the National Institute on Drug Abuse of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare with respect to its responsibilities under the Drug Abuse Office and Treatment Act and the Public Health Service Act.

The Institute is to be commended for its collaborative efforts with other Federal agencies to develop and recommend specific national goals for future Federal activities in drug abuse prevention. This is a good beginning given current budgetary constraints, but much more needs to be done. Specifically, the administration's budget request included only $5.2 million for prevention activities under section 410 of the act for fiscal year 1979 as compared to $6.5 million in fiscal year 1978 appropriations and $4.7 million in fiscal year 1977 appropriations. This is an inadequate level of funding for project grants and contracts in prevention at a time when the incidence of drug abuse, polydrug abuse, and other types of substance abuse (of the types not normally associated with heroin addiction treatment programs) seems to be rising.

Consistent with this overall stress on prevention-related activities, the title of the act is amended to read: "The Drug Abuse Office, Prevention, and Treatment Act of 1972."

We view favorably the efforts of the Institute to provide technical assistance to individuals and organizations involved in drug abuse programs and activities outside the Institute, to cooperate with law enforcement and international agencies and organizations activities aimed at reducing the supply and demand for drugs, and to develop a national training network.

We are cognizant of the successes of some of NIDA's demonstration programs and encourages it to support more of these programs as effective new technologies and methods are developed and are ready to be disseminated to and implemented by drug abuse service workers in the prevention, treatment, and rehabilitation field. We are concerned, however, that the administration's budget request included only $7.5 billion for drug abuse demonstration activities under section 410 of the act for fiscal year 1979 as compared to $8.6 million in fiscal year 1978 appropriations and $12.6 million in fiscal year 1977 appropriations. This decrease in the level of effort for demonstration programs could cause irreparable injury to technology transfer efforts with respect to drug abuse. There is, for example, a need for further demonstration programs addressing the particular problems of drug abuse among women, and for the incorporation of treatment technology appropriate to this population into the general treatment services system.

Despite the accomplishments of the National Institute on Drug Abuse and the successes of its programs, it does not appear that the overall incidence of drug abuse in the United States is substantially responding to Federal programs to control or eliminate it. Recognizing that the programs of NIDA and other agencies in the Department do not have all the resources and authority sufficient to eliminate or control drug abuse in this country, the committee nevertheless believes strongly that the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare should augment those programs and activities in several respects.

First, the Secretary should take steps to improve the coordination between programs and activities within the department and those outside the department which relate to drug abuse, including those involved in education, mental health, alcohol, cigarette smoking, drug regulation, employment, law enforcement, international drug control, and all appropriate community health and social services.

The Secretary acting through the institute should also commit new resources to programs aimed at the prevention of drug abuse. Priority should be given to projects that develop and demonstrate the use and effectiveness of new and improved techniques in prevention, to biomedical and behavioral research into prevention, and to expansion of Federal efforts for the provisions of technical assistance to State, local and other appropriate entities in prevention.

In addition, the Secretary is strongly encouraged to undertake a thorough evaluation of all of the department's activities in the primary prevention area. At the present time, there is a distressing dearth of information on which programs work well and why, and what factors are necessary to successfully meet this growing need. In this regard, the recommendation contained in ODAP's Drug Use report calling for a "state of the art" paper on the results of all evaluations to date should prove helpful.

In addition, the Secretary acting through the institute should utilize existing resources and commit additional resources for prevention, demonstration, treatment and technical assistance programs involving drug abuse, poly-drug abuse, and abuse of other chemicals and substances targetted at specific types of population groups and geographical areas. Special attention should be given to programs addressing the special needs of the young, women, and other significantly impacted population groups. Special attention should also be given to programs addressing the special needs and circumstances of rural areas in providing drug abuse services to their populations.

NIDA and the department should work closely with other governmental agencies and private organizations to insure the individuality of drug abusers under treatment and their constitutional and statutory rights to fair, non-discriminatory treatment. The Secretary should take special actions to work with other agencies in improving employment opportunities for individuals who receive drug abuse treatment.

Finally, the Secretary should continue to enhance the research programs of the department aimed at developing knowledge concerning the social, behavioral, and biomedical mechanisms underlying drug abuse and other forms of substance abuse, as well as those aimed at developing and testing non-addictive and less-addictive therapeutic and antagonistic drugs and substances and detoxification-agents to ease the physical effects of withdrawal from addiction. The need to strengthen efforts to disseminate the results of research to the field and to translate that research into effective and practical application is particularly important.

Mr. President, there is clearly a strong and continuing need for all of these programs and efforts, and I urge my colleagues to support this legislation.●

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. BAKER. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, while we are awaiting the arrival of Senators, I ask unanimous consent that there be a brief period for the transaction of routine morning business.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Routine morning business transacted and additional statements submitted are printed later in today's RECORD.)

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

SPECIAL ORDER

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE) is recognized for 15 minutes.

S. 3137—PUBLIC COURSING PREVENTION ACT OF 1978

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, today I am introducing a bill to prohibit public coursing in the United States.

Coursing is a so-called sport in which greyhounds chase down and kill live rabbits. Those involved in public coursing say that the practice helps them train their dogs for legitimate greyhound racing.

In reality, coursing is an outdated and inhumane event in which thousands of rabbits are brutally killed.

Mr. President, today in the United States there is a thriving business in the Southwest and Midwest in the sale of wild rabbits for use in coursing.

In addition, there have been reports that sometimes live kittens, puppies, or other animals are utilized for this purpose.

My bill would stop such practices.

Today, I have written letters to the Secretary of Agriculture and the Attorney General of the United States requesting a legal opinion as to the applicability of the existing Animal Welfare Act to public coursing activities.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letters I have previously referred to be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
May 24, 1978.

Hon. GRIFFIN B. BELL,
Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BELL: I understand that the Secretary of Agriculture has requested an opinion from the Department of Justice as to the applicability of section 26 of the Animal Welfare Act (7 U.S.C. 2156) to an activity known as coursing.

Coursing involves a race between two or more greyhounds in pursuit of a live rabbit or other small animal which is used as a visual lure. The winner of the race is declared on the basis of points scored for turning ability, and also by which the dog catches the rabbit first. Thousands of rabbits are brutally killed each year in these events.

I urge you to respond to the request of the Department of Agriculture for a legal opinion on this matter as promptly as possible, and would appreciate having a copy of that opinion.

Sincerely yours,

BOB DOLE,
U.S. Senate.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
May 24, 1978.

Hon. BOB BERGLAND,
Secretary, United States Department of Agriculture, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I understand that the Department of Agriculture has requested an opinion from the Attorney General of the United States as to the applicability of section 26 of the Animal Welfare Act (7 U.S.C. 2156) to an activity known as coursing.

Coursing involves a race between two or more greyhounds in pursuit of a live rabbit or other small animal which is used as a visual lure. The winner of the race is declared on the basis of points scored for turning ability, and also by which the dog catches the rabbit first. Thousands of rabbits are brutally killed each year in these events.

I wish to request a legal opinion on this matter from the Department of Agriculture as well as to request that you urge the Department of Justice to issue its opinion as promptly as possible.

Sincerely yours,

BOB DOLE,
U.S. Senator.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be is enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Public Coursing Prevention Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. The Congress finds and declares that public coursing is cruel and inhumane; that dogs which participate in public coursing may compete unfairly in races with dogs which have not participated in public coursing; that the movement, exhibition, sale, purchase, or transportation in intrastate commerce of dogs that have participated in public coursing adversely affects and burdens interstate and foreign commerce; that all animals that are subject to this Act are either in interstate or foreign commerce or substantially affect such commerce; and that, the prohibition of public coursing is appropriate to prevent and eliminate burdens upon commerce and to effectively regulate such commerce.

SEC. 3. For purposes of this Act—

(a) the term "public coursing" means any public event that involves the pursuit by one or more dogs of another live animal used as a visual lure and is conducted in a confined area for purposes of sport, wagering, or entertainment;

(b) the term "animal" means any live dog, bird, cat, rabbit, or other mammal, except man;

(c) the term "State" means any State of the United States, the District of Columbia, Puerto Rico, and any territory or possession of the United States;

(d) the term "interstate instrumentality" means telephone, telegraph, radio, or television operating in interstate or foreign commerce.

SEC. 4. (a) No person shall knowingly sponsor or exhibit an animal in any public coursing.

(b) No person shall knowingly sell, buy, transport, or deliver to another person or receive from another person for purposes of transportation, any dog or other animal for purposes of having the dog or other animal participate in any public coursing, or for purposes of using the dog or other animal as a visual lure in public coursing.

(c) No person shall knowingly use the mail service of the United States Postal Service or any interstate instrumentality for purposes of promoting or in any other manner furthering public coursing.

SEC. 5. Any person who violates the provisions of section 4 of this Act shall be fined not more than $5,000 or imprisoned for not more than one year, or both, for each such violation.

SEC. 6. The Secretary of Agriculture or any other person authorized by the Secretary shall make such investigations as the Secretary deems necessary to determine whether any person has violated or is violating any provision of this Act, and the Secretary may obtain the assistance of the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the Department of the Treasury, or other law enforcement agencies of the United States, and State and local governmental agencies, in the conduct of such investigations, under cooperative agreements with such agencies. A warrant to search for and seize any animal which there is probable cause to believe was involved in any violation of this Act may be issued by any judge of the United States or of a State court of record or by a United States magistrate within the district wherein the animal sought is located. Any United States marshal or any person authorized under this section to conduct investigations may apply for and execute any such warrant, and any animal seized under such a warrant shall be held by the United States marshal or other authorized person pending disposition thereof by the court in accordance with this section. Necessary care including veterinary treatment shall be provided while the animal is so held in custody. Any animal involved in any violation of this Act shall be liable to be proceeded against and forfeited to the United States at any time on complaint filed in any United States district court or other court of the United States for any jurisdiction in which the animal is found and upon a judgment of forfeiture shall be disposed of by sale for lawful purposes or by other humane means, as the court may direct. Costs incurred by the United States for care of animals seized and forfeited under this section shall be recoverable from the owner of the animals if the owner appears in such forfeiture proceeding or in a separate civil action brought in the jurisdiction in which the owner is found, resides, or transacts business.

SEC. 7. Section 3001(a) of Title 39, United States Code, is amended by inserting after "title 18" the following: "section 4 of the Public Coursing Prevention Act".

SENATE RESOLUTION 463—SUBMISSION OF A RESOLUTION WITH RESPECT TO REFUSAL OF U.S. SCIENTISTS TO VISIT THE SOVIET UNION

Mr. DOLE submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 463

Whereas Yuri Orlov, a prominent Soviet scientist, was convicted by the Soviet Union of selling "slanderous material to the West" after a trial in which he was denied the representation of his choice and the right to call witnesses on his own behalf;

Whereas during the trial Orlov's family was harassed and abused by Soviet authorities and Mrs. Orlov was denied the right to visit her husband;

Whereas the entire 19-member delegation of United States scientists to the Sixth Joint U.S.-U.S.S.R. Symposium on Condensed Matter Theory announced on May 20 that they were canceling their scheduled trip to the Soviet Union to participate in the Symposium because of the conviction of Yuri Orlov;

Whereas two prominent scientists, Robert E. Marshak and Nicolaas Bloembergen, also decided to forego visits to the Soviet Union this week; and

Whereas Jewish scientists who have been refused permission to emigrate from the Soviet Union, known as "refuseniks", have lost their jobs, have been forbidden all contact with the scientific community, have been denied access to scientific literature, and have been subjected to severe penalties of imprisonment and banishment, as in the case of Anatoly Scharansky: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that—

(1) the United States should support the action of certain United States scientists in refusing to visit the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics in protest of the conviction of the prominent Soviet scientist Yuri Orlov;

(2) the United States should assume leadership in condemning the violation by the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics of the basic human rights of its scientists and other citizens;

(3) the President should direct the heads of the departments and agencies of the Government to begin an intensive and careful evaluation of international conferences and exchanges of scientists with the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, sponsored by the respective departments and agencies, and such an evaluation should continue until the Government of the Soviet Union expresses its willingness to comply with the human rights provisions of the Helsinki Accords.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate shall transmit a copy of this resolution to the President.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, last week Yuri Orlov, a prominent Soviet scientist whose only crime was to monitor compliance with the Helsinki Final Act, was tried under the charge of selling "slanderous material to the West" and sentenced to the maximum penalty of 7 years in prison and 5 years of internal exile. Throughout his "trial" Yuri Orlov was denied the representation of his choice and the right to call witnesses on his own behalf, making a mockery out of Soviet justice. During his months of imprisonment, Yuri Orlov's family was harassed and abused by Soviet authorities and Mrs. Orlov was denied the right to visit her husband.

In an unprecedented show of protest against the Soviet violations of the most basic human rights and the Soviet parody of legal procedures, all 19 members of an American delegation to a scientific symposium to be held in Moscow from May 22 to May 26, and sponsored by the National Academy of Sciences, canceled Friday, May 19, their scheduled trip to the Soviet Union. In addition to the 19 scientists, Nicolaas Bloembergen, professor of applied physics at Harvard University, and Robert E. Marshak, president of City College of New York, canceled their trips as well. In view of the fact that Mr. Marshak has been well known for his support of Soviet-American exchanges, his decision to forgo the visit ought to be viewed as particularly significant.

The trial of Yuri Orlov has focused attention on the fact that the Helsinki Agreement has had no impact on the plight of many citizens in the Soviet Union. Soviet scientists of Jewish birth who have requested permission to emigrate, and have become known as "refuseniks," have been singled out for "special treatment." They have lost their jobs; they have been forbidden all contact with the scientific community, and they have been denied access to scientific literature. In almost every instance, the "refuseniks" have been denied their right to emigrate, in direct violation of the Helsinki Agreement, which stipulates that "everyone shall be free to leave any country, including his own." More severe penalties of imprisonment, banishment, and house arrest are not unusual, as the case of Anatoly Scharansky clearly indicates. The aim of this policy of repression is to set an example for other scientists contemplating a request for permission to emigrate.

The trial of Yuri Orlov clearly demonstrates what the Soviet Union thinks of the Helsinki Agreement as it applies to "dissidents," or those who do not adhere to officially sanctioned thinking. The Soviet Union's failure to abide by even the most fundamental principles set forth in the Helsinki Agreement is now giving rise to protests from individuals and groups who have, until now, shown reluctance to interfere with matters sometimes considered to be the internal affairs of another nation. The Senator from Kansas concurs with the strong action taken by our scientists and with the view expressed by Mr. Marshak that "the closed trial and inhuman punishment imposed on our high-energy physics colleague, Yuri Orlov, make it impossible for me to attend the seminar in Moscow next week." I feel that it is imperative for the U.S. Senate to not only express support for the position taken by the 21 American scientists, but for the United States to assume leadership in condemning the Soviet Union's utter disregard of basic human rights.

Today I am submitting a resolution calling on the U.S. Senate to express its support for the position taken by the 21 American scientists not to attend the upcoming physics symposium in the Soviet Union. The resolution also calls upon the United States to assume leadership in condemning the Soviet Union's disregard of basic human rights of its scientists and other citizens, and requests that all agencies of the U.S. Government initiate an intensive and careful evaluation of their sponsorship of international conferences and exchanges of scientists with the Soviet Union.

In the next few months, two prominent Soviet scientists, Anatoly Scharansky and Alexander Ginzburg, are scheduled to go on trial for crimes similar to those alleged against Yuri Orlov. I would like to underline a veiled threat made by the president of the National Academy of Sciences, Dr. Philip Handler:

> Should the trials of Ginzburg and Scharansky turn out similarly, Soviet-American scientific relations will have been profoundly damaged.

I call on our own sense of justice and morality not to remain silent witnesses to the Soviets' blatant disregard of established principles of human dignity. Let this expression of revulsion with the Soviet legal system serve as a warning to the Soviet Union that any remnant of international scientific cooperation is, indeed, in jeopardy. Specifically, I call on those agencies of Government sponsoring international conferences and exchanges of scientists to give careful consideration to governmental involvement with those activities until the Soviet Union demonstrates a willingness to abide by the principles asserted in the Helsinki agreement.

A STRONGER NAVAL RESERVE

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas was pleased to learn that the Committee on Armed Services reported the fiscal year 1979 military authorization bill in a fashion that begins to reflect serious concern toward strengthening the defense capabilities of this country. In particular, the Senator from Kansas is pleased with the committee's recommended Naval Reserve strength of 87,000. This is an increase from the 51,400 proposed in the defense budget for fiscal year 1979.

Mr. President, the turmoil in the Naval Reserve has been of much concern to many of us during the past several years. I, for one, have offered amendments in the past 3 years which have averted the proposed cuts by the administration, and I fully intend to take whatever action is needed to prevent this crippling reduction in our Naval Reserve.

Mr. President, the problem surrounding the Naval Reserve issue is not new—we have been fighting this annual Naval Reserve cutback proposal for the past 5 years. When you look at the trend that has developed in the past 5 years, one can see clearly the steady decline. Since 1973 we have seen the Naval Reserve strength steadily decrease from 129,000 to 87,000 billets. For the past 2 years the President's budget has requested a totally inadequate level of 52,100, for fiscal year 1979 the level has decreased even further to 51,400.

In the meantime, the Naval Reserve has remained in a serious state of uncertainty. There is no doubt in this Senator's mind that the combat readiness of the Naval Reserve force has suffered considerably. The Reserves have been proven to be the most cost-effective military asset we have, providing ready military manpower at one-fifth cost of active duty counterpart. This, of course, is not to suggest that we reduce active military strength—we need all our current active strength and probably more, but we need a strong reserve as a backup force.

Naval reservists are to be commended for their dedication in doing their best despite all they have had to go through in the past 5 years.

Mr. President, I take some comfort from the fact that we have at last some recommendations from the committee to increase the Naval Reserve strength, but I also believe that it is time for the Navy and the Naval Reserve to aggressively work together in addressing the new and expanded roles of the Naval Reserve. As I have stated before, the time has come to stop saying, "Let's take it out of defense," and Defense must stop saying, "Let's take it out of the Naval Reserve." I believe that with more coordination, cooperation, and objectivity, we can have a strong, stable, effective, and responsive Naval Reserve.

Mr. President, I commend the committee for its hard work and for what appears to be the beginning of a new attitude toward addressing our overall defense needs and capabilities.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, does the Senator yield?

Mr. DOLE. I am pleased to yield to the distinguished majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Does the Senator yield the floor?

Mr. DOLE. Yes.

ORDERS FOR RECESS UNTIL 9 A.M. TOMORROW AND FRIDAY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that when the Senate completes its business today and tomorrow, it stand in recess, respectively, until the hour of 9 o'clock tomorrow morning and 9 o'clock Friday morning.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LABOR LAW REFORM ACT OF 1978

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the previous order, the Senate will now resume the consideration of the unfinished business, H.R. 8410, which the clerk will report.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

> A bill (H.R. 8410) to amend the National Labor Relations Act to strengthen the remedies and expedite the procedures under such act.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, for over a week, we have heard the views of both the proponents and opponents of H.R. 8410—the House version of S. 2467—which provides for certain changes in existing labor laws. However, we have not had the benefit, thus far, of an up-to-date, reputable public opinion poll which indicates the views of the American people on the pending legislation in particular, and current labor laws in general.

It is for that reason that I am pleased to share with my colleagues the results of a poll just completed. The survey consisted of 1,500 in-home interviews conducted under the direction of Cambridge Reports, Inc., between April 20 and May 15 of this year, at the request of the American Retail Federation.

The survey indicates that, although 45 percent of those polled believe that changes in the existing labor laws are necessary, few support the changes proposed in the pending legislation. Indeed, 65 percent oppose allowing union organizers access to employers' property for the purpose of soliciting votes during an organizing campaign; and 70 percent believe that there should be an adequate waiting period, such as a month, before representation elections are held in order to permit the union and the employer to explain their positions and campaign for support.

Most people—44 percent—feel that existing labor laws already favor labor unions in a dispute—as opposed to 31 percent who feel that the laws favor business—and 50 percent feel that labor unions have more power than businesses. Moreover, 53 percent feel that labor unions have too much power in politics; and by a margin of 57 to 24 percent, they believe that there should be more restrictions on political campaign contributions by labor unions.

In short, "Most Americans feel labor is already powerful enough—if not, indeed, too powerful already," according to the Cambridge research firm. Therefore, Mr. President, it is difficult to understand why the proposed changes in existing labor laws are necessary when a majority of Americans clearly do not favor them.

I think it is essential that we recognize the scope of the proposal we are now considering. The bill before us does not simply "tinker" with the mechanisms used in collective bargaining. Rather, it calls for a major overhaul of the collective-bargaining process and a redesigning of the principal overseer of that process, the National Labor Relations Board.

Any decision of this nature must be compelling and necessary. We cannot afford to adopt new restraints and create new remedies without being totally convinced that damage is being done by the present system. To date, such damage has not been shown.

I listed, in my opening statement, three major areas of concern with this legislation. First, it represents a prime example of the Congress legislating an overly broad solution to an exaggerated problem. Second, it would have a very harmful impact on the small businesses of this Nation. And third, it would result in the destruction of the delicate balance that presently exists between labor and management in the collective-bargaining process. I should like to elaborate on that first point now in greater detail.

The proponents of this bill have asserted two major deficiencies in the present operation of the collective-bargaining process. The first allegation is that the present structure of the NLRB contributes to excessive delays and that these delays deny employees their rights to bargain collectively with management. The second problem centers around the Board's so-called inability to punish recalcitrant employers and willful violators of the NLRA.

But the proponents of this bill are offering proposals which are in no way suited to those tasks. They argue that the ever-increasing number of cases coming before the NLRB mandate that we increase the size of that governing body from five members to seven members in order to allow them to handle additional cases more expeditiously. This idea, however, fails to focus on the proper component of the decisionmaking process. It seeks to increase the number of decisionmakers, as opposed to effectively restructuring the process itself.

In testimony by former NLRB Chairman McCulloch, it was stated that such an expansion of the Board would in no way improve the Board's operation. Furthermore, since there is no provision for allowing an appellate court-type panelization that would utilize a smaller number of Board members, every decision made by a three-member panel—as proposed in this bill—would still have to be cleared by all the nonparticipating Board members before it could be issued as a ruling. Thus, instead of having two additional members who would have to be consulted about the prior decision, four would now be necessary. This could only lengthen the time necessary for decisionmaking, rather than reducing it.

Section III would mandate some reaffirmation of the decision of administrative law judges; and, in S. 2467, it would authorize law clerks for these administrative judges. While these additions may be desirable, there was never any testimony which would indicate their necessity, or how either of these additions would improve the present problem of delays. It would appear that they simply provide a new opportunity for Federal intrusion and would increase the lag time in receiving a final resolution of disputes in collective-bargaining situations.

Section IV requires the Board to establish administrative rules in a variety of areas. This, too, is supposed to streamline the present decisionmaking process. Unfortunately, codification of the present law will not expedite representation procedures. The delays that exist under the present system lie not in identifying the appropriate considerations for each case, but rather in applying those considerations to the individual case at hand. All that such codification would do to the system is create litigation when the Board decides to deviate from a ruling which does not apply to a particular case.

Section V of the bill would change section 9(b) of the NLRA, which at present provides that any union representing nonguard employees shall not be certified as a representative of guards. This provision of the law exists to insure that, during a labor dispute, the employer would be certain that his security guards were loyal to him. But, under the bill, this would no longer be the case.

I fail to see the correlation between this section and the arguments that we need to remove delays in the election process. Rather, it appears simply to be an attempt to eliminate a very important portion of the present Labor Relations Act that provides protection for employers. It is one of many "mystery" provisions I have found in the bill which have no nexus to the objectives listed for this legislation.

Section VI reasserts the necessity for expeditious elections. Although this objective has been stated repeatedly since the debate began, the delays which this section seeks to remedy simply have not occurred. In fiscal year 1977 I am told that 77 percent of the 14,399 election cases filed with the Board were conducted by agreement with the parties without formal hearings or contested decisions. Elections were held within a median of 37 to 44 days after filing of the petitions. Even in those cases that were contested, the median time was only 75 days.

I am convinced that the changes proposed in this bill would seriously undermine the most critical element in the present collective-bargaining process; for example, voluntary election agreements. It will result in extensive post-election proceedings which would impede commencement of bargaining far more than any existing preelection delays.

The same is true when one looks at unfair labor practices charges. The vast majority of these charges are simply lacking in merit. For example, in 1976, of all charges filed with the Board, 35.6 percent were withdrawn before any complaint was issued; and 35.9 percent were dismissed before a complaint was issued. In other words, a total of 71.5 percent of the charges filed with the Board are disposed of because there is absolutely no merit to the charge. Moreover, in the remaining 23.4 percent of the cases, a settlement or a judgment was reached prior to the filing of a complaint with the Board. Thus, only about 5 percent of the ULP's were left for disposition by the Board.

In view of these statistics which indicate the effectiveness of existing procedures, I cannot see the necessity for section IX of the bill. That section imposes severe penalties upon employers for violation of the NLRA when only a tiny percentage now fall into that category.

In effect, the proponents are recommending that a sword be held over the head of the vast majority of employers who abide willingly by the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act. The facts simply do not support either the necessity or the rationale for such a strong step.

The case most often cited as evidence of the need for this bill involves the J. P. Stevens Co. But the scope of the solution proposed far exceeds the extent of the problems illustrated by the J. P. Stevens Co. Indeed, some have suggested that H.R. 8410 should be redrafted in the form of a private relief bill. At the risk of prejudicing the J. P. Stevens Co.'s case, I might even consider that, but this should not be a bill designed to accommodate one difficult labor relations situation.

My point is not to belittle the motives of the authors of this bill, but rather to suggest that they have seized upon an isolated case and grossly exaggerated the necessity for a comprehensive solution.

There are other provisions of the bill which appear less controversial. They include automatic enforcement of Board orders, mandatory injunctions in discharge cases, provisions for individuals with religious convictions, injunctive relief against sympathy wildcat and stranger picketing. However, they all tend to obscure the primary thrust of this legislation, which is to provide the unions greater leverage in both organizing and penalizing a variety of business establishments.

As I stated last week, I have always supported the collective bargaining process and my position on this bill does not alter that. However, the condition upon which that support rests is the preservation of the precarious, but essential balance between labor and management.

I believe that the results of the national opinion poll which I cited earlier indicate a majority of Americans think a balance between labor and management is necessary. However, they are concerned that that balance is now in jeopardy of being tipped in favor of one side against the other.

I share that deep concern and reiterate my view that this bill would destroy the equilibrium that has been sought for the past four decades. Therefore, I urge my colleagues to stand firm in demanding the defeat of this unnecessary legislation.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, once employees have decided that they are interested in union representation, our laws should provide them the opportunity to make that choice promptly in a free and noncoerced manner.

Similarly, once they have voted in a free and fair election, that they desire union representation, our laws should provide them with the opportunity to bargain with their employer within a reasonable time.

Current law promotes the kind of bureaucratic nightmare that only frustrates the legitimate desires of workers.

The case of Linda Leroy and her fellow workers is but one example:

WHY AMERICA'S WORKERS NEED LABOR LAW REFORM: CHAPTER 6

Linda Leroy is an employee of the Kustom Electronics Company in Chanute, Kansas. Linda and her fellow workers became interested in having the Communication Workers of America represent them in collective bargaining.

By December 9, 1974, more than half the production and maintenance workers in the plant had signed cards, and on that date, the Communication Workers filed a petition for an election with the regional office of the National Labor Relations Board. A few days later, the company laid off more than 40 employees.

Two issues immediately developed: Whether the production and maintenance unit sought by the union was "appropriate" and whether the employees who had been laid off were eligible to vote in the election. After a series of informal and formal conferences on these issues; the National Labor Relations Board issued its direction of election on April 7, 1975.

After being twice postponed, the election was finally held on June 18, 1975.

Seventy-five votes were cast for the union, 68 votes were cast against the union. There was 1 void ballot, and there were 47 challenged ballots. Most of the challenged ballots were cast by the laid-off employees.

The employer filed objections to the election. Five months later, on November 20, 1975, the regional director concluded that the objections and challenges raised material issues of fact, and ordered a hearing. More than six months after that, on May 7, 1976, the hearing officer issued his report. He recommended that the objections be overruled. The hearing officer also concluded that the 36 laid-off employees who had cast challenged ballots had a reasonable expectation of being recalled and that their ballots should be counted.

The company appealed these recommendations to the Board, and Linda Leroy and her fellow workers waited five more months for the Board to decide. On October 15, 1976, the Board adopted the hearing officer's recommendations and findings.

On October 22, 1976, 22 months after the petition was filed, and 16 months after the election was held, the 39 challenged ballots were opened and counted. The total vote was 103 for the union, 79 against the union, and 1 void ballot. The union had won before all of this bureaucratic procedure, and the union was still the winner after all of the bureaucratic procedure had ended.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am sure Linda Leroy and her fellow workers breathed a sigh of relief that their long period of uncertainty was over, and that, at last, their employer would sit down and negotiate with their union. The union sent the employer a letter, requesting bargaining, on November 3, 1976. It sent another letter on November 16. It sent another letter on November 19. On November 24, the union received a letter from the company stating refusal to bargain and alleging that the union did not represent an uncoerced majority and that it had been improperly certified.

On December 2, 1976, the union filed an unfair labor practice charge, alleging that the company was refusing to bargain in good faith.

On July 27, 1977, more than 2½ years after the petition was filed, the Board issued its decision, finding once again that the challenged ballots had properly been counted. The Board again ordered the company to bargain in good faith.

Mr. President, whether the challenged ballots were counted or not, the union was still the winner of the election. Yet, at the company's urging, the Board spent more than 2 years deciding and redeciding the question of the challenged ballots.

Thus, the employer was able to tie up the Board and delay bargaining for more than 2 years over an issue which, in a practical sense, was moot. The union had won the election whether or not the challenged ballots were counted.

During these 2½ years of dilatory tactics, Linda Leroy and her fellow employees were not enjoying the benefits of collective bargaining and union representation.

This case is now pending before the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit, and Kustom Electronics still will not bargain collectively with its employees.

Mr. President, current law permits unconscionable bureaucratic delays in resolving these issues. It is now nearly 3½ years since the petition, supported by a majority of employees in the unit, was filed. It is nearly 3 years since the union won the election. The employer is still not bargaining with the union.

If labor law reform had been enacted, the election would have been promptly held. The challenges and objections would have been resolved after the election in an expeditious manner, and the employer would have been discouraged from raising and reraising the question of whether the laid-off employees should have voted—a clearly frivolous question, when we consider that it makes no difference in determining the election outcome.

Mr. President, how long can we continue under a law which rewards those who would raise and reraise frivolous contentions? It costs the employer nothing to delay under current law. Under 8410's make-whole remedy, this would not be the case. But now, it costs Linda Leroy and her fellow workers a great deal.

Mr. President, it is cases like Linda Leroy's that labor law reform is all about.

There is a persistent statement here by those who oppose this legislation that this bill is addressed singly and solely to the J. P. Stevens case. This is an employer out in Kansas, employing about 200 people. It is a classic case of what is wrong with procedures, remedies, opportunities for fair disposition under the law as it is. Here is a 200-employee employer who wanted not only to delay the whole election result for 3 years but still is not in there bargaining. The law has said for 42 years, if there is an election and the union wins, then there shall be bargaining. They still are not bargaining with the duly elected, finally certified union in Kustom Electronics in the State of Kansas.

Mr. President, on May 7, 1978, the Cleveland Plain Dealer, in an editorial, urged enactment of the labor law reform bill. The newspaper said that "The record clearly justifies changes" to our current law. The Plain Dealer said:

The changes are needed and would help even out a system that has become over balanced against workers. Employers with reasonable employee practices would not be hurt.

The Plain Dealer predicted in its editorial, which was printed before our debate started, that opponents "will try to filibuster or amend it to death." They were prophetic.

While our extended debate has not yet become a filibuster, the Plain Dealer has its views on the subject. It says that such a filbuster would give Senators a firsthand lesson on "Why a great many people approve" this legislation. The editorial said:

It is just those kinds of actions in labor-management relations—stalling tactics and endless litigation—that spawned the so-called labor reform legislation.

A May 17, 1978, editorial of the Minneapolis Star also supports this legislation, the Star noted some of the fears which have been expressed here, and gave its opinions:

. . . It is doubtful, as management spokesman maintain, that [the bill] would force open the plant gates to a horde of labor organizers.

We do not believe the bill, if passed, will mean the forced unionization of American business and industry. It could mean an end, however, to the practice by some companies of using legal maneuvers to delay union representation elections, sometimes for years.

The Star concluded:

We can anticipate more emotional overkill as the debate progresses. But we hope that when the Senate finally gets to vote on the merits of the bill, it will approve it as an adjustment to a law that hasn't been working too well.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the editorials of the Minneapolis Star and the Cleveland Plain Dealer be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorials were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Plain Dealer, May 7, 1978]

ENACT LABOR LAW CHANGES

Senators who favor or have yet to decide about revision of the nation's labor laws are about to get a lesson in why a great many people approve of the changes.

Opponents of the legislation are pulling out all of the stops to prevent its getting to the Senate floor. If backers are able to convince Senate Majority Leader Robert C. Byrd, D-W. Va., to schedule the bill—an action not at all presently assured—those against it will try to filibuster or amend it to death.

It is just those kinds of actions in labor-management relations—stalling tactics and endless litigation—that spawned the so-called labor law reform legislation.

We endorsed the bill, now called S. 2467, last August and applauded the House for having approved it, 257–163, in October. We denounce artifices and dodges designed to sink it now.

Opponents of the bill rightly perceived that their best chance to ambush it lay in the Senate. There, senators from smaller and/or less industrialized states might be expected to be unsympathetic with its aims. And, of course, their power is enhanced because in the Senate each state has only two votes regardless of population.

The legislation is backed by the Carter administration and by the AFL–CIO. Employer groups bitterly opposed to the changes are fond of referring to those who come down on the side of reform as labor dupes.

But a study of the record since the National Labor Relations Act was passed in 1935 shows good reasons for amendment.

We believe that record clearly justifies changes, among others, that would shorten the sometimes interminable time period between petitioning for union representation and an election; return to their jobs employees fired for union activities; compensate workers for wages lost when employers refuse to bargain with legally certified representatives; impose financial penalties on employers who violate labor laws during a period of union organizing; bar federal contracts for a specified period to companies that willfully and repeatedly violate labor laws.

The changes are needed and would help even out a system that has become overbalanced against workers. Employers with reasonable employee practices and policies would not be hurt.

The Senate should not allow itself to be bullied. The legislation should be scheduled. It should be enacted.

[From the Minneapolis Star, May 17, 1978]

TOO MUCH ADO ABOUT LABOR

Supporters and opponents of the labor law reform measure, now before the Senate, are guilty of overkill. They have brought out some of their heaviest guns in years, and have spent millions of dollars in lobbying and propaganda efforts for and against the measure.

Union lobbyists see the bill as an effort to strengthen the 43-year-old Wagner Act and end a "pattern of employer abuse" of the National Labor Relations Board procedures. It is charged, with considerable emotion, that those abuses have caused "massive frustration and denial" of workers' rights to choose or reject participation in collective bargaining.

The bill would clearly benefit unions, but it is doubtful, as management spokesmen maintain, that it would force open the plant gates to a horde of labor organizers. It is doubtful, too, that the legislation will put the government in the role of forcing businesses to organize, as the bill's critics charge. Among those most fearful of the legislation are small businessmen, who believe the measure would give unions an unfair advantage over their efforts to resist organizing attempts. Small businessmen may indeed be vulnerable to organizers, since they can't afford to hire the lawyers to assert their interests.

We do not believe the bill, if passed, will mean the forced unionization of American business and industry. It could mean an end, however, to the practice by some companies of using legal maneuvers to delay union representation elections, sometimes for years. The measure does not create a new labor policy; rather, it seeks to reform, and make more workable, the policy on labor-management relations that was enunciated in the Wagner Act. That policy has not been working properly. The NLRB has permitted cases charging labor law violations to pile up at an alarming rate. It also has been lax in its scheduling of union representation elections.

The reform bill, endorsed by President Carter and passed by the House, is being held up by what could be a lengthy filibuster in the Senate. We anticipate more emotional overkill as the debate progresses. But we hope that when the Senate finally gets to vote on the merits of the bill, it will approve it as an adjustment to a law that hasn't been working too well.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I yield the floor.

Mr. HATCH. Madam President, earlier this morning, the Senate minority leader released to the news media several public opinion polls on the labor law reform. One poll was conducted by Cambridge Reports, Inc., owned by Mr. Patrick Caddell, President Carter's pollster. There is nothing new about the result of the survey. One poll by the Opinion Research Corp. of Princeton, N.J., said that the people in this country do not want Congress to give the powers contained in the labor law reform bill to organized labor.

The Cambridge poll was based on personal, in-home interviews of a sample of 1,500 adult Americans and was designed to reflect the views of the whole adult population of the United States. It was completed just over 1 week ago by trained professional interviewers under the supervision of the Cambridge Reports field staff.

I might add it was completed after tremendous intensive lobbying by the leaders of organized labor in our country among their rank and file workers all over the country, in almost a daily press release or a daily release to their workers, that this bill is in their best interests. The fact of the matter is that the vast majority of people in this country do not believe that this bill is in the best interests of either union or nonunion men and women alike.

I might mention, also, that the fact of the matter is that when we hear on the floor of the Senate, Why is the minority thwarting the will of the majority with regard to this extended debate? I should like to rephrase that question. We in the minority, or at least allegedly the minority, who are conducting this extended debate, actually represent the vast majority of all the people in our country. So who is thwarting the will of the majority? I think the majority of the people in the country are a lot more important than maybe a majority of just the Members of the U.S. Senate.

Ordinarily, in this representative form of democracy, the representatives of the people, the U.S. Senators and Congressmen, should do everything they can to represent the people themselves.

That is really what one of the problems is here. The real will of the majority, the majority of all American citizens, including union members as well as nonunion members, is being supported by a minority in the Senate itself, and those of us who are arguing in this extended debate for a reason and for consideration of needs of small business and employees throughout this country actually represent the vast majority of all people in the country.

I think it is pretty dramatic to look at these polls and realize just how serious they are and how very much they go against the arguments being made by the proponents of this legislation and how they are bucking against the tide with regard to this legislation.

I think the distinguished minority leader (Mr. BAKER) has done us all a great favor by releasing this poll which should be disseminated all over America today. I think it is a pretty important and dramatic poll.

I wonder if I can ask the distinguished minority leader just a couple of questions. He is aware, the first question was, "Congress is currently considering a labor law reform act that would change the laws that govern labor unions, management, and employee rights. Do you think the current labor laws need changes or not?"

And 45 percent of the people who answered said, "Yes," the current labor laws do need changes. Thirty-four percent were not sure. Twenty-one percent said, "No."

I would like to ask the distinguished minority leader what the significance is of that particular question and the answers shown by Mr. Caddell and the Cambridge association.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator for putting the question and I think it is an appropriate one for the Caddell firm to put first in their survey.

The significance to me is that while it is true that 45 percent of Americans think there should be changes in the labor law, which is far and away the biggest percentage, the changes that they then express are not the changes suggested by this bill. The reforms they most often want point toward a reduction in the ability of unions to organize in other fields, rather than increase in their power in that respect.

The second most mentioned item by those respondents who thought there should be changes in the labor law had to do with a desire for more controls on strikes, which is really rather remarkable considering that this bill would, I think, substantially expand the authority, ability, and opportunity for unions to organize and to conduct their strikes and their negotiations on company time.

Mr. HATCH. With regard to that point, as I understand it, this poll brings out the public sentiments with regard to having secret ballots, whether or not a strike should be conducted. Can the distinguished Senator from Tennessee give us any enlightenment on that?

Mr. BAKER. That is correct.

As a matter of fact, I do not readily have the page reference at hand, but the report shows, I believe, that 79 percent of those interviewed indicated that a secret ballot should be held on whether or not a strike should be called.

Mr. HATCH. The Senator is correct. On page 7 of the poll, in response to the question, "Some people say that before a union strikes a secret ballot should be held among all members to see whether they want a strike or not. Would you favor or oppose this idea?" and 79 percent of them said "yes" and only 8 percent were opposed.

Mr. BAKER. Will the Senator yield for a brief moment in that respect?

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. BAKER. It seems to me these questions are put in several variations, apparently to elucidate a cross section of the viewpoints and ideas in rather great depth.

I might point out, as the distinguished Senator from Utah knows, that I had nothing to do with the formulation of these questions and I am sure no one else on this bill did.

The question is often put, "Well, you know, if you frame a question a particular way, you can get the answer you want."

But I really doubt that anybody would seriously contend that Pat Caddell is a Republican pollster—if there is such a thing—or challenge that his is a reputable polling organization.

The Cambridge Reports is a reliable national firm that would not conduct a poll other than to try to produce a reliable and accurate profile of public opinion. So when responses of that sort are elucidated by this rather in-depth survey, I believe they become more important if one considers the reliability, the affiliations, and clients of this particular pollster.

Mr. HATCH. It is pretty tough to argue with a question such as, "some people say that before a union strikes a secret ballot should be held among all members to see whether they want a strike or not. Would you favor or oppose this idea?"

That is a pretty fair question, I would say.

It would be interesting for the distinguished minority leader to note that the Opinion Research Corp. report poll has been vastly ignored by the other side in this matter, and on this particular question the Caddell poll showed that 79 percent of the people polled want secret ballots with regard to the determination of a strike.

The Opinion Research poll shows 81 percent—in other words, 2 percent difference, but right in the same ball park—incidentally, among union members, the difference between the Caddell poll and the Opinion Research poll is that among union members the Opinion Research came to a conclusion there and 79 percent of union members would like to have a secret ballot with regard to strike votes.

Mr. BAKER. I do not know what that is in the sample opinion under nationwide, but nationwide, even with a sample of that size, which is very large and costly as the Senator knows, the margin for error is probably plus or minus 2 or 3 percent.

So it is remarkable the two polls should be within that range of the margin of error. I would say the two reports were virtually identical.

Mr. HATCH. Is the distinguished Senator from Tennessee aware that one of the points we had in our employee bill of rights, which did not come out of the Human Resources Committee, it did take two minor points, which we were grateful for in this bill, but one of the major points we made in the Bill of Rights Act that we found was that there should be secret ballots with regard to strikes.

I wonder if the distinguished Senator from Tennessee was aware of that?

Mr. BAKER. I am aware of that. I think it is an extraordinarily important matter.

Few things are more important than the concept of peer pressure. The very idea of secret ballots, whether it is in the election of Federal officers or local officials in the general political realm, or the expression of private and discreet opinions in the private realm, is the cornerstone of representative government in this Republic.

It seems to be virtually indefensible and unconscionable that the same protection should not be extended to union members who wish to express a matter of the most fundamental economic and social importance to them—that is, as to whether or not there should be a strike in their place of business.

Mr. HATCH. One of the gripes many people seem to have about this bill across the country—and I have spoken all across the country concerning this bill—is that the big leaders in Washington make the decisions for the little working people all over this country. Sometimes they are not what the working people want, and this seems to bear them out.

With regard to the first point of the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, that 45 percent of the people polled versus 34 percent think that the current labor laws should be changed and that the changes should be curtailment of union power and labor power, it is interesting that in the Caddell poll, with regard to "What kind of changes do you think are needed?" 28 percent said, "Unions have too much power, unions are too strong, and unions want to take over."

In the Opinion Research poll, among the public at large, 63 percent of the people felt that way.

Incidentally, the 28 percent was the largest single percentage in the Caddell poll, which shows a definite correlation. But in the Opinion Research poll, among union members, 51 percent of those polled indicate that they feel their unions have too much power today and that they are too strong and that they do want to take over this country and control it.

I think that is a pretty important point that the distinguished Senator has brought up.

One of the questions that was asked was this:

> One possible change in the labor law being considered would make it easier for unions to recruit new members in companies where they are not currently represented. Do you think this change is needed or not?

Forty-one percent of those polled, versus 33 percent, said they did not think this change was needed. In the Opinion Research poll, it was 40 percent versus 22 percent. In other words, it was pretty correlated. The Opinion Research poll was taken a number of months ago.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield on that point, on the question of whether or not this poll was a good poll and approaches the task of establishing a national profile on the issues involved, I invite the Senator's attention to the pair of questions on page 4 of the Cambridge Report. The Senator has just quoted from the first one and the results. The second one is interesting to me because it is the hallmark of a conscientious polling organization—that is, to try to have more than one point of view.

It says:

> When we asked the question slightly differently at another point in the questioning, we found an even larger margin of rejection.
> "In general, do you think the rules by which unions gain the right to represent employees need to be made easier for the unions or not?"

Then the numbers change to yes 22 percent and no 48 percent.

Mr. HATCH. Better than 2 to 1.

Mr. BAKER. I invite the Senator's attention to two points. The first I have made already—that Cambridge reports follows a traditional and accepted practice of approaching an important question from two directions, with two different questions, so that they can differentiate and query and establish a better point of view. The second one is that they put the second question at a different point in the survey.

I am told that in a personal interview, for polling purposes, a certain momentum develops, and there sometimes is an unconscious tendency of the respondent to try to answer in a way that is pleasing to the interrogator. That idea sounds fairly exotic to me, but I have been told that is true.

Mr. Caddell satisfies even that principle. He approach the question from two vantage points and at two different times in the interview. This technique adds credibility in the sense that he is following the accepted norm.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator for pointing that out.

With regard to the first question, as to whether it should be made easier for unions to recruit new members, the Caddell poll says the "no's" were 41 percent, versus 33 percent. The Opinion Research poll of the general public was 40 to 22 percent.

It is interesting to look at the Opinion Research poll of union members. With regard to union members, it was 48 percent "no" but exactly the same "yes"—33 percent. This would lead one to believe that perhaps the Caddell poll was reaching a number of union members. It is just an interesting correlation.

With regard to the equal access provision of this labor law reform bill, if the employer talks about unionization on his premises, on his time, and at his expense, he would have to open up his premises, at his expense and on his time, and let the organizers come on the premises and preach unionism to his employees. In essence, he would subsidize the unionization of his own plant, which we feel is unfair.

Is there anything in the Caddell poll which indicates how the people who were polled felt with regard to the equal access provison?

Mr. BAKER. I think there is a very logical and sound approach to that question. That is one of the most important questions to many people in this entire debate, because it deals with several fundamental rights and several aspects of concern—and in some cases emotionalism—about their respective rights.

I have studied very carefully the nature of that questioning, and I reiterate for our colleagues what the distinguished Senator from Utah already knows—that is, we have had absolutely nothing to do with the formulation of these questions. They were prepared professionally, by a reputable polling operation. The question posed was this:

One possible change in the labor law would allow labor union organizers to go onto the property of businesses at any time, including working time, and try to recruit members. Do you favor or oppose this idea?

The results are a little short of startling. Those who favor it are 17 percent. Those who oppose it are 65 percent. Eighteen percent, which is a fairly small number, do not know or have no opinion.

I think that result is important in several aspects. The disparity in numbers is significant. That is an overwhelming number in opposition to the idea. But the relatively small size of those who do not know is important.

What this means to me is that people have strong views on this subject, and there are not many middle men—that is, most people say they should or should not, and the overwhelming number say they should not.

So this is one question I think was addressed in a meaningful way and an important way in the Cambridge report.

By the way, this question appears on page 5 of the report, together with the explanatory language, both before and after the question, which I commend to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. I think that is interesting. It shows that the people of this country are pretty upset about this equal access provision.

Mr. BAKER. I think they are upset, and they should be, because I believe it strikes a responsive chord—that is, the basic, fundamental, equitable question of fairness. What is fair?

I doubt if there is a Member in this body who feels—certainly, I do not feel—that there should be a bias against organizational activity. I said on the first day of this debate, in the first speech of this debate, that I think one of the most fundamental tenets of the free enterprise, personal initiative system that we have nurtured and elaborated in the United States is the opportunity to have fair ballots between management and labor, between unions and companies.

I think that the overwhelming majority of people in this country feel that that fairness, that balance of equity between the two sides, is essential for the collective-bargaining process. Indeed, and, in fact, it is the very essence of the collective-bargaining process.

This provision of the bill, I believe, impresses people very forcefully; and they do recognize it as an assault on that equity, and arrangement of equality between management and labor.

I believe one of the most fundamental concepts of the American political system has been the most understated—I speak now of political in the competitive sense, as Republican and Democrat politics. I sincerely believe that Americans do not want to see our great national debates polarized on labor-management, conservative-liberal grounds; but, rather, they want fairness and equity. Nobody wants to see this bill or the collective-bargaining process degenerate into an antilabor/prolabor, or antibusiness/probusiness bias which tilts or shifts that essential balance between the two parties.

So this particular question, it seems to me, strikes a responsive chord, and I am not surprised by the overwhelming nature of this result.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator for the comment because I feel exactly the same way the distinguished Senator from Tennessee does. Having been raised in the union movement, I hate to see the unions subjected to a tilt against them. I do not think that would be right. Of course, some of the proponents of this bill would have you believe that because there are some exceptions, there are some abuses on management side, and very seldom are the abuses on labor's side mentioned, this bill is only a little modest bill that will correct those abuses, but this shows that the people in this country are not buying that particular argument, that they know that this bill has a lot more in it than just the modest correction of, say, one, five, or six, which has been mentioned in front of our committee, major corporation abuses, and yet hardly anything is directed toward the abuses that labor performed. In other words, these are some of the problems we are trying to fight on, and I agree with the distinguished Senator that this should never devolve into a pro-union/anti-business, pro-business/anti-union approach. We should be talking about this on the merits of what is fair, equitable, and create a good balance.

Mr. BAKER. And we do not try to shift that essential balance which already exists in labor and management.

Mr. President, I thank the Senator for yielding. I have a commitment I have to keep away from the floor now, and I have taken more time than I probably should have. I wish to return later in the day if I might to continue the debate.

Mr. HATCH. I shall be delighted.

Mr. BAKER. I thank the Senator for yielding.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the distinguished Senator from Tennessee because I think the colloquy has been useful in helping me to understand this poll and certainly hopefully to help our colleagues and members of the public to understand it as well.

There is one thing that caused a great deal of concern, as I have read this poll cursorily, among those who were polled, and Mr. Caddell writes upon it with regard to union political power. He says one other controvery about labor unions is their involvement in politics. When asked about this we find that most Americans feel labor unions have too much power over politics and that it should be restricted. In other words, that power should be restricted, I take it.

The first question they asked under that heading was do you think labor unions have too much political power, too little political power, or do they have about the right amount of power?

It is interesting to note that of those polled 53 percent felt they had too much power, only 7 percent thought they had too little power, about 25 percent thought they had about the right amount of power, and 15 percent said they did not know. In other words, a better than 2-to-1 ratio, or at least what appears to be a 2-to-1 ratio of the people polled indicated that they felt that the labor unions have too much power under present law as contrasted to about the right amount.

What is interesting is that in the Opinion Research poll of the general public, 56 percent of the people said there was too much power, and 25 percent said it was about right. Twelve percent under the opinion research poll said the power was too little in the labor unions and 7 percent said they do not know.

So the correlation is quite startling.

With regard to the union members, under the Opinion Research poll 43 percent of the union members felt that the labor unions have too much power under our present political system and laws, 26 percent thought that they have too little as contrasted to 7 percent in the Caddell and 12 percent of the general public, and 27 percent of the union members thought that the power was about right, or 2 percent higher than both the Caddell and the Opinion Research general public poll.

I think these are startling correlations, and I commend this particular study to those who are seriously considering this matter to show that along with Opinion Research poll, and I think any other poll conducted in this area, those of us who are conducting this extended debate and talking about the serious problems that we have in our society literally represent the majority and the vast majority of the people in this country in fighting against this bill and, therefore, it is not some small insignificant minority which is threatening or thwarting the will of the majority.

I would say that we represent the vast majority and, therefore, have every right to fight this with everything that we can.

Incidentally, it has been interesting for me to see an occasional press release read into the RECORD by the proponents of the bill. I might mention that we have around 1,200 press releases across this country against this bill by newspapers all over the country in every State in the Union. It runs about 3 to 1 against the bill to those that are in favor of the bill. I think that is a pretty important point to be making here today.

If it became necessary, we could read every one of these editorials into the RECORD as the one or two per day that are being read into the RECORD by the proponents of the bill.

Yes, there are those who are for this bill in the newspapers but the overwhelmingly number of editorials written in this country are against this bill and there is very good reason for that. The reason is that the people in this country are sick and tired of having bills labeled "reform" bills which have no relationship to reform and which really become anything but reform bills. The problem with this bill is, as pointed out by the distinguished minority leader, that this particular bill tilts the balance drastically in favor of labor and labor organizations here in Washington, which may or may not represent and I think under these circumstances do not really represent the vast majority of their members let alone of the vast majority of the people in this country.

Incidentally, the American Newspaper Publishers Association sent a letter to all Senators. This is the American Newspaper Publishers Association. This went to all Senators, as I understand it.

DEAR SENATOR: The American Newspaper Publishers Association believes that many provisions of S. 2467, the "Labor Law Reform Act," would have a severe, adverse impact on newspaper operations. These provisions are of special concern to ANPA because a stable labor environment is an inherent part of the ability of a newspaper to publish regularly and, in turn, to be a free society's forum for the free expression of ideas.

ANPA is a trade association of newspapers whose 1286 members represent more than 91 percent of daily and Sunday newspaper circulation in the United States. Several non-dailies also are members.

Attached is a sampling of editorials from newspapers across the country that have studied this bill and concluded, as ANPA has, that S. 2467 would help neither employers nor employees. The sole benefactors of this special interest legislation would be the labor unions.

S. 2467 would give unwarranted and inequitable power to labor unions during organizational campaigns; deprive employers of important rights of free speech; deprive employees of an ample opportunity to make their own decisions whether or not to be represented by labor organizations; unfairly punish many employers for technical and esoteric violations of labor law; and foster the very litigation and delay which the authors of the bill wish to remedy. On this latter point, the general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board estimates his office alone would need an additional $28 million and 900 more staffers to handle the surge in litigation the legislation would cause.

ANPA asks that you carefully consider the provisions of this bill and their obvious bias; that you consider the public opposition to the bill evident in the preponderance of newspaper editorials and the results of numerous public opinion surveys; that you consider the litigation explosion, the new bureaucracy and the taxpayer cost this bill would initiate; and, based on these considerations, that you oppose S. 2467 when it comes before the Senate.

Sincerely,

JERRY W. FRIEDHEIM.

I might mention that it is very rare that the American Newspaper Publishers Association comes out for or against any particular issue.

Generally, those matters are left to the editorial boards of the respective newspapers. But here they have taken occasion, representing 91 percent of daily and Sunday newspaper circulation in the United States, to particularly put their viewpoint in writing to every Senator of the U.S. Senate.

We may have some isolated editorials read into the RECORD by the proponents of this bill. But do not let anybody be deceived. We could inundate the RECORD with editorials against this bill and against the reprehensible thrust of this bill.

I might also add that the National Newspaper Association wrote a letter to every U.S. Senator. This is an interesting letter, because the National Newspaper Association, they go on to say:

Urges you to examine the attached compilation of editorials which have appeared in newspapers throughout America opposing passage of S. 2467, the so-called "Labor Law Reform Act."

We realize that, already, no single piece of legislation has ever generated as much mail, and that you may feel no need to read additional material. But you should study these editorials, for they present—in capsule form—comment on this vital issue from all sectors of our nation. Nowhere will you find a more accurate barometer of public opinion.

NNA is an organization of some 5,500 weekly and 900 small city daily newspapers with members in all 50 states. NNA itself has taken a formal position opposing passage of S. 2437.

We take this position, quite simply, because the bill is blatantly unfair and totally one-sided in its approach to "reform." From its "packing" of the NLRB, to its "quickie" elections, to its "equal" access, to its cruelly punitive sanctions, the bill is clearly an injustice—designed by its writers to accomplish one goal: halt and reverse the downward slide of union membership.

We fear especially S. 2657's effect on the typical NNA member: the small independent newspaper. Small business in general is obviously the primary target of this legislation. No bargaining unit will be too small or too difficult to organize. Small businessmen with little knowledge of labor law or union tactics, and with no access to experienced labor attorneys, are going to be viewed by organizers as easy prey. Our members—the small independent newspapers—will be no exception.

Please take the time to consider our views—and the views expressed in these editorials—and then vote against passage of S. 2437.

Here are the National Newspaper Association and the American Newspaper Publishers Association telling us to vote against this bill. I might add it is even more significant if we understand that very seldom do the national newspaper organizations ever come out against any piece of legislation as a national situation. That gives even greater credibility to the fact that what we are fighting for here is not only small business, which will be drastically hurt, but for the vast majority of all people in this country, and I am pleased that both the Caddell and the Opinion Research polls have been presented so that we understand really what is involved here. So nobody has to be deceived.

When we hear this business of "a small minority thwarting the will of the majority," because it is believed that 51 or more U.S. Senators will vote in favor of this bill, that has got to be one of the most one-sided, blatant, hypocritical comments ever made on legislation before the Senate, because the fact of the matter is that those of us who are fighting for this country's very existence, the fabric upon which this country is built, the free enterprise basis that has made this country the greatest in the world, represent the majority, and the majority's will across this country may very well be threatened and thwarted, if you will, by what happens to be a minority of maybe more than 50 Senators in the U.S. Senate.

I submit if we voted on this bill by secret ballot so that neither the employer community nor the labor community knew which way we were going, this bill would be shot down by an overwhelming margin which, I think, would approximate the margin nationally in the Caddell and Opinion Research polls.

In other words, we hear a lot about special interests in the Senate and, generally, it is directed against the big corporations and the big oil companies—and I think there is some justification for those criticisms—but never against the Washington labor union leaders who, I think, ignore the wishes and the needs in many ways of a lot of my fellow union men out there in the field, out there in the shops, out there in the manufacturing facilities; yes, even in newspapers, if you will, in their zeal to control this country and to control the workplace in this country, even though only one out of five persons in our country belongs to an organized labor organization.

When you think about it, it is pretty tough in my eyes for anybody to really legitimately argue that this bill deserves to be passed. I think the logic, the facts, the editorials, if you will, the law, the past circumstances, the statistics, the Board statistics, if you will, all militate against this bill.

Yet we hear consistently on the floor that this is just a modest bill. Why, it is only to get at those few companies that have breached the labor laws. Why should we be so upset and concerned with this "reform" bill?

All I can say is that any time the Senate or the Congress puts the word "reform" on a piece of legislation then everybody in this country ought to immediately get upset and realize that it is very likely not going to be a true reform bill but something that promulgates and reinforces special interests in our society.

There is no more powerful special interest in our society than those who run our labor organizations from Washington, D.C. That is why 51 percent of the labor union members themselves, my fellow labor union members, believe that no further power should be lodged in the hands of this great special interest group here in Washington.

I might add that I think I would fight just as strongly to make sure that the powers are not tilted in the other direction. I do not want to see business given a clear edge in its negotiations with labor. I think they should be equal. I think they both ought to have a fair shot at negotiation for their respective sides.

In this morning's Washington Post there was a very interesting advertisement, especially coming on the heels of the last part of yesterday's debate. It is entitled "Let Small Business Speak for Itself: A Rebuttal to George Meany And Other Advocates of 'Labor Law Reform' Legislation From NFIB," the National Federation of Independent Business, the largest small business organization in the country today.

The article goes on to say:

Within the past few weeks, small business has been pictured in big labor, union-sponsored national advertising as a smokesscreen for big business and as a victim of a shell game in the current debate over labor law "reform". The National Federation of Independent Business (NFIB), the nation's largest small business organization, with more than one-half million members, wishes to refute this myth.

Small business has every reason to be wary of big labor's designs. Small business is labor intensive. It depends more upon its workers and less upon expensive equipment for success and growth. So when big labor leads the fight for an unnecessarily steep increase in the minimum wage, small business gets hurt.

When big labor refuses to support an expansion in the youth apprenticeship wage program, small business feels it as much as the young and unemployed. NFIB supported an apprenticeship wage proposal that could have provided thousands of young people with jobs. Big labor and its political allies shot it down.

I might interpolate at this point that some 85 percent of the young blacks in the Philadelphia ghettos have no opportunity for employment. Approximately 40 percent of the young blacks all over this country have no opportunity for employment in this society. About 20 percent, across the board, of our youth in this country have no opportunity for employment.

I can recall one of the saddest days in my life, standing here on the floor of the Senate arguing for a youth differential to give businessmen an incentive to hire youth, specifically minority youth, by allowing them to pay 85 percent of the minimum wage for a training period for these young people, and then have them go to the minimum wage. That effort was completely shot down, as a result of the lobbying activities of those who claim they represent the workingmen in our society, who perhaps have been in Washington too long.

These are things that really concern the small business sector. The advertisement goes on to say:

And when big labor tells the President to take a walk with his voluntary wage restraint program, small business will certainly end up paying the price of higher inflation.

Small business was told not to fear OSHA, not to worry about ERISA. Now small business is being told not to fear the "labor law reform" bill, S2467. It is only a procedural matter; it is not aimed at promoting organized labor—so we are told. But let's look at the facts.

Then the National Federation of Independent Businesses goes into the facts, and shows that they are better off, because the facts are contrary to the statements of those who say, "This is just an itty-bitty bill that don't help nobody and don't hurt nobody". As Richard Russell used to say, we better beware of those itty-bitty bills—and that this is just a modest proposal that will stop lawbreaking and stop those few corporations that are commonly complained of all day long for breaking the law.

Small business is not taken in. Neither, I might add, are the American Newspaper Publishers Association or the National Newspaper Guild, the two organizations which represent almost all the newspapers of this country.

You know, that is historical, when they come out and are so strongly against a reform bill. It makes one wonder if this is really reform. It really makes you wonder.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the advertisement of the National Federation of Independent Business be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the advertisement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD as follows:

LET SMALL BUSINESS SPEAK FOR ITSELF: A REBUTTAL TO GEORGE MEANY AND OTHER ADVOCATES OF "LABOR LAW REFORM" LEGISLATION FROM NFIB

Within the past few weeks, small business has been pictured in big labor, union-sponsored national advertising as a smokescreen for big business and as a victim of a shell game in the current debate over labor law "reform". The National Federation of Independent Business (NFIB), the nation's largest small business organization, with more than one-half million members, wishes to refute this myth.

Small business has every reason to be wary of big labor's designs. Small business is labor intensive. It depends more upon its workers and less upon expensive equipment for success and growth. So when big labor leads the fight for an unnecessarily steep increase in the minimum wage, small business gets hurt.

When big labor refuses to support an expansion in the youth apprenticeship wage program, small business feels it as much as the young and unemployed. NFIB supported an apprenticeship wage proposal that could have provided thousands of young people with jobs. Big labor and its political allies shot it down.

And when big labor tells the President to take a walk with his voluntary wage restraint program, small business will certainly end up paying the price of higher inflation.

Small business was told not to fear OSHA; not to worry about ERISA. Now small business is being told not to fear the "labor law reform" bill, S2467. It is only a procedural matter; it is not aimed at promoting organized labor—so we are told. But let's look at the facts.

This proposed labor law legislation has been pushed by the bureaucrats and power brokers of organized labor. This is not surprising. It seems that the union leaders have noticed a phenomenom very disturbing to them: more workers want less union involvement than ever before. Today only one out of five workers belong to unions, compared to more than one out of four 20 years ago. And last year unions won fewer than half of the certification contests supervised by the NLRB.

TWISTED LOGIC

Small business recognizes the motivation of union bosses. It is as obvious as it is audacious: unions have not been successful under our present system of labor laws, so they want to change the rules to improve their organizational record. This logic completely overlooks the obvious question. If unions are so good for their members, why don't more members join unions?

Wherever the fault lies, it is not with the federal labor law. In the 40 years since passage of the original National Labor Relations Act, workers in this nation have enjoyed tremendous gains in wages, fringe benefits and job security. And the resulting economic and political impact of unions is awesome and obvious. The present federal labor law generally has worked as it was intended and is not in need of wholesale reform.

But the bill's proponents disagree and claim several current examples of organizing efforts frustrated because the federal law is not tough enough. Whatever the facts may be in those cases, it is certain that large national companies will continue to have legions of lawyers and labor consultants available to advise them on how to stay in the bounds of the law and still give the unions a good fight. Small businesses, however, will be severely affected by this bill.

SMALL BUSINESS ALREADY AN EASY TARGET

Big labor may well complain that it cannot win against big business. The NLRB 1976 annual report lists labor as winning only 22 percent of the 111 organizing elections of units with 500 or more workers. But big labor has been going after small business with a vengeance and has been very successful at it. For the same period the NLRB supervised 3,865 elections in units with fewer than 20 employees and unions won 57 percent, nearly three out of every five organizing drives for small units. Small businesses with small groups of employees are clearly easy targets for the big labor leaders.

These statistics document a situation distressing but familiar to many small businesses. Not only do they usually lack regular counsel on labor affairs and laws, but they often lack the time and resources to effectively fight any organizing drive. Small business owners do not sit in board rooms giving orders. They are often their own foremen, inspectors, accountants, and janitors. They cannot take the time to print placards or organize employee rallies to discuss their views on unions. They are sharply restricted by law and NLRB decisions as to the type and content of contracts with their employees on the union issue. And they are often unaware of any movement toward unionization of their firms until they are presented with the certification petition by the NLRB By then the union has done all its advance work and the business owner faces a stacked deck. Such circumstances sometimes lead employers to feel pressured and react precipitously, especially if they are unfamiliar with the nuances of the federal labor law, as most small business owners are.

This bill, in the name of streamlining "procedures", will further handcuff the small business owner who is faced with an organizing campaign from a sophisticated, expertly advised national union. The elections would be even quicker and the penalties would be even harsher.

This viewpoint of labor law reform based on the realities of the small business owner's environment, is substantiated in a recent analysis by the Small Business Administration (SBA):

" . . . The Labor Reform Bill will give unions an unfair advantage over small businesses who have neither the time nor expertise (including resources to acquire the expertise) to walk the very thin compliance line proposed by the bills. Since the penalties for noncompliance are so severe, most small businesses confronted with a union organization drive will likely give up in advance rather than risk any action which might be construed later to have been illegal. This will result in unnecessarily increased costs which small businesses are least able to pass on to consumers. Projected further, this means many more small businesses going out of business."

Congress is responsible for legislating in the public interest. Trade unions now are large, powerful bureaucracies. What is good for big unions and their leaders is not necessarily good for the nation. Federal labor laws must strike a balance for workers, among unions and businesses, large and small. Each has different needs and problems. The Senate should realize that S2467 will badly tip that balance against small business.

Mr. HATCH. I would like to talk a little bit today about the other side of labor law reform.

Against a backdrop of a Senate Permanent Investigations Subcommittee hearing looking into increasing union corruption, the Senate will soon consider legislation which President Carter and its sponsors argue will improve procedures of the National Labor Relations Act (NLRA or act) by speeding up elections, strengthening remedies, and, for the first time, injecting the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB or Board) into the collective bargaining and Government contracting process. Opponents of the bills, H.R. 8410 and S. 2467, view them as thinly disguised union attempts to take advantage of uninformed employees with quickie elections and to tilt the presently equitable posture of the NLRA toward organized labor through excessive new penalties directed solely at employer violators. As justification for the measures, the administration and the proponents focus upon a few experiences with a handful of the literally hundreds of thousands of employers in the United States—or, I might add, millions of employers in the United States.

The Board's own statistics show that these experiences are the exception rather than the rule [1] and that the need for the legislation is highly questionable.

Slowly recovering from a serious energy shortage caused by the recent mine workers strike, the American people and their economy have a great stake in legislation that would increase the scope of unionization and the power of unions. Noted economist Pierre Rinfret had predicted that enactment of the bills would likely produce increased inflation,[2] further eroding the purchasing power of consumers and upsetting one of the major objectives of the Carter administration. The proponents, however, have either accidentally or purposely avoided explaining why organized labor deserves to be favored with legislation which disadvantages employers while overlooking the problem of union malpractice, some of which will be discussed below. These malpractices range from repeated violations of the NLRA, to corruption, race discrimination, interference with union members' rights, featherbedding, and systematic destructions of property and violent personal attacks and beatings.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACTS VIOLATIONS

Some unions routinely and flagrantly violate the NLRA, disrupting production and preventing those who want to work from carrying out their duties. One of the most notorious violators of the act is Local 294, International Brotherhood of Teamsters in New York. This local has been found guilty of unlawfully discriminating against its own members who opposed election of some officers supported by the local's business agent,[3] in violation of section 8(b)(2) of the act. The discrimination consisted of revising the seniority lists to place certain members at the bottom, insuring their layoff in slow periods. Subsequently, local 294 violated section 8(b)(1)(A) of the act when it tried to punish this same member by fining and suspending him for filing charges with the NLRB to protect his rights.[4] Local 294 was found in violation of section 8(b)(1)(A) twice again in 1973 when it interfered with the seniority rights of transferred employees [5] and when it obtained the discharge of an employee who opposed the local's incumbent officer.[6] In the latter case, the union was required to provide back pay to the employee.[7]

Local 294's favorite violation is not discriminating against its own members even though it does that quite well. It specializes in secondary boycotts where the local tries to get neutral employees to stop working, threatens neutral employers, or seeks to get work being done by other workers assigned to its members. In 1971, local 294 was found in violation of section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(B) when it induced neutral employees not to work and threatened neutral employers who dealt with the primary employer the local was trying to organize.[8] In that case, the local also violated NLRB organizational picketing rules. A temporary injunction had to be obtained by the NLRB to stop the unlawful picketing and pressure.[9] Also in 1971, local 294 unlawfully (section 8(b)(4)(D)) tried to get for its members work on a construction project which was legitimately being done by other crafts,[10] by other unions, if you will.

In 1972, local 294 violated section 8(b)(4)(i) and (ii)(A) and (B) when it caused stoppages, induced neutral employees not to work, and tried to get neutral employers not to deal with an employer from whom it sought a hot cargo clause in violation of the labor laws of this country, and specifically the National Labor Relations Act.[11] Again in 1972, local 294 was found to have unlawfully: First, induced neutral employees to strike; second, threatened neutral employers; and third, sought to get a warehouse employer to recognize and bargain with the union even though it was not certified as the representative of the employees.[12] In a 1973 case, local 294 unlawfully tried to force an employer to use union members to drive a small truck one-half mile in the morning and one-half mile in the evening.[13] Other Teamster locals, such as local 676 in New Jersey, local 671 in New England, and local 70 in the Alameda/San Francisco Bay area, have also been found in violation of the NLRA on numerous occasions.[14]

The Teamsters, however, are just the tip of the iceberg, and other unions also are responsible for pattern and practice violations of the NLRA. Take local 3 of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers (New York City) for example. Even though the courts had ruled as early as 1964 that the Western Electric Co. could use its own represented employees to install specialized communications equipment on building sites,[15] local 3 continues to engage in secondary boycott activity to try to get this work for its own members in violation of section 8(b)(4)(D). In fact, the NLRB has had to go to court numerous times to stop local 3 from disrupting work and interfering with the work of neutral employees. A 1971 epidemic of these disruptions [16] caused the NLRB to seek several injunctions and a contempt citation against local 3.[17] The U.S. Court of Appeals at New York has consistently enforced findings of NLRA violations against local 3, IBEW.[18]

In spite of the settled law in this subject area, local 3 continues to seek work to which it is not entitled and to interfere with neutral employees and employers. Thus, in Danielson against Local 3, IBEW, a 1973 case, the NLRB was able to enjoin local 3's attempt to snatch work from union (but nonlocal 3) employees.[19] Local 3 has been found guilty of violating the NLRA's secondary boycott and other provisions on numerous occasions in recent years.[20]

One of the most notorious other locals is local 825 of the International Union of Operating Engineers in New Jersey. The NLRB has noted this union's proclivity to violate the secondary boycott provisions of the act,[21] and the local has been the subject of almost 20 Board and court proceedings involving NLRA violations over the past 20 years,[22] including several findings of contempt and one of criminal contempt.

Jurisdictional disputes (section 8(b)(4)(ii)(D)) are among the most troublesome for employers, because all production stops while unions squabble over who will get the work, but sometime an employer is able to recover part of its losses by suing the unions. For example, Noranda Aluminum recovered almost a million dollars from the Carpenters Union in 1976.[23]

The NLRA is not the only statute violated by unions that seek passage of the labor law reform bills, however. For example, local 713 of the Textile Workers Union had to pay $15,000 in damages to a union member it suspended in violation of the Landrum-Griffin Act's bill of rights provision.[24] Elections in many unions, including the International Ladies Garment Workers Union (ILGWU)[25] have been overturned because members were denied their democratic rights. Commentators have noted that Landrum-Griffin is too weak to protect union members' rights.

Arthur Fox, former executive of PROD, a Teamster dissident group, observes that private slush funds are common among Teamster officials who collect them when they retire. Fox says that Leo Da Lesio, former president of Baltimore Local 31, IBT and its Joint Council 62, salted away $250,000, and that Joseph Bernstein, president of local 781 in Chicago, has $600,000 gathered so far.[26] Fox says that free speech, although guaranteed by title I of Landrum-Griffin, is curbed in many locals and that those who speak out can be punished for "disloyalty." [27]

Footnotes at end of article.

In the employee bill of rights that we filed we had a provision that prevented that, prevented indiscriminate fining of union members by the unions such as this.

Fox further noted that the financial reports unions must file do not provide adequate information.

Incidentally, with regard to indiscriminate fining of union members, although we have that in the employee bill of rights, that was conveniently ignored as the so-called reform bill came out of committee.

DISCRIMINATION

The propensity of organized labor to discriminate against nonmembers and racial minorities is well known. Herbert Hill of the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People (NAACP), has said that there exists in the building trades unions "a nationwide continuing pattern of racial discrimination." [28] at the NAACP's 66th annual convention in July 1975, Hill Observed that—

A vote for trade union seniority is a vote against black people.

This discrimination may occur at the local union level, but sometimes it comes from much higher up. The U.S. Department of Labor once ruled that the ILGWU constitution prevented democratic elections and that the union illegally interfered with the political rights of black challengers to appear on the ballots and to distribute campaign literature.[29] Even something as subtle as a $3,000 entrance fee may keep out a minority who wants to join a union. John A. Senna wanted membership in Plumbers and Steamfitters Local 77 in New Bedford, Mass., but could not get a union job until he filed a complaint with the Massachusetts Commission Against Discrimination. Said Armand O. Demanche, Business Manager of Local 77:

Senna can abide by union rules or go back to nigger outfits, or back to the cotton fields, for all I care.[30]

In many cases, however, unions have undertaken a pattern and practice of job bias against minorities. In United States against Local 189, Paper-Workers (Crown Zellerbach),[31] the white local discriminated against blacks in promotion, training, seniority and other employment areas. In United States against Iron Workers Local 86,[32] the local was found to have had a pattern and practice of bias in membership, training, and referral. In EEOC against Local 638, Steamfitters et al,[33] Local 28 of the Sheetmetal Workers Union and its Joint Apprentice Committee were found to have engaged in denial of access to blacks in membership and training. In a related case,[34] Local 638 was found to have committed a pattern and practice of race discrimination against blacks and Puerto Ricans in violation of title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964.[35]

We can go on and on, but these give just a few illustrations.

With regard to the pattern of violence that erupts, union malpractices are not limited to so-called labor laws, but extend into areas which are subject to criminal sanctions. One of these areas is violence, which is common in building trades industry labor disputes, because sites are accessible and employers may be unable to protect widely distributed work locations. The Carter administration has not explained why unions that dynamite, maim, and burn should be entitled to "equal access" to an employer's project or should be given quickie elections and extra back wages. If there is doubt that violence exists, the following exposition should dispel it.

In the early 1970's, Local 675 of the International Union of Operating Engineers in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., was ordered five times by Florida courts to stop beating up workers and destroying construction equipment. A jury awarded $1.2 million to a man savagely beaten during a union raid on a nonunion project, and both the local and its parent international were held responsible.[36] In 1970, Local 675 members rushed from a site in Hallandale, Fla., where their beatings and burnings had done $50,000 damage, to a Fort Myers public housing project where they wrecked an office, firebombed a crane and lashed the foreman with a chain. Even though some of the assailants were identified, no convictions were obtained.[37]

On Florida's west coast in 1972, over 50 union supporters beat 7 nonunion men digging trenches on Marco Island. A deputy sheriff was beaten with a pipe wrench and one worker had three ribs broken and steel shavings poured in his eyes. The "wrecking crew" also offered to "cut off his hands and put them in his back pocket." Union violence has continued at Marco Island for several years.[38]

On April 6, 1970, about 1,500 union construction workers overran a Palm Beach, Fla., facility being built nonunion by Spreen Volkswagen, axed the new roof, battered down concrete walls, firebombed trucks and trailers and sledgehammered and burned many new VW's and Audis parked in rows on the lot. Of 11 indictments obtained, 8 men were convicted.[39]

Six members of Florida Ironworkers Local 402 were indicted in connection with a bomb manufacturing ring, and with conspiring to blow up a nonunion Vero Beach firm. In an April 1973 explosion, that firm suffered shattered windows and a destroyed concrete storage site.[40]

Even disputes between unions can be costly. William Beck, former business agent of local 803, Pipefitters in Orlando, Fla., was convicted along with two other local 803 members, on charges of bombing a carpenter's union hall and causing $500,000 damage. Beck was angry, because some of the carpenters' members crossed his union's picket line. (Beck also had hired an expipefitter to vandalize nonunion projects and equipment between 1969 and 1973.)[41] Joe Valdastri of Florida Sheetmetal Workers Local 223, commenting on the problem of jurisdictional disputes (in violation of section 8(b)(4)(D)), observed that 300 to 500 men typically have a showdown on a site with two-by-fours and pipes, and "we've had two of those in the last 3 years." [42]

Of course, Florida has no corner on the market for labor violence. Washington, D.C., got a taste of it when local 6, pressmen, struck the Washington Post, a liberal and usually editorially prounion paper.

I might add that the Post has come out with three editorials against this bill until this last week, when it came out with an editorial for it, contradicting all three of the prior editorials, which may show the consistency of much of the Post's writings in the eyes of some people.

Employees were beaten in this Washington Post pressmen's problem, vandalism committed, and threats made.

One employee's wife was told:

We're going to kill you and the baby, if we see you on the street.

That was quoted in a statement by the Post publisher, in the Washington Post, December 11, 1975, page Z14. Several members of Local 6 were indicted and convicted of the destruction of the Post's pressroom.

In North Carolina, the conviction of a Textile Workers Union member to conspire to bomb a struck textile mill was upheld.[43] In another textile case, the Central Massachusetts Joint Board of the Textile Workers Union, AFL–CIO was found in violation of section 8(b)(1)(A) of the NLRA for threatening and assaulting nonstriking employees and for kicking the company's vice president as he led workers into the plant.[44] In 1972, union construction workers went on a rampage in Michigan wrecking nonunion construction projects in Lapeer in June, tearing down cement block walls at a W. T. Grant site in October, and storming and firebombing the new Walter Reuther Junior High in December.[45] In an effort to restrain this violence, an NLRB charge against four international unions (ironworkers, laborers, roofs and carpenters), the Michigan Building and Construction Trades Council, and several local unions and officials was filed. This action was settled by a consent decree filed with the U.S. Court of Appeals for the Sixth Circuit,[46] in which unions promised an end to violence.

On August 26, 1974, over 1,000 men stormed a nonunion shopping center project in Swansea, Mass., injuring 10 and causing several hundred thousand dollars damages.[47] Also in 1974, Local 1181 of the Amalgamated Transit Union of metropolitan New York was suspected of being behind the vandalism that put 75 buses used to transport handicapped children out of commission.[48]

No area or type of industry is immune. In February of 1976, a bomb blew two fingers off the right hand of Patrolman George Johnson as he picked up a piece of pipe that had been thrown against the offices of the Delaware County, Pa., Daily Times. Since the strike against the paper by Local 10 of the Greater Philadelphia Newspaper Guild began several months earlier, the paper's lobby had been firebombed and an underground explosion had been caused by igniting gasoline poured into a vent.[49] During the summer of 1976, 11 suburban Chicago restaurants were bombed in what Larry Buckmaster, president of the Chicago and Illinois Restaurant Association called a union organizing effort with heavy arm twisting. Union organizers would ask employers whether they had heard about what happened down the street. All the bombings occurred within the jurisdiction of Local 450, Hotel and Restaurant and Bartenders International Union (H. & R. & BIU), the local where H. & R. & BIU President Edward Hanley got his start.[50]

Death is not an unknown visitor where labor violence is found. In 1973 in St. Joseph, Mo., Charles E. Smith, business agent for a striking sheetmetal worker's local, was killed by a blast from a 12 gage shotgun he allegedly had used to sabotage metal work being done despite the strike. The three men charged in Smith's death were all affiliated with the union, including one representative from the parent international.[51] And on January 15, 1976, Joe Hooper, a 26-year-old construction worker was gunned down while he crouched in an office trailer during an attack by 150 Louisiana AFL–CIO Building Tradesmen on a Jupiter Chemical Co. project in Lake Charles. Employees on the project were members of a non-AFL–CIO union. Officials of the Southwest Louisiana Building Trades Council and 15 other men were indicted in the attack and charged with crimes up to and including murder.[52] And the U.S. Department of Justice's "Coal Strike Incidents Daily Summary Report" for March 24, 1978, showed to date two fatal assaults and 34 bombings, as well as 72 "disruptions" covering 17 railroad sabotages, 6 gunfires at persons, and 16 property damage of mines.

Although it does not appear that they have killed anyone yet, Local 30, Roofers, of Philadelphia and its members are something of a legend when it comes to quantity of violent actions. In July 1974, the Philadelphia Bulletin did a series of reports of Local 30 and provided a litany of examples of Local 30's ferocity.[53]

Richard Harper, a Bryn Mawr, Pa., contractor, was warned by Local 30 about using a nonunion roofer on a King of Prussia, Pa., warehouse project. Two Local 30 officials, Stephen J. Traitz and Carlton Brown, visited the site and told the foreman "you don't heed very well, do you?" A few days later Harper's office trailer was burned. The nonunion roofer, Louis Welch of West Philadelphia whose only crew includes his two sons, a son-in-law and one other, was told that if he completed Harper's job he was a "dead man."

On June 5, 1972, 1,000 pickets from the Philadelphia Building Trades Council arrived in buses chartered by local 30 ("for a picnic") at the site of a Sheraton Hotel being constructed by Leon J. Altemose, a nonunion general contractor. Overrunning the site, the pickets threw firebombs, wrecked equipment, and did an estimated $300,000 worth of damage. Of the 23 arrested, 17—all but one members of local 30—have been convicted. Philadelphia Inquirer, September 7, 1975. Ten months before this attack, Traitz had warned Altemose that something "stronger than picketing" would happen unless Altemose went 100 percent union. Altemose says he was threatened at least 50 times by the unions, and on August 18, 1972, he was beaten during the lunch hour on a downtown Philadelphia street by persons he identified as local 30 members. Three local 30 members, including Traitz were arrested, but later acquitted.

Kitson Bros., Inc. is a nonunion roofing company in the Philadelphia area. In February 1973, its employees rejected membership in local 30 in an election.[54] In May, local 30 pickets appeared at a job Kitson was doing for Container Corp. of America, and Kitson's employees fled to a diner where they were attacked by 12 men, including one identified as Traitz. Because local 30's picketing stopped other work on the project, 2 weeks later Kitson lost the job. In February 1973, Kitson workers fled five or six carloads of men at a Standard Pressed Steel project in Fort Washington, Pa., and did not return. In August 1973, Kitson equipment received $4,000 in vandalism at a Bucks County, Pa., project. In all, Kitson estimates that local 30 has cost him about $60,000 in damaged property alone.

Traitz was there on July 25, 1972, when local 30 picketed a Bethlehem Steel plant in Pottstown, Pa., over the use of a Pittsburgh union roofing firm. One Bethlehem employee was punched in the face.

In August 1972, a nonunion Ephrata, Pa., firm was roofing a Holiday Inn addition in Chester County, Pa. Local 30 pickets appeared and the nonunion employees fled, but a witness saw union men puncture the tires of another contractro's vehicle on the signal of a local 30 business agent.

Local 30 gets across the Delaware River to New Jersey, too, as Nicholas Karnavas was sorry to discover. He is a nonunion roofer who spent 6 days in the hospital with a broken nose, cracked ribs, head gashes and cuts and bruises after being clubbed, along with two of his employees, on a Camden jobsite. Karnavas had refused to join local 30 earlier, and its business agent, Joe Enright, was present at the beating. The Camden Housing Authority chairman at the time, Joseph P. Di Renzo, also was president of the United Building Trades Council of Camden County and vicinity, and he said picketing could continue until Karnavas joined the union or paid union rates. (A review of the records by the Bulletin showed that Karnavas was paying union rates.) Subsequently Karnavas subcontracted the work to a union firm.

Even former members of local 30 who go into the roofing business for themselves do not fare well with Local 30 if their business is nonunion. Such a person was William Hargrove of Camden, N.J. On one occasion he watched a carload of men smash his truck's windows, slash its tires, and chase him with baseball bats. Afterward, local 30 officials suggested that he stay off the job. But on May 26, 1973, Hargrove was in his shop with five employees when 50 to 60 Local 30 members appeared, throwing bricks and wrecking his equipment. Police were unable to disperse the mob, and while the police were distracted, some local 30 members threw tear gas bombs into the building. Hargrove drove them off by firing a shotgun into the ceiling.

Minutes after local 30 roofers warned the general contractor on a Cherry Hill, N.J., project that the roofer, I. Alper Co. of Camden, was not paying a union rate, the general contractor's office trailer burned. Alper was replaced by a union contractor.

Back in Pennsylvania, 15 men carrying baseball bats hand lettered "local 30" beat six nonunion roofers in Springfield Township. All had broken bones, but the only black worker, Benjamin Hayward of Philadelphia, was savagely clubbed and had a broken right arm and a fractured skull. A local 30 member who complained about the Hayward beating was later found shot to death. A local 30 member was tried twice in the case—one jury could not agree and one acquitted him. During the trial, the prosecuting attorney had 14 officials of local 30 ejected for "staring down" jurors.

On August 17, 1974, four shots fired from a moving car peppered the jobsite where nonunion roofers were working near Norristown, Pa. Police were of the opinion that it was probably Local 30, the "same gang that was involved in the Altemose affair."[55] The NLRB is familiar with Local 30, too. In one case, Local 30 violated section 8(b)(1)(A) by mass picketing, blocking entry, physical assaults on employees and supervisors, threats to employees and families, chasing employees and damaging and destroying equipment.[56] For Local 30 incidents involving Kitson Brothers, Inc., including picket line violence against employees and their property as well as blocking access to traffic (including an ambulance), the Board found violations of section 8(b)(1)(A).[57]

In response to the widespread campaign of intimidation against nonunion contractors in the Philadelphia area, the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, Altemose Construction Co. and Associated Builders and Contractors have filed an antitrust suit against the Philadelphia Building Trades Council and its member unions arguing basically that they are using violence to control markets and to restrain competition.[58]

Lastly, the Colorado Bureau of Investigation (CBI) uncovered a pattern of crime in which a union official would seek a union shop agreement, and if the contractor refused the structure being built would burn just prior to completion. Then the union official would make a second visit to see whether the employer was ready to sign up. In 1972 and 1973 these fires did $2.1 million and $2.7 million damage in Colorado respectively, but through the use of undercover agents the CBI was able to get convictions of two Colorado union leaders for arson and one New Mexico unionist for explosives.[59]

Since much of the labor violence occurs during union organizing efforts, and since the proposed labor law reform legislation will encourage if not assist organizing, it is reasonable to expect that the enactment of S. 2467 will increase the amount of labor violence. It is more difficult, however, to determine why President Carter supports legislation which would benefit unions which have been shown to be repeat violators of the NLRA and those for which violence is part and parcel of their way of life. But pattern violations and violence are not the only union malpractices not addressed by S. 2467. Union corruption is an area that has been getting more attention because it is becoming more of a problem.

(NOTE.—For the reader's information, a copy of an actual NLRB order to remedy a union violence related unfair labor practice charge is attached as Attachment A. It may be educational for some, but to others it is all too common.)

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have this document printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the document was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ATTACHMENT A

Operating Engineers Local 101 (17–CB–1761; DS–1001), Kansas City, Mo. Oct. 26. Pursuant to stipulation, the Board ordered the Union to cease restraining and coercing employees of The Heavy Constructors Association of the Greater Kansas City Area and its members; assaulting nonstriking employees; engaging in mass picketing and trespassing on jobsite(s); entering a trailer on a jobsite and damaging and destroying documents; slashing a job superintendent's truck tires at a jobsite; following employees from jobsite(s), firing a gun at them and brandishing clubs; blocking and hampering ingress and egress to the premise(s) or jobsite(s) of the Association and its members; threatening to assault a nonstriking employee; hitting trucks crossing the picket line with baseball bats, causing damage to these vehicles; and hitting and damaging motor vehicles driven by nonstriking employees.

The Union was further ordered to cease trespassing on jobsite(s) while carrying clublike objects and taking pictures of nonstriking employees; throwing dirt on nonstriking employees and threatening them with physical harm; bringing a cannon to various jobsites and aiming it at nonstriking employees; threatening to blow up jobsites and going through the motion of loading and aiming the cannon; striking employees with picket signs and otherwise assaulting and causing physical harm to nonstriking employees and other persons entering and leaving jobsite(s); damaging motor vehicles and other property of employees, suppliers, customers and supervisory personnel as they enter and leave jobsite(s); throwing rocks and other objects toward nonstriking employees, supervisory personnel, suppliers or customers entering, or attempting to enter, or exiting from jobsite(s); and by other acts of violence, or threats of violence, restraining or coercing employees of the Association and its members in the exercise of their rights under the Act.

(Chairman Fanning and Members Jenkins and Murphy participated.)

Charges filed by The Heavy Constructors Assn. of the Greater Kansas City Area; all-party stipulation entered into July 22, 1977.

CORRUPTION

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, organized crime participation in labor racketeering was the focus of hearings beginning April 24, 1978, before the U.S. Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigations.

Acting Deputy Attorney General Benjamin R. Civiletti testified that labor-management racketeering is "one of the priority areas for strike force investigations." Mr. Civiletti said that there are several hundred syndicate-influenced unions, mostly concentrated in a handful of national or international labor organizations and the problem is getting worse. He went on to give examples of the types of criminal activity the Department of Justice is examining: First, no-show or ghost employees who are frequently organized crime members paid for doing no work; second, kickbacks to trustees of pension funds in return for loans to questionable investment projects which are in turn looted; third, payoffs to union officials in return for their keeping employer labor costs down; and fifth, embezzlements from union treasuries. Mr. Civiletti noted that these practices cost either the consumer or the employee money.

I might add that, generally, it costs both of them money. It is about time somebody starts standing up for the employees in this country and not worrying too much about the big corporations or the big unions, but worry about whether the employees are being treated properly and whether they are being treated fairly.

Mr. Civiletti listed several recent successful prosecutions of union officials:

First. Richard Nell, former president of Local 675 IUOE, convicted in 1977 of seven counts of embezzlement, was sentenced to serve 8 years in jail and to pay a $10,000 fine. "Nell and his associates had been responsible for considerable labor violence in southern Florida, including destruction of equipment, beatings, bombings, extortion, and bribery." [62]

Second. Bernard G. Rubin, convicted of embezzling assets from six labor union organizations and funds in 1975, was sentenced to 5 years in jail, a $50,000 fine, and forfeiture of all union offices.

Third. Michael C. Bane was convicted in December 1975 of embezzlement of benefit and union funds and mail fraud on Local 794, Hotel and Restaurant and Bartenders International Union (Pontiac, Mich.) by giving himself bonuses and obtaining reimbursement for nonexistent expenses.

Fourth. In 1976, Irving Stern, international vice president of the Meatcutters, and Moe Fliss and Nicholas Abondolo, officials of Local 342, Meatcutters, pled guilty to tax evasion in cases arising out of charges that they accepted bribes from employers and were sentenced to terms of from 4 to 6 months in jail.

Fifth. Also in 1976, Charles L. O'Brien, an international Teamster organizer and head of Local 212, IBT, (Detroit), was convicted of accepting a bribe from an employer and was sentenced to 1 year in jail and fined $2,500.

Sixth. In April 1977, Joseph M. Bane, Sr., president of Local 614, Teamsters (Detroit) was convicted of embezzlement of union funds and mail fraud after a 4-week jury trial.

Seventh. In July 1977, John Priore pled guilty to extortion, bribery and embezzlement in running Local 690 of the Amalgamated Workers Union of North America (Brooklyn, N.Y.).

Eighth. An ongoing Justice Department investigating into racketeering in the International Longshoremens' Association has already resulted in indictments against a number of ILA officials and businessmen.

Ninth. David Frye, chief steward for Teamster Local 714 (Chicago) was convicted of 73 counts of Taft-Hartley violations and one racketeering count and was permanently enjoined from participating in union activities in March 1978.

The statement of Robert C. Stewart, attorney in charge of the Newark, N.J., and Buffalo, N.Y. Justice Department field offices, shows how crime syndicates use their control of some local unions to protect them for tax purposes and to influence the economic lives of ordinary citizens, and how they manage to keep criminals in the union's power structure.[63] Stewart mentioned that even though extortion, property damage, and other misconduct by a Niagara Falls, N.Y., local is well known, an atmosphere of intimidation makes it difficult to prosecute. Stewart believes that these crime dominated locals threaten the economic life of the community, because business is unwilling to exist in that environment.

Stewart mentioned that one of Rochester, New York's most powerful unions is controlled by a syndicate boss who used it to force competitors of a company he owned out of business.[64] Stewart discussed the problem of kickbacks required for local membership, selling of jobs to the highest bidder, corrupt union stewards encouraging theft (and providing fencing outlets) employers fearful of labor trouble if they complain, the beating of honest union stewards who demand work of "ghost" employees as an object lesson, and extortion of kickbacks from employers as the price of labor peace.[65]

Stewart went on to discuss the apparent effort of an individual controlling a $150-million benefit fund to get kickbacks for placing fund money in loans. The individual had an annual income in 1974 of almost $100,000 from several funds and local unions. Stewart testified as to how organized crime uses its contacts in unions to keep things quiet while the syndicate drains money out of companies. Stewart testified as to the connection of a 12,500-member northern New Jersey local with convicted criminals, its total domination by organized crime, and an occasional murder.[66] Employer payments for nonexistent services to insure labor peace become commonplace, and misuse of member benefit funds routine with labor racketeering.

Strike force attorney Douglas Roller of Cleveland told the Senate subcommittee that in Cleveland a great number of union officials are either organized crime figures or are associates of them. A Miami Justice Department attorney said that at least four or five major south Florida unions are rampant with labor racketeering. This is found in the Daily Labor Report cited at footnote 61.

In spite of pervasive evidence of corruption, union leaders seems to feel little obligation to do anything about it. For example, Leonard Woodcock, president of the UAW, has said:

> The instinctive tradition of the labor movement is that it's not our job to clean up corruption. It's sort of traditional that we don't cooperate with the government on those things because the government to some extent is the perennial enemy.[67]

I am continuing my remarks from this morning where we went into the National Labor Relations Act violations by unions, where we discussed a large number of those, where we discussed discrimination against blacks and others, where we discussed union violence and, of course, where we discussed union corruption.

We are now in the middle of the discussion on union corruption, and I think it is important, because all we hear about are those few companies, such as J. P. Stevens, which the unions constantly cite as a reason to have this awful bill.

Frankly, the malpractices committed by the labor movement in some areas are not corrected by this bill any more than the J. P. Stevens problem, which they cite, is corrected by this bill.

This bill happens to be an easy organizing bill.

Mr. President, I am going to continue with regard to union corruption.

Union corruption is everywhere and it has a severe impact on the cost of doing business. One Justice Department official said that an official of Local 842, IUOE (New Jersey) doubled the cost of building a pipeline in New Jersey compared to surrounding States by extorting money from contractors and forcing them to subcontract to his friends.[68] In February 1978, the U.S. Department of Labor filed a suit against 17 former trustees of the $1.4 billion teamsters central States pension fund attacking questionable loan practices and imprudent management.[69]

The Justice Department and Department of Labor are investigating possible misuse of member funds and possible ties between the 430,000-member Hotel and Restaurant and Bartenders International Union's officers and organized crime.[70] In a series on this union, the Chicago Tribune reported that H. & R. & BIU President Edward Hanley received favorable loans from financial institutions serving as depositories for his union and from institutions connected with hotels where his union represents the employees.[71] Some of the union's officials have been charged or convicted of crimes ranging from burglary to acceptance of benefits from employers and extortion. Others have other jobs as well.[72]

Some of the corruption is minor, such as the President of H. & R. & BIU Local 355 (Florida) who was convicted of seeking a discount on a hotel room from an employer of H. & R. & BIU labor[73] or officials of Retail Clerks International Association Local 400 (Metropolitan Washington, D.C.) being arrested for paying $1,000 to a drug store chain employee for the names and addresses of the chain's 4,500 employees.[74]

Other corruption is more shocking such as the apparent use of the Teamsters Union by Gerardo Carena, a reported New Jersey Mafia chieftain, to force his detergent product into New York and New Jersey foodstores. A. & P. resisted and two of its store managers were murdered and five stores burned.[75] In another case, the garbage carting industry in New York City is virtually controlled by Mafia companies having strong Teamster ties.[76] The head of the New Jersey Teamsters, Anthony Provenzano, has been indicted in an alleged conspiracy to arrange a kickback on a $2.3 million loan from union funds.[77] One might content that the pattern and practice of violence, violations of the NLRA and corruption by local unions is coincidental and exists without the guidance or support of the parent international unions. There is evidence, however, to the contrary. For example, in Kaiser Roth Corp. v. Textile Workers, 479 F. 2d 524 (6th Cir. 1973); cert. denied. 414 U.S. 976 the court upheld a lower court finding that officials of the parent Textile Workers Union of America had "personally participated in, observed, supervised, and controlled the activities of the strikers." These activities included obstructing entrances to the plant, blocking, stoning, and overturning cars of nonstrikers throwing nails and glass on the road and slashing truck tires. The court found that international representatives told the pickets to use any means to keep employees out of the plant, including stripping off the clothes of nonstrikers if necessary. An award of $1.16 million to the company for losses and damages was upheld by the appeals court.

Even if repeated union violations of the NLRA, labor violence and labor racketeering were not enough to raise questions in the minds of supporters of S. 2467, including President Carter, the cost of putting the legislation into effect and its impact on the economy should give pause to its enactment.

COST

The general counsel of the NLRB, John Irving, has estimated that it will cost the agency an additional $28 million to hire the extra 900 employees. This does not include the $2 million it would cost to add 2 new Board members and their staffs of 20 attorneys each plus clericals.[78] Among other things, Mr. Irving predicted an increase in the number of organizing attempts leading to a 20-percent increase in Board election proceedings and a 6-percent increase in unfair labor practice cases. He also said that the bill's equal access provision, which is about the same as S. 2467's, would produce increased litigation, because the statutory language leaves many issues to be resolved by the courts. Increases in representation case hearings would be expected, reducing consent or stipulated elections from the present 75 to 40 percent and employers would be less likely to agree to backpay which would be double ordinary pay under H.R. 8410.

In S. 2467 back pay would be 1½ times the regular rate for unlawful discharges during organizing campaigns or while bargaining for a first labor contract.

Economists have estimated that the proposed labor law amendments would increase U.S. inflation and impact severely on small business.[79] The increase in unionization would not only increase unit labor costs, but also the number of hours lost due to work stoppages. A strike can be very costly to an industry and the surrounding community. For example, a 2-week strike by the Hotel and Restaurant and Bartenders International Union cost the Las Vegas tourist industry $26 million in March 1976.[80]

The question is whether U.S. taxpayers and consumers can afford this bill.

CONCLUSION

A careful examination of the country's problems with organized labor's pattern and practice violations of the NLRA, violence and corruption shows that the so-called labor reform legislation, S. 2467/H.R. 8410, will do nothing to stop the malpractices and may even make these problems worse. It is time for every American, including President Carter, to ask himself or herself whether blindsided reform deserves to become law when so much other needed labor reform will be overlooked.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that attachment A and the footnotes with regard to the remarks that I have made throughout the day be incorporated within the RECORD throughout at the appropriate places and at the end of the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

[1] Of the more than 9,000 representation elections held in fiscal 1975 by the NLRB, 82% were held between 12 and 44 days from the filing of the petition for election. NLRB oversight hearings 4, 94th Cong. 2d Session (1976). And in fiscal 1977, of 9,960 certifications issued by the NLRB, 8,116 followed elections by consent or stipulation. 42d Annual Report of the NLRB, Table 10, p. 287. As far as unfair labor practice proceedings were concerned, of 37,602 cases closed in fiscal 1977, only 2.3% were decided by the Board itself and 1.2% went to a circuit court of appeals. Id, Table 8, p. 285. These statistics reject the notion that massive employer racalcitrance is undermining the effectiveness of the Board's procedures.

Mr. DECONCINI. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Romano Romani and Mr. John Mulkey be accorded the privilege of the floor during debate and vote on this legislative matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I wish to speak for a few minutes on three different areas that I think are of interest.

First, I shall continue an outline of an analysis of the bill that I started last week and I say today, as I have said before, that so far we have had a very constructive, very interesting, and informative discussion of the so-called labor reform bill.

I wish to offer an outline and analysis of two additional issues relating to this bill. That is, the illegal work stoppage provision and the economic impact of the bill.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas has previously stated, and I do so again today, that before we get through this bill I hope the sponsors of this bill will have looked at the entire picture. My concern, and I think the concern of others of my colleagues, with this piece of legislation is that it tends to look at a very small portion of what is a very large labor picture. Before we have concluded considering this piece of legislation I would hope that we would give our friends on both sides of the aisle a chance to examine some of these other issues which address the real concerns of all working men and women of this country. I do not, for one minute, deny that there are some abuses, some wrongdoings on the side of business, some delays and some frustrations, and they should, indeed, be addressed. However, I think we would be remiss in our duties and responsibilities if we were to believe for one moment that all concerns on the side of labor and all concerns on the side of management, have been addressed in this bill.

I said at the outset that this bill is neither as bad as some have suggested nor is it as good as others have suggested, and there may yet be some meeting of the minds on some good, sound labor reform legislation.

I would suggest, if we are going to talk about labor reform, that it should be two-sided and address itself to both labor as well as management abuses. I think that the basic consideration that we should keep in mind, is not the protection of big labor, not the protection of big business, but the protection and where possible the enhancement of the lives of working men and women.

ILLEGAL WORK STOPPAGES

Under current law, injunctive relief may be obtained under certain circumstances against wildcat strikes, but not against stranger picketing.

Section 13 of the bill provides that an employer may seek injunctive relief against stranger picketing where the picket line is not maintained by a labor organization in connection with a labor dispute. As a result, injunctions would not be available if the picket line is maintained by a labor organization in connection with a labor dispute. An employer can also secure injunctive relief if the refusal to work is not authorized, initiated or ratified by a labor organization. If the union does authorize, initiate or ratify the illegal activity, no restraining order can issue under this section.

ANALYSIS

An analysis of this provision must begin with review of the Supreme Court's decision in Boys Market, Inc. against retail Clerk's Union, Local 770 and Buffalo Forge Co. against United Steelworkers of America. These decisions both involve the availability and utilization of injunctive relief under section 301 of the Labor Management Relations Act. In Boys Markets, the Supreme Court held that an injunction may issue when a strike takes place over a grievance which the parties are bound under the terms of the collective bargaining agreement. In Buffalo Forge, in a divided 5 to 4 decision, the Supreme Court, in considering the propriety of injunctive relief in sympathy strike situations, held that injunctive relief was not appropriate.

Boys Markets and Buffalo Forge are cases illustrating the divisive nature of Federal Court intervention in labor disputes and a balancing of the policies contained in the Norris-LaGuardia Act and section 301 of the Taft-Hartley Act. Boys Markets, wherein the court held that arbitration is the primary vehicle of promoting industrial peace, was an affirmation of the underlying principles which have promoted labor peace. If the parties between themselves bargain for a no-strike clause, the employer should be able to have that bargain enforced by a court order.

Conversely, Buffalo Forge calls into question the principle that the Government should take a minimal role in labor-management relations except to enforce a bargained contract. The allowance of sympathy strikes can indirectly undermine a no-strike clause which was arrived at by good-faith bargaining.

Justice Stevens in his dissent in Buffalo Forge noted that the question of whether employees can honor a picket line is a subject for arbitral determination. However, requiring an employer to go first to arbitration and allow the work stoppage to continue frustrates not only the arbitration process but makes virtually meaningless the union's agreement not to strike. Granting injunctive relief, therefore, promotes the policies of allowing the parties to bargain on virtually all terms and conditions of employment.

As observed by Justice Stevens, the concerns which prompted passage of the Norris-LaGuardia Act were not applicable to a situation where a court was dealing with the enforceability of an agreement:

> Like the decision in Boys Markets, this opinion reflects, on the one hand, my confidence that experience during the decades since the Norris-LaGuardia Act was passed has dissipated any legitimate concern about the impartiality of federal judges in disputes between labor and management, and on the other, my continued recognition of the fact that judges have less familiarity and expertise than arbitrators and administrators who regularly work in this specialized area. The decision in Boys Markets requires an accommodation between the Norris-LaGuardia Act and the Labor Management Relations Act. I would hold only that the terms of that accommodation do not entirely deprive the federal courts of all power to grant any relief to an employer, threatened with irreparable injury from a sympathy strike clearly in violation of a collective bargaining agreement, regardless of the equities of his claim for injunctive relief pending arbitration.

Since another critical aspect of national labor policy is the concept of free collective bargaining, it is difficult to argue that the utilization of injunctive relief to enforce a bargain freely struck runs contrary to these policies. Injunctions designed to enforce what has been agreed to are to be encouraged and not prohibited as this bill would do. As recognized by the Supreme Court in Boys Markets, there has been a shift from the protection of the emerging labor movement to evolving a policy designed to encourage free collective bargaining and the peaceful settlement of disputes.

Few people would argue that the unions are not at any disadvantage in their bargaining with employers. If one of the primary purposes of our national labor laws is to promote labor peace, the law should encourage both parties to abide by their agreements. If either party violates the contract, the normal contract remedies should be available to the courts, including injunctions in appropriate cases.

It should, of course, be noted that in nearly all collective-bargaining agreements the only promise a union makes in the entire contract is not to strike. The remainder of the obligations are placed squarely upon management's shoulders. This provision of the bill, however, undercuts the enforceabiilty of the union's only obligation.

Against this background, it is clear that section 13 is not an adequate remedy for employers faced with strikes in violation of a no-strike clause in a collective-bargaining agreement. Indeed, the Senate report emphasizes that the rule of Buffalo Forge be preserved and that the present balance between employers and unions be maintained. However, the recent debilitating effects of the coal mine strikes is a prime illustration that an equitable balance does not exist if the courts do not act.

ECONOMIC IMPACT

In a recent, indepth study—Rinfret Associate Report—it was determined that this legislation would only add pressure to the general inflationary trend of the United States. The economic effects of this bill are inconsistent with the administration's objective of reducing the already high U.S. inflation rate which is close to double-digit levels.

The most pressing concern of the Senator from Kansas is the economic impact of the make-whole provision upon small business. The make-whole provisions would certainly be an extreme settlement solution and can operate inequitably, unfairly, and may violate the spirit of equality. An unfair economic advantage for large trade unions and for large business would result.

The committee has adopted a measure for the make-whole remedy which is guaranteed to punish small businesses. If the NLRB finds that an employer failed to bargain in good faith, an order of backpay may be entered. The Senator from Kansas agrees that an employer should have to pay damages if he does not bargain in good faith. However, the fairness of the provision ends there. The hidden penalty is the use of an inflator for these wages.

The bill provides that these back wages will be increased by a percentage equal to the average wage increases in major collective-bargaining settlements for that quarter. That means the smallest business in Kansas will have to pay the same wage increase as General Motors or United States Steel. The inherent dissimilarities of these kinds of businesses are apparent and the Senator from Kansas feels that this is a major deficiency in the bill.

LITIGATION

The conclusions regarding the significant inflationary impact of this legislation finds further support in a report by NLRB General Counsel Irving. According to Mr. Irving, the proposed legislation will substantially increase litigation and require a corresponding increase in Board staff amounting to an increase of nearly $28 million a year. As the report admits, this estimate may be low.

A large amount of litigation will be engendered for two primary reasons.

First, the severe penalties imposed upon employers for violation of the act makes it in the employer's best interest to litigate most, if not all, controversies where the penalites could be triggered. Correspondingly, it may be in the union's best interest to litigate all controversies to have the threat of having the Board assess severe penalties hanging over the employer. The standard operating procedure of management and labor will be litigation and the end will be increased labor strife.

The statistics produced before the House Education and Labor Committee showing the high settlement rate of Board cases is compelling evidence that Congress should not interfere with the bargaining process. Those statistics indicate that settlement agreements are reached in 23.4 percent of the charges filed with the Board prior to the issuance of a Board complaint and in 82 percent of the charges filed with the Board in which a Board complaint is issued. As a result, there are only 5 percent of the unfair labor practice charges which the Board is forced to decide on their merits. Similarly, about 80 percent of the representation elections which are conducted by the Board are consented to by management and labor.

Since the Board would, of course, like the parties to settle their disputes rather than having matters litigated which strains the Board's budgetary and personnel resources, any legislative efforts in this area should be directed to this end. Board Chairman Fanning concurred with this observation in his testimony on H.R. 8410 when he stated that successful enforcement under the National Labor Relations Board "depends in large part on voluntary compliance by employers and unions alike." Regrettably, the committee's bill will take away the settlement incentive and diminish voluntary cooperation between the parties. The bill encourages distrust, suspicion, and arbitrary attitudes. In short, employers and unions are invited by this legislation to engage in costly, time-consuming litigation, and inevitably embittering both parties and clogging the dockets of the Federal courts.

Some of the areas in which litigation is likely to increase markedly, if the legislation is enacted, are the following. First, the expedited election provision will result in fewer elections being agreed to in light of the arbitrary time periods. According to Mr. Irving:

> The number of election agreements will be substantially reduced from its present rate of 75 percent to a conservative 40 percent of merit dispositions.

These figures come from an administration which strongly supports this bill. Without a proper time period for the employer to present his views on unionization, the employer will be forced to litigate issues after the election to which he would otherwise have consented. Since the employer is not given adequate notice of a campaign or of the proper unit determination, the employer's only recourse is to litigate all issues relating to the election. And, assuming that the employer follows this course, the amount of litigation before the regional offices of the Board will increase dramatically.

Second, under the committee bill, 150 percent backpay would be awarded to an employee where there was an illegal discharge, layoff, or refusal to reinstate. Significantly, there is no qualifying language in this provision concerning voluntary unemployment or duty of mitigation. It seems perfectly obvious that if an employer stands to have 150 percent backpay assessed against him he will vigorously litigate that issue. Under these circumstances, he has very little to lose by contesting such an award before both the Board and the appellate courts.

Third, the committee's bill extends the Board's injunctive authority under section 10(l) of the National Labor Relations Act to section 8(a)(3) discharge cases. Under this provision, the Board would be required to seek injunctive relief to have a discharged employee reinstated during an organizational campaign if the Board's preliminary investigation convinces the Board's regional office that there is "reasonable cause" to issue a complaint.

As predicted by Mr. Irving, this provision will result in a dramatic increase of section 10(1) petitions because respondents litigating these controversial cases will be less inclined to settle the underlying unfair labor practice charges.

Unions will be more than tempted to file section 8(a)(3) charges as a matter of course against employers in hope that the Board will find merit and seek injunctive relief. It is questionable if the union will be interested in the validity of all charges at this stage because the union is seeking all the employee support it can muster. Thus, unions may merely go through the motions of filing charges to assure employees that it can provide this assistance. The Board, however, is not relieved of its duties at that stage because it must still have a hearing before an administrative law judge to decide the merits of the discharge.

A record number of cases are being filed with the Board. The backlog problem has aroused many requests for more Board members and an expansion of the staff. Yet, the bill would cause those problems to multiply many fold.

Since the Board's primary purpose is to serve the public interest by reducing interruptions in commerce caused by industrial strife, a premium is placed on the expeditious handling of cases. It is, however, difficult to understand how the Board can cope with the anticipated increases of cases resulting from this legislation.

Similarly, the likely increase of litigation in the Federal courts should not be taken lightly. Indeed, there is great concern in the Federal judiciary over other recent congressional action. There is too little consideration given to the increased caseload caused by the new legislation.

In sum, there is very little question that this bill will result in an enormous increase of cases before the Board and the Federal courts. Unless congress is willing to significantly expand the number of personnel in the Board's regional office and increase the number of Federal judges, it is clear that the backlog of cases will mount. Adding governmental employees with its attendant cost in the millions of dollars is, of course, contrary to the administration's avowed goals of reducing the bureaucracy and cutting Government spending.

The added costs to the Government will not be nearly as significant as the extra inflationary pressure due to increased price levels. When employers must pay excessive awards to employees and suffer through more labor unrest, prices for consumers must rise. The inevitable result will be more pressure on the inflation which the present administration has been unable to control.

The inevitable result will be more pressure on the inflation which the present administration has been unable to control.

Unquestionably the most important and difficult economic problem facing America is our continuing high rate of inflation. When President Ford left office, the inflation had gone below 6 percent. Now, only 2½ years later—or less than that, actually a year and a half later—approaching double digits.

The Carter administration has publicly stated that controlling inflation is the No. 1 economic concern at this time. I am glad that the administration has begun recognizing what most Americans have known for a long time. The American working people have realized the importance of inflation every time they go to the store and every time more is taken out of their paycheck to pay for taxes. This year the average American worked until May 6 to pay his Federal tax bill.

Two of the primary causes of inflation relate directly to the Government. Both of these problems will only be intensified by passage of this labor law reform bill. The biggest cause is deficit spending of an unprecedented magnitude by the Federal Government. The other important trend is the imposition by the Government of nonproductive costs on business through regulation and interference with the economics of the marketplace.

I am going to address the sections of this bill in order and illustrate why this bill can be expected to add to the rate of inflation. Virtually every section of this bill can be shown to be an inflationary influence. Therefore, the benefits of the sections must be carefully weighed against these additional costs before a decision is made on them.

SECTION 2—NEW BOARD MEMBERS

The first substantive section of the bill is section 2. This portion adds two new members to the NLRB. This would increase the Board's membership from 5 to 7.

That may not seem like a great deal to the American people, to add only two additional Federal employees—though highly paid Federal employees—but in addition, these two employees will have large staffs, an added cost that will directly affect the taxpayers, and go against what the President is advocating, a more streamlined, responsive Government for the American people.

Obviously the addition of these two members will have a significant cost directly to the Government. Along with these new members will come the inevitable staff increases and building space demands.

The committee report cites statistics of the increase in number of cases and the length of time needed to decide them as justification for the new members. While additional members may be needed, the committee has accepted the statistics uncritically. The Senator from Kansas wonders whether some internal procedures of the NLRB could be responsible for the delays. The questions also occurs whether Congress would ever be ready to reduce the size of the Board if the caseload were to decrease. Given the present troubles that unions are having in organizing, a decrease in the work of the Board is a definite possibility.

SECTION 3—ALJ LAW CLERKS

Section 3 of the bill permits the appointment of law clerks to administrative law judges (ALJ's). The bill does not place a limit on the number of clerks that may be hired under this provision. This section also requires ALJ's to write short form decisions.

The reason for this section is the time lapse between a hearing and the decision of the ALJ. While I agree that steps need to be taken to shorten this time, I must question the analogy in the report between ALJ's and district judges in the need for law clerks. The ALJ hears cases in only one area and should develop considerable expertise which a district court judge can not match. It would seem that the better and less costly approach would be to see how much effect the shorter opinions have before spending more money for law clerks.

SECTION 4—EQUAL ACCESS

One of the most controversial provisions is contained in section 4. The provision for equal access involves fundamental questions of property rights and the equality of opportunity to speak.

On its face, this section would not seem to cost the Government anything. Yet a closer analysis reveals possibilities of significant outlays. Because this section will allow the NLRB to force employers to let union organizers on their premises, a constitutional challenge is certain. Members of the bar have characterized this as a taking of property without due process of law. The Government would be an essential party to any such suit.

Assuming that the constitutional challenge is not successful, a number of cases before the NLRB will occur. Regardless of the specificity of the rules, there will be challenges to the application of the rules in a given circumstance. An unknown amount of the NLRB's time may be spent hearing these new complaints and challenges. The Senator from Kansas has not been convinced that unions have been severely handicapped by not speaking to the employees as a group. Given the other opportunities that unions enjoy that business does not, the wisdom of adopting this equal access approach with its concurrent costs must be severely questioned.

SECTION 6—QUICK ELECTIONS

Section 6 of H.R. 8410 would set strict time limits for the holding of representation and decertification elections. The election would have to be held not less than 21 nor more than 30 days after a petition is filed.

One of the most heavily sought after provisions in this bill by labor organizations has been the strict time limits for elections. The Senator from Kansas does not object to time limits unless they will operate to deny employees the opportunity to make a reasoned, unpressured decision.

Placing the entire election process in a short time limit will intensify the feelings and reduce the accommodations that normally occur.

I might suggest that changes do occur in election campaigns, whether it is in this kind of an election or in some political election.

I can recall an election in 1976 when President Ford, at one point, was 30 points behind in the polls. On election day he was less than 2 points behind. So changes do occur, and there must be a reasonable time for both sides to present their views, and, even more important, because the interested party, in this case the employee and in the other case the voter, needs time to assess, judge, analyze, and scrutinize the candidates, or in this case the bargaining units, and then make a judgment based on those facts. I believe that placing the entire election process in a short time limit will intensify the feelings and probably reduce the accommodations that normally occur. Employers will be forced to challenge the selection of the bargaining unit in order to stall the election long enough to respond to the union's claims. An increase in the number of unfair labor practice charges can also be foreseen due to the more intense lobbying and campaigning that will occur in the shorter time period.

Each of these reactions to the time limits will entail more work for the NLRB. More cases will be argued before the administrative law judges and more elections will be set aside and have to be held again. Many of the most serious problems would be avoided by making the time limits more reasonable. For example, the time could start running from when the bargaining unit is established rather than from when the petition is filed.

SECTION 8—DEBARMENT

The debarment portion of the bill, section 8, would forbid the granting of Government contracts to any company that violates a final order of the NLRB. Rather than the parties working out a settlement, the Government through the NLRB would inflict the punishment on the business.

I might suggest that ways to address the business community if it is intransigent, if it is not cooperative, if it refuses to comply, ought to be devised. However, who is going to carry the burden of this kind of arrangement?

Unfortunately, the persons who will bear the biggest part of the costs of this section will be the employees themselves. They will be the ones who are put out of work when the Government contract is cancelled. The employees will be the ones out on the street trying to find new employment.

Not the employers, but the employees, the working men and women.

And while perhaps not as significant as the impact on employees, additional cost to the Government is to be expected under the assumption that Government contracts go to the lowest bidder, the Government will have to pay more to another contractor, though this in itself should not be the sole factor.

For those employees who are put on the unemployment rolls, the Government will incur more welfare and unemployment compensation expenses. The employer is certain to litigate any imposition of this penalty if Government contracts are a major part of his business. The costs of that suit will also be borne partially by the NLRB in defending its order.

Before going to the next section, the Senator from Kansas wants to again make the point that this section is at odds with the fundamental purpose of the Labor-Management Act. This section does not protect employee rights, but rather forces them to carry the biggest part of the burden under this section. This change in thrust of the act from a remedial focus to a punitive one bothers the Senator from Kansas greatly. There ought to be a better way to have compliance from the employer without indirectly punishing the employee.

SECTION 9—BACK PAY

Under section 9, the NLRB also is given the authority to award employees compensation for the period of delay in bargaining caused by an unfair labor practice. The Senator from Kansas agrees that the employees should receive an amount equal to their actual damages suffered due to the unfair labor practice. However, the bill would end up granting employees excessive amounts in many cases.

The awards may be too large because of the inflator that the committee has chosen to put in the bill. Given that inflation will always be present, the committee wisely chose to increase the back pay to compensate for that factor. The choice of the measure to be used in calculating the back pay was not as wise. The bill would use the wage increases from major collective-bargaining settlements. This measure is derived from settlements involving 5,000 or more workers. Since the average bargaining unit is around 50 employees, a significant degree of distortion is being introduced.

The distortion is certain to be on the high side. Major settlements have traditionally been larger than that of smaller companies. Also, major settlements are always front loaded. This means that a larger portion of the total increase is in the first year of a multiyear contract. The statistics for the first 3 months of 1978 offer an excellent example.

The first year changes for these settlements averaged 14.6 percent. The adjustments for the life of the contracts was only 8.5 percent, a number which more closely parallels the cost-of-living index, though it is higher under this administration. The bill would impose settlements like 14.6 percent on small businesses which would not have approached those numbers in any kind of bargaining.

A more sensible approach would be to adopt the Consumer Price Index or some other measure which would more fairly reflect the costs of business across the Nation. I am certain that a more appropriate index can be applied for these cases.

SECTION 11—PRELIMINARY INJUNCTIONS

Section 11 would require the NLRB to petition for a temporary injunction to reinstate a discriminatorily discharged employee. This remedy is limited to cases occurring in a representational campaign before the first contract is signed or during a campaign to deauthorize or decertify a union.

While the Senator from Kansas would favor any provision that helps an employee who is unfairly discharged assert his rights, this section would not accomplish its stated goals. The injunction is simply unsuited to remedy the problem.

Most discharge cases depend on the motivations and credibility of the employer and employee. A temporary injunction issued by a district court judge may be given without in-court testimony. The requirements of a full scale hearing with sworn, in-person testimony are not consistent with the procedures for a temporary injunction.

The remedy would also be costly due to a duplication of effort. After the employee files an unfair labor practice petition under section 10(l) of the NLRA, both parties would have to appear befor an administrative law judge regardless of the outcome on the temporary injunction. The traditional method of relief has been payment of money damages to the employee. This remedy has not been shown to be inadequate. If it is adequate, the Senator from Kansas does not see why we should impose another remedy which will clog the Board and the courts at a substantial expense.

SECTION 13—ILLEGAL WORK STOPPAGES

Section 13 of the act relates to stranger picketing. Stranger picketing is any picketing of an employer by nonemployees on behalf of a union with whom the employer has had no bargaining relationship. An employer would be able to obtain an injunction against stranger picketing. Unlike present law, no injunctive relief would be granted against a wildcat strike. A wildcat strike, in the context of this bill, is a work stoppage undertaken by union members without official authorization or sanction from the union. Injunctions would not be given if the picket line is maintained by a labor organization in connection with a labor dispute.

As I have previously discussed, this section will be a stimulant to increased litigation. Both the NLRB and the courts will bear the burden of this increasing litigation. This section undermines the principle of collective bargaining by denying an employer access to a court to enforce a no-strike clause in a contract.

If an employer can no longer be assured that the union will be held to its no-strike commitment, a decay in the collective bargaining process will certainly occur. More labor unrest and the resultant increase in cases for the NLRB will not only cost the Government money but also work against the avowed principle of the bill to promote industrial peace.

Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas has not covered every section in this bill. Several sections would make changes in the National Labor Relations Act which would not be significant from a cost perspective.

Also, I am not suggesting that every section of the bill that I have referred to should be defeated because of the costs involved. Some provisions may be meritorious enough to justify their price tags. Nevertheless, the point which must be made is that the higher costs of this bill cannot be ignored.

The committee report states that enactment of this legislation will only cost the Government $1 million for each additional board member and $210,000 for new law clerks. Assuming these figures are correct, these are significant expenditures. However, the report then states that:

> Other provisions of the bill have no direct cost impact: However, they may increase the workload and the staff requirements of the National Labor Relations Board. We are unable to estimate these possible indirect costs at this time.

It seems to the Senator from Kansas that these "indirect" costs will be far more significant than the salary of two new members. Yet, the Senate is not even given an estimate of the total cost. We are asked to make a decision without enough information. We are asked to pass on any cost to the American taxpayer who feels heavily burdened already with increased costs in Government, in Congress, in agencies, in social security taxes.

It seems to the Senator from Kansas that these indirect costs will be far more significant than the salary of the two new members.

While the failure to estimate the costs to the Government is disturbing, the next section of the report causes me even more concern. The report states:

> The committee believes that this legislation will result in decreased labor strife, will reduce the number of labor disputes, and will considerably shorten the time it takes to resolve them. . . . For this reason, the committee determines that the legislation will have no detrimental economic impact on the individual, consumers, and businesses affected.

With due respect to the committee members, the Senator from Kansas finds this conclusion very interesting but tenuous. In several prior speeches, I have listed the ways in which this bill will increase litigation and filing of unfair labor practice petitions. This increased litigation will inevitably cost consumers and businesses more money. Because I do not accept the premise of the committee, I do not agree with their conclusion.

Unfortunately, the figures from which exact cost estimates may be made are not available to the Senator from Kansas. Yet, it would not be unreasonable to assume that the tab for consumers and businesses and employers will run into millions of dollars. Each Member of the Senate should carefully weigh these additional costs before making a decision on this bill.

(Mr. WILLIAMS assumed the chair.)

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, it seems to me that what we are trying to do in this debate, is to come to grips with the real problem. I would like to address later today what I consider to be punitive provisions in this so-called reform bill.

I yield the floor.

Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, earlier in the debate today, we heard, first of all, a colloquy and then remarks by both the distinguished minority leader, the Senator from Tennessee (Mr. BAKER), and Senator ORRIN HATCH, of Utah, about the Cambridge Reports, Inc., survey, in which Cambridge attempted to do three things: To measure attitudes toward labor law reform in this country presently; to determine what kind of reforms people want, if any, and how they react to reforms currently before Congress; and, finally, to look at how attitudes toward labor unions, business, and some other issues may affect their attitudes toward labor law and labor law reform.

I was deeply pleased that this survey could be made available at this timely juncture in the debate, in that in previous remarks I have made on other occations, we have tried to address these issues as pertinent to the debate on S. 2467. Clearly, the assertion that I have been making and that others have been making on the floor of the Senate is that there is a desire for labor law reform in the country and that it is strongly felt. As a matter of fact, in the Cambridge survey, 45 percent of the country apparently believes that we ought to be involved here in Congress in labor law reform. At least, there is an affirmative answer by 45 percent that changes need to be made. Only 21 percent feel that there is no need for change currently.

I think that those percentages are not only indicative of the public mood, but it is abundantly clear to any Member of this body who visits with constituents that there is, indeed, dissatisfaction with labor law in the country. The point that this Senator and others have been attempting to make throughout the debate, and we think is still important to consider, is that the public, generally, throughout the United States of America, have a very different idea of the type of labor law reform that is required.

Indeed, when the Cambridge Reports, Inc., asked people in an open ended question, "What kinds of changes do you think are needed?" the first and overwhelming response by 28 percent of the people, just in terms of total recall, said something to the effect that unions have too much power, unions are too strong, unions want to take over. This was the immediate response by far the largest group of people who had an attitude with regard to labor law reform.

Of course, that attitude works almost totally at cross purposes with the intent of those who are advocating Senate bill 2467. Indeed, this sentiment that is abundant in the public is totally ignored, really, by the nature of the legislation before us.

If we drop to the second thought that people in this country have on their minds, and I go back again to the Cambridge Reports poll, is for provisions against strikes, time limit on strikes, no union should be able to cripple the country, teachers and police officers should not be able to strike.

Once again, that is a sentiment that any Senator here who has ears to hear, who is open to constituents back in our home States. If there is an initial sentiment that the tilt in the country has gone too strongly toward labor, the second major concern of the public is that, in critical areas of service—policemen, firemen, teachers, sanitary workers—or in national strikes, such as the coal strike that cripple the country, there ought to be some remedy under law for the ordinary citizen in order that the ordinary citizen might retain his or her job in the face of that kind of dispute or, at least, maintain property and person with some degree of safety.

I mention these because, as we go on down through the other sorts of changes that are suggested by the public, by the people of this country—not by businesses or labor unions or Members of Congress, but by the people—additional thoughts the people have are that we ought to have labor law that gets rid of corrupt people, gets mobs out of the union. Three percent of the people mentioned this, in immediate recall.

We have the thought of 2 percent that people should have a choice whether to join a union or not as an item of labor law reform; a suggestion that we need more arbitration and cooperation between management and workers mentioned by 2 percent.

I suspect that it is equally fair to mention that there are, on the other side of the coin, 7 percent of the people who say that labor law reform, to them, means higher wages. We need more money, higher minimum wage, or raising of the wages. Five percent say we need labor law reform that would offer better protection to blacks, to women, to those who are in senior citizen status. Four percent believe labor law reform ought to lead to better benefits and better pensions.

I suspect that these are the thoughts that come to mind as labor law reform is suggested. One of the baffling things for the general public throughout this debate is to get any handle on what we are talking about, because labor law reform, to the public, means the things that I have cited and the things that are reiterated in Pat Caddell's poll, of Cambridge Reports, Inc. This is what the public is thinking about.

The problem, of course, Mr. President, is that, in order to try to draw all of this down to the very narrow focus of what we have been talking about, the question is raised:

> One possible change in the labor law being considered would make it easier for unions to recruit new members in companies where they are not currently represented. Do you think this change is needed or not?

As we heard earlier this morning, 33 percent of the public said yes, the change is needed; 41 percent said no, the change is not needed; 26 percent are not sure. On balance, when asking the public whether labor law ought to be changed to ease recruiting of new members by labor unions, the public, by 33 to 41, says no.

To narrow this a little further, Cambridge Reports, Inc., asked this question:

> In general, do you think the rules by which unions gain the right to represent employees need to be made easier for the unions or not?

That, of course, is the gist of this bill, S. 2467. Twenty-two percent said yes, the rules should be made easier; 48 percent said no, they should not be made easier.

I do not know how a question could be phrased more clearly. It gets to the heart of the matter as to whether people in this country believe that the rules of the game ought to be changed to assist unions. Very clearly, by over 2 to 1, people think, no, that would not be in the best interest of the public.

During the course of this debate, we have had discussion of some provisions of the bill and the so-called equal access provision has been high in our consideration.

Then the public is asked about that type of situation through this question, which I quote:

> One possible change in the labor law would allow labor union organizers to go onto the property of businesses at any time, including working time, and try to recruit members. Do you favor or oppose this idea?

Well, 17 percent said they favored it. Sixty-five percent said they opposed it. Eighteen percent said they did not know.

Mr. President, admittedly, this is a rough-cut at the public sentiment, and the refinements of the debate have suggested that those who have drafted the law have tried to contrive the circumstances in which there is not unlimited access, which access occurs and is triggered by certain events. Indeed, during the course of this debate that may be amended further or, at least, colloquies may occur that could refine the concept.

But, basically, the American public does not see very much equity in the thought that labor organizers could go onto the property of business on working time and recruit members.

There is something that offends a sense of justice as one thinks of the small employer, who has been mentioned frequently in this debate, allowing someone on the premises, on his time, on his money, arguing this situation.

However, many times we may want to try to refine this backward and forward, I would suggest that percentages of 17 for and 65 against are substantial and simply are not going to give much solace to those who are pushing the so-called equal access provision.

In short, Mr. President, what clearly emerges from the Cambridge report, and it is consistent with the Opinion Research Corp. report of last December that has been cited extensively in our debates, is that, by and large, a number of people in this country are skeptical of big business, of big labor, of big government. All three come off rather poorly.

Mr. President, when we take a look at the causes for inflation and the difficulties with regard to this, very clearly, the public is not in favor of tilting the rules of the game to assist one of these parties at this point to create at least a danger of greater inflation or of greater union power.

Now, given this disposition on the part of the public, I felt it was useful, Mr. President, to initiate my discussion in this way this morning, and I want to take the balance of my time during this speech in discussing a very good analysis of the National Labor Relations Board and the evolution of the legislation that we are now looking at.

This particular analysis comes from an administrative appraisal of the National Labor Relations Board written by the former Chairman of the NLRB, Edward Miller.

Mr. Miller was asked by the University of Pennsylvania, the industrial research unit, in 1977, to compose his thoughts about the evolution of the National Labor Relations Board prior to his tenure and during his service. He has done so, I think, in an exemplary volume that was copyrighted in 1977 by the trustees of the University of Pennsylvania.

Mr. Miller proceeds through a history of the National Labor Relations Board in a volume that is superb for students of the labor relations legislative process and those of us who are attempting to find out more about that during this debate.

But at the present time I would like to cite chapter 10, which is entitled "The NLRB, How Can We Make It Work Better?"

That clearly is the narrow focus of labor reform as we are taking a look at it, and although I have suggested the American public, by and large, would like to take a look at all of those other things as we discuss labor law reform, for the benefit of the debate I would like to cite chapter 10 of Mr. Miller, and he starts with a subtitle, "The Advantages and Disadvantages of Past Changes.":

THE ADVANTAGES AND DISADVANTAGES OF PAST CHANGES

It must be remembered, first of all, that the machinery is now over forty years old, that the improvements to the machinery over those years have been minor, and any redesign virtually nonexistent. Perhaps the most significant repair was to separate the General Counsel from the decision-making side of the agency. This was a policy change, not intended to improve efficiency, though improved efficiency has been one of its results.

The delegation of decision-making authority to regional directors in representation cases was another repair and has been much touted as effecting a major improvement in the Board's procedures. But a close look at the data strongly suggests that its impact on promptness and efficiency has probably been much overrated. It has, however, been of some value in enabling the agency to cope with its ever-increasing case load.

Effective implementation of standards of timeliness and standards of performance have been accomplished primarily by sound administration from within rather than by any repair or redesign from without. The Congress has not had to tamper with the basic structure of the agency in order to make most of the General Counsel's operations efficient. That efficiency has been enforced by General Counsels dedicated to improving timeliness and productivity and who are assisted by career administrators who have followed through and implemented the intent of the presidentially appointed General Counsels.

In insisting that the Board employ no attorneys except as assistants to individual Board members, the Congress may well have done a good judicial deed; but in doing that deed, it also created an administrative problem. This external "repair" has encouraged each Board member to build his own little kingdom and has effectively deprived the chairman or any administrator on the decision-making side of the agency of any opportunity for centralized control of timeliness or performance on the "Board side" of the agency. Similarly, in enacting the Administrative Procedures Act, the Congress may also have done a good judicial deed, but that "repair," too, created an administrative hardship; for, at least as it has worked out in practice, the "judicial independence" conferred by that Act seems to have rendered the Board and the administrative staff of its Division of Judges virtually impotent in adopting and enforcing administrative controls over the first-line decision-making function.

In sum, external repair and redesign seem to have helped the General Counsel by making him independent and giving him authority to run his own show, but the external repairs to the Board side of the agency have probably, in toto, hurt, rather than helped, the administrative effectiveness of the decision-making side of the agency.

REORGANIZATION PLAN 5

The major piece of external redesign and repair which has been seriously proposed over the Board's forty-year history, but not accepted, was President Kennedy's so-called Plan 5, which would have enabled the Board to review more cursorily many of the decisions of its administrative law judges and to be selective about those to which it would give more thorough review. The plan was defeated in the Congress some years ago.

Whatever one may think of the merits of that proposal—and one's opinions on that score are likely to be shaped by one's opinions of the ability and judiciousness of the current corps of administrative law judges—the statistics demonstrate that it would have had a relatively minor effect in improving timeliness. When one looks at the entire time span from filing of charge to entry of enforceable court decision, one discovers that the Board's assembly line review process takes a median time of about 130 days, of which at least 30 days is dead waiting time while briefs are being filed and other mechanics of the appeal are taking place. This means the Board's actual decision-making time runs, on the median, slightly over three months. Even if a provision for more cursory review could cut this time in half, only about one and one-half to two months could be saved out of a total two-year process.

Although former Chairman Murphy once estimated that this Plan 5 variety of certiorari approach could save 180 days in case-processing time, one can find no rational basis for such a prediction. A maximum saving of from 45 to 60 days seems more in line with reality if one examines carefully the segments of time involved in processing cases, Thus, while in virtually every session of the Congress someone seeks to breathe life back into this previously defeated plan, it must be doubted whether such a change would have any major effect on the dispatch with which the Board exercises its decision-making function.

Former Chairman Murphy also appointed a task force of labor, management, and public members to review internal Board procedures and processes and to recommend improvements in efficiency and performance which would not require external repair or redesign. As was predictable, although the task force labored conscientiously and formulated some sixty-nine recommendations, most of which the Board has now adopted, none of them are going to effect any fundamental change or improvement in the operation of the system. They could not be expected to do so. Both the Board and the General Counsel have, over the years, given a good deal of attention to administrative matters, and no outside group was likely, particularly on the basis of a relatively short period of study, to hit upon previously undiscovered means of improvement. The changes will, in large part, affect neither timetables nor costs to any significant degree. A few are doomed to predictable failure, such as the recommendation that administrative law judges be "prodded" to increase their timeliness and to improve their productivity. We have pointed out why such "prodding" has not been and cannot really be effective within the present system. Thus, this recommended "jaw-boning" will probably be about as effective as some other jawboning which the federal government has attempted within the last decade or two.

THE LABOR REFORM ACT

Representative Frank Thompson of New Jersey has introduced legislation in the form of a bill called the Labor Reform Act of 1977 (H.R. 77),[1] allegedly intended to correct deficiencies in the operation of the Act which Congressman Thompson says he has discovered in the fourteen years he has served as chairman of the House Labor Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations. As pointed out in the Daily Labor Report for January 6, 1977, this bill "is similar and consolidates several measures proposed during the last Congress by Thompson. . . ."[2]

Plan 5—Again

One of these warmed-over suggestions is yet another attempt to breathe life back into Reorganization Plan 5 in the same manner as had been embodied in H.R. 8110 in the 94th Congress, First Session, 1975. We have already pointed out how that plan would merely further accentuate the cursory nature of Board review and would not materially shorten the total time lapse between filing of a charge and entry of an enforceable court order.

Election proceedings

Another portion of the Thompson bill is addressed to the Board's election processes. It would require that if disputes over the appropriate bargaining unit or the eligibility to vote of specific employees are not resolved after forty-five days following the filing of an election petition, the Board must nevertheless go ahead and conduct an election in the unit designated by the union. We have already pointed out that the Board's record in the conduct of elections is a very good one, and that timetables on the whole are very satisfactory. The Thompson proposal, while well-intended, would probably have the unfortunate effect of dragging out election proceedings. A challenge to a unit would, in many instances, take place only after the election, thus leaving the results of the election in doubt and increasing the number of cases in which a rerun election would have to be held because some defect was found in the unit. The proposed procedure would have the surface appeal of having elections conducted quickly, but holding an election is of no real value to anyone, particularly the employees in the unit, if the result of the election has little likelihood of finality.

It would also seem reasonable that delays in the postelection procedures would be more likely, since the pressure which currently builds to get problems out of the way so that the election can be held would be materially reduced. The election would have already been held, and there would be no other clearly identifiable dramatic event to motivate the staff to meet time targets. Time targets artificially set without such visible real targets are more difficult to administer. The proposal thus seems addressed to a very small problem (those few cases in which prompt elections are not held today) and may have the opposite effect of creating substantial time delays in many election cases because it can open the door to postelection unit challenges which are not now possible.

Mr. President, I submit that this particular analysis of the election procedure, of the timing of elections is important. Admittedly, it is the testimony and the opinion of only one man, although in this case a veteran observer, a former chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, who is commenting about one of the critical elements of the bill we have been discussing.

To sum it up in its most rudimentary form, the suggestion has been made by the proponents of this bill that justice could be obtained for employees and for those intending to organize them by guaranteeing an election fairly early on.

What is being suggested by Mr. Miller is that this, in essence, is an illusion: First of all, that in most cases elections are held fairly rapidly, and we have ample testimony to this effect. What Mr. Miller is suggesting, however, is that in the event that the election timing is accelerated and that many of the elements with regard to the paricular unit that is to be involved have not been finalized, we are very likely to see, after the election is held, a stringing out of the procedures in which the Board under no particular compulsion, manages to spend almost as much time as before; that, in fact, it is unlikely, given the analysis of Mr. Miller, that the so-called speedy election provision will lead to speedier elections. As a matter of fact, Mr. Miller is suggesting that in those cases we would have a stringing out of justice and decisionmaking and, therefore, that this particular pattern of having quick elections is unwise, if we truly are going about the thought of an earnest and prompt resolution of the difficulty.

I submit that, for this debate, all honest men and women on the floor of the Senate will differ in their judgments, but that if our intent is truly to make certain that we have quick elections, we had best pause for a second and think out rapidly how it is that we finally get to total decisions, as opposed to initial impressions that the election may bring about.

Mr. Miller continues:

ENCOURAGEMENT OF MANEUVERS FOR DELAY

The proposal presents a further problem. Although designed to prevent game playing for delay, it may well encourage just such game playing. An employer or union today will agree to a unit description so long as it can obtain a date for an election which is suitable, and will enter into an agreement for an election and waive its rights to a hearing.

The sophisticated practitioner knows that he can obtain somewhere between four and eight weeks if he agrees to an election, because the Board and the other parties know he can obtain about that much time if he raises issues and insists on a hearing. So, in most cases, an agreement is reached on that basis, and no hearings are necessary. Under Thompson's proposed legislation, there is no incentive for the parties to reach such an agreement. If they do not, the election will be held after at least forty-five days, and no party will have waived its right to a hearing.

Mr. President, obviously the 45 days suggested here refers to the initial legislation that Representative THOMPSON introduced as a forerunner of the debate that we are having here.

Thus, any experienced labor attorney—and there are over 8,000 of them now practicing—will, doubtless, advise his client not to agree to an election. The Board will hold the election anyway; and if either the employer or a nonpetitioning but interested union does not like how the election comes out, it can then demand a hearing and delay the certification until after the hearing and a Board decision. Because this will substantially increase the number of "R" case hearings, the Board's workload will enjoy an immediate bulge, and there will be delays resulting from the Board's inability to cope with that increase. The net result—further delay.

CARD-CHECK RECOGNITION

Thompson's bill would also permit certification of a union if at least 55 percent of the workers in an appropriate unit are shown to be members by card check. This is a highly controversial policy matter and is not really a procedural reform at all. It would represent a substantial and serious change in direction in the federal labor policy. In a discussion directed primarily at the administration of the law rather than at its substance, we would point out only that, because card-check recognition has been and is so highly charged with emotion, it is only reasonable to expect widespread contests of certifications if this provision were to become law. There would be endless litigation of the circumstances under which each card was signed, whether there was any fraud or misrepresentation involved, and so on. Imagine the length of a hearing in which the circumstances of the signing of each card in a thousand-person unit will be subject to examination and cross-examination of both the card signer and any witnesses to the signing! It is difficult to imagine a more successful means of clogging the Board's calendar and creating total administrative chaos.

SELF-ENFORCING BOARD ORDERS

The Thompson bill also attempts to make Board orders "self-enforcing," unless and until a court of appeals either sets them aside or orders, upon petition of the respondents, the order stayed pending determination of the appeal. This change could substantially affect the timetable for effectuating compliance with Board orders, if the courts of appeals are chary with respect to issuing stays. Court review time is, as we have pointed out earlier in this appraisal, a substantial delay factor.

I am happy to yield to the majority leader.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator from Indiana.

ORDER TO PROCEED TO CONSIDERATION OF H.R. 8423 at 3 P.M. TODAY AND TIME-LIMITATION AGREEMENT

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a message from the House of Representatives on H.R. 8423, renal disease, be laid before the Senate at 3 p.m. today with a 20-minute limitation on a motion to concur in the House amendment to the Senate amendment, the time to be equally divided between Mr. TALMADGE and Mr. CURTIS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today to hear witnesses on S. 2626, comprehensive farm legislation. This request has been cleared on the minority side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today to hear witnesses on S. 3064, aircraft noise reduction legislation. This request has been cleared on the minority side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Foreign Relations be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate today to hear witnesses on diplomatic immunity legislation (H.R. 7819, S. 476, S. 477, S. 478, S. 1256 and S. 1257). This request has been cleared on the minority side.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

APPOINTMENT OF CONFEREE—S. 1633

Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. DECONCINI be appointed as a conferee to the conference asked by the Senate on S. 1633.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LABOR LAW REFORM ACT OF 1978

The Senate continued with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. LUGAR. I am pleased to yield at this time to the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I appreciate the distinguished Senator from Indiana yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield the floor?

Mr. LUGAR. I am yielding the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, S. 2467, the proposal to amend the National Labor Relations Act, has caused much concern and certainly has led to conflicting views between management and labor.

As one who has not specialized in labor law but who has examined the bill and the report of the Committee on Human Resources, I do not consider the measure as beneficial to labor as some of the proponents believe, nor as damaging to business as some of the opponents indicate. Nevertheless, the bill does appear designed so that the National Labor Relations Board can handle more disputes and I am fearful that it would tend to stimulate friction between labor and management although a prosperous and expanding economy should be helpful to both management and labor. I believe we need less friction and doubt that it will be achieved by more litigation.

It would appear that we should consider not only the labor relations aspect, but all of the problems that business and industry face.

It is doubtful that many will disagree with the notion that a full level of industrial activity in our country means jobs: and that spells economic health from which all segments of our economy benefit.

Therefore, it would appear that we as legislators ought to be mindful of the impact that particular bills will have on the Nation's general economic well-being.

Mr. President, despite generally good levels of economic activity in the country these past few years, there is apprehension over the general functioning of the economy. And this is reflected in various polls which show people concerned, for example, by the unchecked inflation that is reducing the value of the dollar.

The American economy has tremendous underlying strength, and our people are as creative and productive as those anywhere.

But the American businessman does face problems increasing productivity and, therefore, it would appear that our legislative efforts should be directed toward more positive steps that will stimulate investment and production, which is an important anti-inflationary step.

I believe that we should continue to press for relief from the growing regulatory burden that is sapping the strength of our industrial sector. It is extremely important that the growing power and scope of our regulators be curbed and then rolled back so that businessmen can spend more time managing, competing, and producing and less time coping with bureaucratic redtape.

It was pleasant to learn yesterday, Mr. President, that the Supreme Court had ruled a section of the Occupational, Health and Safety Act permitting surprise inspections of the business community to be contrary to the constitutional provision against unreasonable searches and seizures without a warrant.

Mr. President, redtape, the uncertainty and expense of an overwhelming tide of Federal regulations constitutes an enormous part of the cost of doing business. Business taxes, like any other expenses, must ultimately be recovered in prices if private business is to survive.

Businessmen have indicated that it is sometimes more difficult to get environmental approval for a new plant than to continue operating an older plant which contributes more to air and water pollution.

So between inflation, taxes, problems of raising capital, the regulatory and paperwork burden on American industry—each of which affects its ability to generate jobs, I believe we ought to consider carefully any additional legislation that could make matters worse.

At a time when business and industry is attempting to cope with so many problems—when the business of marshaling our national efforts to raise productivity, to compete with foreign nations and provide jobs should be the major order of the day—we have embarked on the consideration of a bill that appears to depart from our present labor policy, a policy which over the past generation has served our country well.

Mr. President, I shall read from a portion of a report prepared by the Congressional Research Service of the Library of Congress, and it is entitled "How the National Labor Relations Act Works," and that is how the present law works:

The National Labor Relations Act, as amended, is the basic Federal law governing collective bargaining between employers and their employees in the private sector. The act is designed in part to lessen industrial disputes by establishing protected rights of employees to join or not to join union organizations and to bargain with their employers over issues such as wages and working conditions.

The act also defines various unlawful actions of employers or unions which are unfair labor practices, and provides for the prevention of these practices by remedial action.

The quasi-judicial National Labor Relations Board, composed of five members appointed by the President for five-year terms, was established to administer, to implement and enforce the provisions of the NLRA. It does not initiate actions but responds to requests for elections or to charges of unfair labor practices.

The general counsel and his staff investigate and prosecute unfair labor practice cases and conduct secret ballot representation elections to determine what union, if any, a majority of the workers of the unit want to represent them.

Unfair labor practice hearings are conducted by NLRB administrative law judges who use the rules of evidence and procedure that apply in United States Federal District Courts.

Based on the hearings, the hearing record, the judges make findings and recommendations to the board. The five-member board settles representations questions and decides unfair labor practice cases. If the board finds that an unfair labor practice has been or is being committed it may order the violator to cease and desist the practice or other appropriate affirmative action, such as reinstating an employee with back pay, refund or illegally collected dues or the posting of notices of cessation of the practice.

The board may ask for a court injunction in some unfair labor practice cases, and is required by law to seek injunctions preventing certain types of union picketing or work stoppages. If the employer or union does not voluntarily comply with the board order, the board may ask for a court order requiring compliance with the original order. Any person may file a final board order in the United States Court of Appeals.

The strength of the National Labor Relations Act has been its balanced approach to resolving labor-management disputes, and for many years there has been a hesitancy to change the act from one of impartiality to one that can become a punitive device.

For roughly 40 years, the act has only twice been substantially altered—those alterations being the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 and the Landrum-Griffin Act, known as the Labor-Management Act of 1959.

Many constituents visiting our office from various parts of Virginia have indicated that the measure before us will produce greater management resistance, stimulate more litigation, and lead to more labor strife than presently exists.

It seems to be popular to utilize the word "reform" in the title of a bill, or some similar terminology conveying a good connotation, to gain support for a measure; and I do not say this in criticism of the sponsors of proposals, but it does appear that each of us should look within the bill to determine its thrust rather than to vote based on the title or enacting clause.

The underlying philosophy in forming the National Labor Relations Board was to protect employee rights. Many, however, appear convinced that the proposed legislation would change the philosophy to a punitive one against employers for some technical violation of the law—a violation that might easily be resolved at an informal level, rather than invoke the machinery of courts and injunctions.

We might look at a few of the key provisions of the proposal:

Section 2 amends the act to expand the membership of the Board from five to seven members, and lengthens the terms of the members from 5 to 7 years.

It would not appear that adding two additional members or lengthening their terms would result necessarily in more expeditious consideration of business before the Board. Although S. 2467 does authorize a group of three Board members to summarily affirm decisions of administrative law judges in unfair labor practice cases when appropriate upon motion for summary affirmance, I am not sure whether the full seven-man Board would then, in one manner or another, affirm the decision of the three-member panel, or whether it would be final insofar as the Board is concerned.

Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from New Jersey being on the floor, being the floor manager of the bill, might be able to enlighten me on this. If the three-man panel decision is not final it would tend to constitute an additional administrative level, and if the decision of the three-member panel is final it could result in different panels coming to contrary decisions based upon similar circumstances.

I wonder if the distinguished Senator could tell me whether or not under the proposed legislation the three-man panel's decision is final insofar as the National Labor Relations Board is concerned or under his bill would there be a poll of seven members of the Board to determine, to make a final decision.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The answer is "Yes."

Mr. SCOTT. There would be a poll but not in an en banc meeting of the entire Board. They would just be polled.

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is correct.

Mr. SCOTT. I thank the distinguished Senator for his response.

If not final, it would tend to constitute an additional administrative level and, if final, it could result in different panels coming to contrary decisions based upon similar circumstances.

If there is some justification for raising the number of members from five to seven, if it could be shown how that would increase efficiency of the NLRB, a case might be made for such an increase, but the increase in the number of Board members, as well as providing law clerks for administrative law judges, appears to be empire building something that needs to be guarded against in all branches of Government. I would submit that the private sector attempts to guard against this.

It is interesting to note in this connection a tabulation of total cases received, closed, and pending for the 1977 fiscal year on page 266 of the annual report of the National Labor Relations Board. The report indicates that there were a total of 52,943 cases received during the fiscal year and 53,908 cases closed, which, of course, decreased the backlog. The tabulation indicates that there were 19,173 cases pending on October 1, 1976, but only 18,208 pending on September 30, 1977, a reduction of 965 cases during this 1-year period.

From these statistics, it would not appear that the increase in Board members is necessary; and if the three member panels resulting from the increase do in fact add another layer, it would appear to be undesirable.

Section 2 of the bill would also amend the act to provide for summary affirmance of decisions of the administrative law judges. Not too long ago, Mr. President, those now known as administrative law judges were called hearing officers and their function was to assist members of boards and commissions throughout the Government by presiding at hearings and to make recommendations to members of boards and commissions. Over the years, however, the title of hearing officers has been abandoned and general schedule of pay has been gradually increased.

Section 3 amends the act to permit the appointment of law clerks to administrative law judges who would be authorized to review transcripts and prepare drafts of opinions. Again this appears to be empire building.

As indicated, the administrative. law judges were formerly known as hearing officers or examiners and now are charged with the responsibility that would be delegated to law clerks under the bill. In other words. they serve as factfinders for the administrative agencies as well as for the executive departments. They presently make findings of fact and conclusions of law that are subject to review, approval, or reversal by agency or department heads.

Mr. President, I have a copy of a letter dated September 26, 1974, from the Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, Robert E. Hampton, to the chairman of the Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties and the Administration of Justice of the House Committee on the Judiciary. In this letter—it is a 3-page letter—he reviews somewhat the history of the hearing examiners and the metamorphosis to administrative law judges. Some would even have them become constitutional judges. But, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the letter be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HODGES). Without objection, it is so ordered.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FROM CHAIRMAN, CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION,
Washington, D.C., September 26, 1974.

Hon. ROBERT W. KASTENMEIER,
Chairman, Subcommittee on Courts, Civil Liberties, and the Administration of Justice, Committee on the Judiciary, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. KASTENMEIER: This is response to your letter of September 16, 1974, in which you ask for comment on a letter from a member of the Committee on the Judiciary. In that regard you also pose several questions relative to the action taken by the Commission on the title of persons who perform adjudicative functions under the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946.

The Act, now codified in Title 5, United States Code, places a number of responsibilities on the Commission in connection with presiding officers who conduct formal rule making and adjudicative proceedings. Since the Act did not contain a specific designation for the incumbents of these positions, the Commission had the responsibility of establishing a position title. In 1946 and 1947, after discussions with the representatives of many interested organizations, the Commission decided upon Hearing Examiner, a designation which was well accepted for several years.

The issue of a more appropriate designation first arose in 1955. The Task Force on Legal Services and Procedures of the Hoover Commission, noting the judicial role of the APA presiding officer, recommended a new title with the status of an administrative trial judge. However, the Congress did not act favorably on the recommended title of Hearing Commissioner.

In 1962 the matter surfaced again in a presentation to the Civil Service Commission. After considering oral argument that it adopt the title of Hearing Commissioner, the Commission disapproved the suggestion because it was felt that persons so titled would be confused with the officials of various agencies who held the title of Commissioner.

In 1968 suggestions were again made that consideration be given to a title more descriptive of the presiding officer functions. The Committee on Personnel of the Administrative Conference of the United States studied the matter and conducted public hearings. The question was then considered at the plenary session of the Administrative Conference but it did not take favorable action on the Committee's recommendation for a change.

With respect to legislation, bills proposing a change were introduced in 1966 and 1969. H.R. 16550, introduced by Congressman Machen on July 29, 1966 proposed a change to Administrative Judge. This bill was referred to the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the Judicial Conference. In the absence of a sufficient showing of necessity for a change, the Committee did not approve the proposal. Another bill (S. 1380), proposing a redesignation of the position to Administrative Trial Judge, was introduced on March 7, 1969 by Senator Tower, but was not enacted.

In the latter part of 1971 several Federal regulatory agencies were favorably considering the use of a title different from that of Hearing Examiner. Since the adoption of various titles in different agencies for the same position would not be in the interest of orderly and efficient administration, the Civil Service Commission amended its regulations by requiring the use of the class title of Hearing Examiner, pending a study of the question of whether a more appropriate title should be adopted. During its study, the views of the top officials of the agencies, Hearing Examiners, bar associations and practitioners before the agencies were elicited, along with the views of the Administrative Conference and members of the judiciary. After an analysis of this study, the Commission published a proposal in the Federal Register to change the title of Hearing Examiner to Administrative Law Judge as the one which most appropriately covered the kinds of proceedings and the variety of functions performed by all Hearing Examiners. The comments received in connection with this proposal were almost unanimously in favor of the proposal. Accordingly, the Commission approved a change in title to that of Administrative Law Judge. The change became effective upon publication in the Federal Register on August 19, 1972.

More recently, in February 1974, the Commission learned that the title Administrative Judge was being used in an agency by the incumbents of certain boards. These proceedings and the personnel conducting them were not subject to the provision of the APA. Accordingly, in the interest of orderly administration and to avoid confusing agency personnel, practitioners, litigants and the general public, the Commission further amended its regulation on June 6, 1974. The regulation (5 CFR 930.203a) now provides that Administrative Law Judge is the official class title for an administrative law judge position, each agency shall only use this class title for personnel, budget, fiscal and all other purposes, and may not use the word "Judge" as the title or part of the title for any other position for any purpose.

The Commission's action in connection with the designation of the presiding officer position was based on the provisions of the APA and Section 5105 of Title 5, United States Code. The latter authorizes the Commission to develop standards for classifying positions and to establish official class titles.

I trust the foregoing is responsive to your questions. If I can be of any further assistance, please let me know.

Sincerely yours,

ROBERT E. HAMPTON,
Chairman.

Mr. SCOTT. Let me read just a portion of the letter, from page 2 of the letter. Chairman Hampton says this:

In the latter part of 1971 several Federal regulatory agencies were favorably considering the use of a title different from that of Hearing Examiner. Since the adoption of various titles in different agencies for the same position would not be in the interest of orderly and efficient administration, the Civil Service Commission amended its regulations by requiring the use of the class title of Hearing Examiner, pending a study of the question of whether a more appropriate title should be adopted. During its study, the views of the top officials of the agencies, Hearing Examiners, bar associations and practitioners before the agencies were elicited, along with the views of the Administrative Conference and members of the judiciary. After an analysis of this study, the Commission published a proposal in the Federal Register to change the title of Hearing Examiner to Administrative Law Judge as the one which most appropriately covered the kinds of proceedings and the variety of functions performed by all Hearing Examiners. The comments received in connection with this proposal were almost unanimously in favor of the proposal. Accordingly, the Commission approved a change in title to that of Administrative Law Judge. The change became effective upon publication in the Federal Register on August 19, 1972.

I note that further on it states that others may not use the word "judge" as the title or part of the title for any other position or purpose.

Administrative law judges are government officials who may have considerable experience and talent, but although they are designated as "judges," they are still appointees of the particular agency they serve, and their grades are established by the Civil Service Commission. It is understood that their appointments do not require confirmation by the Congress. Certainly they are not constitutional judges.

I seriously question the need and the wisdom of providing law clerks to perform functions that are the responsibility of the administrative law judges. The administrative law judges, by whatever title, serve as hearing officers and advisers to boards and commissions; and it would appear that providing law clerks for them would place them on a higher plane, somewhat closer to our Federal trial judges and more remote from the facts and the law that they pass upon. It would tend to place the law clerks in the position of making the initial determination of how a case should be decided and tend to add to Government expense and administrative delay in the decisionmaking process.

Section 4 of the bill provides that the Board shall, within 12 months after passage, establish procedures to provide for the prompt handling of petitions for representation elections, or in fact to codify existing general rulemaking power.

I believe the present flexibility in interpreting the Board's rulemaking power more readily enables it to meet and resolve everchanging conditions in the labor-management field, and the creation of hard-and-fast rules in representation matters could simply create new and unnecessary issues for litigation.

Mr. President, one of the more controversial provisions of proposed section 4 is that involving "equal access" which would compel employers, who address their employees on company property and on company time, to give "equal access" to union representatives.

This would appear to invite more potential discord and strife since the only opportunity an employer has to present his side of the story to employees is on his own property and on his own time. It would appear reasonable for union organizers and union members to meet and determine their course of action on their own time rather than on the time and at the expense of management. The employer ordinarily would not be expected to be in the union hall or to visit the employee in his home. This might, in fact, be an unfair labor practice. Therefore, it appears reasonable to permit an employer to talk with the employees at the place of business and at his own expense and to permit union members and union officials to determine the place of their meetings and to meet at their own expense.

I believe the present arrangement, whereby union representatives who are also employees can solicit coworkers after hours at their homes, in nonproduction areas provided by the employer, such as lunchrooms, locker rooms, lounges, parking lots and so forth, are reasonable.

This is one of the balances in existing legislation that may well be preferable to the proposed change.

Another equally controversial provision involves proposed section 6 of the bill mandating expedited elections.

Under this provision, if 50 percent of the employers petition for union representation, I understand that the Board must order an election within 13 days and hold it in not less than 21 days nor more than 30 days. In any other case it is understood the Board must direct that the election be held not more than 45 days after filing of the petition, except that the Board may direct the election in not more than 75 days when there are unusual circumstances.

I believe that in the case of union representation matters, sufficient time should be allowed both labor and management to decide the difficult issues that may arise.

On page 29, table 11B of the fiscal year 1977 annual report of the National Labor Relations Board, it is indicated that of a total of 9,795 representation elections in which objections or determinative challenges were ruled on, 7,128 or more than 81 percent, were closed by stipulation or voluntary agreements between the parties. In fact, page 62 of the committee report indicates that 90 percent of the unfair labor practice cases were resolved in a median of 42 days without the necessity of formal litigation before the Board.

Section 9 would amend the present act to provide for institution of complaint proceedings against any person charged with willful noncompliance with the terms of an existing Board order or of a court decree enforcing a Board order. But the sanctions which this section provides would tend to transform the Board from a remedial to a punitive agency with far-reaching powers which might aggravate labor-management harmony, rather than promote it.

For example, the bill would provide for Federal contract debarment against willful violators of the act for up to 3 years. This provision may tend to punish the very employees the act is intended to protect. Federal contract debarment could result in the elimination of jobs of employees working for such contractors. It could also reduce the number of qualified bidders desirable to obtain the best product at the least possible cost.

It would appear that the debarment provision, particularly as it may be applied for a mere technical violation, could have the effect of putting a company out of business. This is true because, as the bill provides, once the Board General Counsel has decided to issue a complaint seeking debarment and the Board determines that a willful violation occurred, the statute removes any discretion on the part of the Board to determine whether debarment is an appropriate remedy under the circumstances, since it provides that the Board "shall" issue the order which will result in debarment.

Section 9 further provides that, in cases where the Board has found an unlawful refusal to bargain prior to the entry into the first collective bargaining agreement, the Board may award the employees compensation for the period of delay in bargaining caused by the unfair labor practice. This provision would appear to indicate that the remedies are intended to be imposed against employers who are merely engaging in technical refusals to bargain for purposes of securing court review of Board-made election rules or certifications. It would appear that the measure would punish the employer for having elected to pursue a course of action that presently is his legal right to pursue.

Section 11 of the bill refers to unlawful discharges during representation campaigns and provides for injunctive reinstatement for employees alleged to have been unlawfully discharged. The stated purpose of the provision is both to relieve quickly the unlawfully discharged employee of the burden of unemployment and to demonstrate to the other employees that the law can protect them in the exercise of their rights.

This provision could work harm to an employer who discharges a worker by reason of incompetency, dishonesty or for some violent act, but which it may be claimed, was for union organizing activity. Under the provisions of the bill, a mandatory injunction for reinstatement would immediately issue, thus generating additional litigation.

Let me again cite the 1977 Annual Report of the National Labor Relations Board. On page 185 it indicates with regard to illegal discharges alleging discriminatory conduct toward an employee during organizing campaigns, that in the 15-month period from July 1976 through September 1977, the Board filed 55 petitions for temporary relief under the present section 10(j) of the act against employers in only 45 instances. Of these, injunctions were granted in 31 cases while the rest were denied or dismissed.

It is noted also on page 23 of the 1977 report, that considering the many thousands of businesses in this country and the millions of employees, in fiscal year 1977 there were only 29 contempt cases before the circuit court of appeals. Thus out of 37,600 unfair labor practice complaints filed with the Board during 1977, only 29 cases were so serious that the Board had to seek contempt proceedings.

Inequities may exist in the present labor-management structure of the Nation, and probably will continue to exist given the nature of our economy, with the constant shifting of capital, new plant expansion, new products coming on the market, differing skills needed, and the natural inclination of employers to resist unionization.

However, a review of the National Labor Relations Board's own reports indicate that given the large number of businesses in our country and the millions of employees who work for these firms, there has not been the abuse of existing statutes which would require radical changes in our labor laws at the present time.

The present bill would tend to tip the scale in labor-management relations in favor of labor unions, and would appear to add other elements of litigation within the employer-employee relationship, not only before the National Labor Relations Board but within our court system as well.

In fact, the Washington Post, which can hardly be accused of right wing sympathies, has described the bill, in an editorial dated March 15, 1978, as the "Union Organizing Act of 1978," and states that:

Most of its major provisions are aimed at making it easier for unions to organize new units.

Further on, it states that:

One major section would put the government in the business of blacklisting companies that are persistent violators of the labor laws.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this editorial from the Washington Post, dated March 15, be printed at this point in the RECORD in its entirety.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE LABOR BILL

The Labor Reform Act of 1978 is one of those pieces of legislation whose pluses and minuses are buried under the cloud of rhetoric that accompanies it. The bill is (depending on which version of the literature you prefer): a) a measure desperately needed to protect vital rights of working men and women from destruction by law-breaking and vindictive employers; b) a last-ditch effort by labor unions to bolster their sagging membership rolls by stacking the deck against workers who do not want to join unions; c) a relatively insignificant measure that tinkers with, but makes no monumental changes in, present law.

Regardless of which view is closest to the truth, the bill is going to be the major battleground between the unions and business organizations this year. Both sides have already invested vast sums of money and lobbying power in the fight. More will be forthcoming as the time for the Senate to begin debate on the subject draws closer. Both sides, it seems to us, have staked far more on the bill than its merits deserve. Organize labor appears to regard its passage as the best way to retrieve at least part of the prestige it lost last year when the common situs picketing bill was defeated. Business groups seem to see the bill as an opportunity to demonstrate that the political clout the labor movement once had is slipping quickly away.

We do not intend to get into the specifics of this legislation just now. It is enough, for the moment, to say that the bill is mislabeled. It ought to be called the "Union Organizing Act of 1978." Most of its major provisions are aimed at making it easier for unions to organize new units. Some of these are aimed at well-documented problems, but others are not. Much of the rest of the bill involves procedural changes at the National Labor Relations Board. However, one major section would put the government in the business of blacklisting companies that are persistent violators of the labor laws.

Last fall, when the House passed its version of this act, we noted that we were less troubled by what the bill did than by what it failed to do. That is still true. Like the House, the Senate Human Relations Committee has lost sight of the need to change the law so that it better protects the rights of workers. This bill does improve the protection of some of those rights against abuses by management, but it does nothing to protect them from labor unions. And one kind of abuse is about as common as the other these days. The main focus of this legislation is on the rights of unions—as unions, not as representatives of workers. We doubt that adding additional provisions strengthening the law against union misdeeds would take much of the bitterness out of the fight that is going on over passage of the bill. But that would at least reduce the one-sidedness of this "reform" act.

Mr. SCOTT. It would appear that there are many more crucial matters with which the Senate should be concerned that have a decidedly more adverse effect upon our economy and upon the welfare of both labor and management. In an industrial nation such as ours, we must find a way to expand, not decrease, the amount of energy available.

The last paragraph of the editorial I referred to had this to say:

Last fall, when the House passed its version of this act, we noted that we were less troubled by what the bill did than by what it failed to do. That is still true. Like the House, the Senate Human Relations Committee has lost sight of the need to change the law so that it better protects the rights of workers. This bill does improve the protection of some of those rights against abuses by management, but it does nothing to protect them from labor unions. And one kind of abuse is about as common as the other these days. The main focus of this legislation is on the rights of unions—as unions, not as representatives of workers. We doubt that adding additional provisions strengthening the law against union misdeeds would take much of the bitterness out of the fight that is going on over passage of the bill. But that would at least reduce the one-sidedness of this "reform" act.

I personally dislike to see restrictions put on the mining of coal, as we did in the surface mining bill, or undue restrictions remain on the utilization of our oil and gas resources. But as long as we are going to restrict the utilization of our fossil fuels, it seems reasonable to me that we must find alternate sources of energy. The most available source that could meet the needs of the country in my judgment is nuclear energy with reasonable safeguards upon its use. Expansion of industry means more jobs and ultimately better pay and working conditions for employees and more profits for the employer, thus benefiting American citizens far more than any adjustment we might make in our present labor-management laws.

If we would concentrate on the adverse effect of unnecessary paperwork, of unnecessary regulation of business generally, of unreasonable environmental constraints, if we would provide tax credits to stimulate business and provide employment, it would seem far preferable to changes in labor-management laws.

It would seem that we ought to be concerned about the problem of inflation that tends to reduce the value of our money and also reduce the standard of living of those on a fixed income. Mail received in our office reflects the concern of the people with regard to these matters.

Last January, we included a questionnaire in our newsletter to Virginians to obtain their thoughts on a number of issues confronting the Congress. The labor reform bill was not mentioned but space was provided for constituents to comment on any matter of concern. A large percentage of the 40,000 Virginians returning the questionnaire indicated they opposed any changes in existing labor-management law.

I might add parenthetically, Mr. President, we received more write-ins about the proposed changes that are in this bill than any other matter. It was the greatest concern of the people of Virginia. Our daily mail continues to indicate that a large number of my own constituents oppose this legislation, and believe it would disturb the present balance between labor and management.

It seems reasonable to believe that all of us desire to improve the relationship between labor and management rather than to aggravate it. Certainly a friendly atmosphere means more profit for management and more pay for labor. If, in fact, labor union membership is declining and if unions are losing an increasing number of representative elections, it does not logically follow that a change should be made in the basic labor-management law so as to increase the effectiveness of labor at the expense of both management and the general public.

Labor should have the right to organize, to bargain collectively and to strike when necessary for the relief of its grievances. But, the Government, in my judgment, should be impartial, should not take sides, but undertake to improve the ability of labor and management to settle their own differences rather than to aggravate conflicts when they develop.

In conclusion, Mr. President, I believe most Senators know the feelings of the people they represent.

It was interesting, however, to note on the desk a copy of a statement by the distinguished minority leader, Senator BAKER of Tennessee. I understand that he made some comments earlier in the day. Let me refer to just one paragraph that supports many of the statements that I have just made. That is the second paragraph, his reference to a survey that was conducted in 1,500 in-home interviews.

The survey indicates that, although 45 percent of those polled believe changes in the existing labor laws are necessary, few support the changes proposed in the pending labor law reform bill. Indeed, 65 percent oppose the bill's provision to allow labor union organizers to enter the property of businesses at any time, including during working hours, to recruit members. Moreover, 70 percent believe that employee elections should not be held until there has been an adequate waiting period, such as a month; and 79 percent say that a secret ballot should be held on whether to strike before a union strike is ordered.

Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator for sharing the results of this poll with us. But if there is some doubt in the mind of an individual Senator, it would seem reasonable that he talk with the people back home, that he read his constituent mail, and that he give great weight to constituents' opinions before voting for or against this legislation.

In my own case, I am satisfied that the people of Virginia do not want any drastic change in the present labor-management law.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will withhold that request, I wonder if the Senator will yield. Without delaying the Senator unduly, I hope, I would like to discuss one aspect of the subject.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I am glad to withhold the suggestion and to yield to the distinguished chairman of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, again I do not want to at this time deal at great length with the observation made by the Senator from Virginia, but there is just one matter to which I would like to refer.

The distinguished Senator from Virginia developed a theme similar to that of others who are opposed to the bill as it is before us; and that deals with the provision in the bill that would increase the National Labor Relations Board from five to seven members. I believe the Senator from Virginia suggested that maybe this is unnecessary, that it smacks of empire building in the National Labor Relations Board.

I just want to give a little bit of the background that brought us to this provision in the bill.

While we mentioned its origin on other occasions, I did not take the time to read the position of the first to propose the seven-person board.

Again, I say the RECORD shows it came from the senior Senator—I believe the senior Senator—from the State of Ohio at that time, Senator Robert Taft, Sr.

In a bill that was reported from the then Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee, there were minority views. I would like to read from the minority views. Author Senator Robert Taft, Sr., in the minority views said at that time:

> The 1947 act increased the Board from three to five members and permitted panelization by authorizing it to delegate its powers to three of such members. The bill passed by the Senate at that time would have created a seven-member Board, but in conference the lower number was agreed upon. The size of the Board was increased in the hope that case handling might be expedited. Congress recognized that speed is of the essence in the determination of labor controversies. Delay in case handling tends to encourage use of self-help by the litigants which may take the form of strikes.

Continuing to read from the minority views:

> In the amendment we have proposed, the seven-member Board agreed upon by the Senate in 1947, is again placed in the bill. Also, in accord with the recommendation of the Hoover Commission with respect to the membership on administrative agencies, we have required that no more than four of the members may be members of the same political party.

That was the genesis of the seven-person Board. Of course, it never came to pass. Senator Robert Taft, Sr., did not have his way in the congressional processes in this regard.

Now we have this proposal before us again.

Since that statement in the minority views on the bill before the Senate back in 1949, of course, many people of great knowledge in the whole area of labor-management affairs have joined in the recommendation that the Board be increased in size.

It will be noted that we have been faithful to Senator Taft's suggestions, even to the inclusion of the Hoover Commission suggestion that party not be a factor here, that no more than four members of a seven-member board could be of one political party.

I will say that right now, and, of course, this is temporary and it is only to be observed in connection with this President at this time; I do not think there is any possibility of a President being less political in selection of members of the Board than President Carter. He has reappointed Mr. Fanning, who was first nominated by President Eisenhower, and he has named a career staff person, Mr. Truesdale, party affiliation unknown, to fill the other vacancy that has developed on the Board since the term of President Carter.

So I wanted the record to deal with that.

I know the size of the Board is not a major matter with the Senator from Virginia or the opponents of the bill. But it has great dignity. The idea has the dignity given to it by the great, esteemed Senator, a former leader of our land, Senator Robert Taft, Sr.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I appreciate the distinguished chairman's sharing the report of some 29 years ago with us and the comments with regard to the late Senator Robert Taft, Sr.

Certainly, it was good of him to commend the distinguished Senator. But the Senator is a lawyer. He knows that ordinarily as a matter of evidence we do not quote from dead people that have been dead for 29 years when they are not here to refute any misstatement of their thoughts at all.

I do not know how Senator Robert Taft, Sr., would feel today about this bill. He is not a voting member of this Chamber at this time.

My concern, and it was wrapped up into a package, my concern was adding to the number, raising it from five to seven, adding to the term, extending it from five to seven years, giving law clerks to the administrative law judges.

The whole concept is tied together and I submit it is empire building.

But I am grateful for the distinguished chairman sharing his thoughts on this matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will yield further, I do not believe that it is inappropriate to quote from the past, when the person to be quoted is no longer available, particularly in the situation where Senator Taft addressed himself to the NLRB.

Mr. TOWER. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. TOWER. So that I might agree with the distinguished Senator from New Jersey.

I think it is altogether neat and proper to quote from the wisdom of the past. I am delighted to see my distinguished friend from New Jersey endorse the views of the late Robert Taft, Sr.

I would like to ask the Senator from New Jersey if he would endorse all of the views expressed by Senator Taft on matters affecting labor and management?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have come to accept the Taft-Hartley Act, yes.

Senator Taft happened to be a hero of mine. I recall—this is the first time I have had occasion to recall this—the first time I came to visit this Chamber and sat in the gallery. I stayed as long as Senator Taft, as leader on the Republican side, stayed; and I listened to everything he said, with great admiration and respect.

Then his son became a member of our committee and had the same respect—they are most constructive Americans.

There is another reason why it is helpful also to quote Senator Taft from 1949. He was addressing himself then to the workload of the National Labor Relations Board; and to expedite its work, he was suggesting a larger Board. The statistics show that when he first advanced the idea, in 1947, there were 115 decisions issued by the National Labor Relations Board in that year.

Looking now at 1977, the latest figures for a full year are as follows: unfair labor practice cases decided by the Board, 1,127; representation cases, 721—a total of 1,848.

So, what would the Senator suggest to that? If his reasoning were applied today, as it was then, Senator Taft now would continue to advance the idea of a seven-person Board. Since then, his thought has been agreed to, accepted, and advanced by many others, such as the American Bar Association, which we find lends such dignity to questions of procedural matters before our courts and before our boards.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I am not clairvoyant, and I am very hesitant to say what the point of view of the distinguished former Senator from Ohio would be today. But I submit that there is good reason in a court of law to omit from the evidence the testimony or statements of people long deceased.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is an exception to the hearsay rule in the law, as I understand it, that we, as lawyers, work under ancient documents. So I will raise that, Your Honor.

[Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. President, I yield to the distinguished Senator from Texas.

Mr. TOWER. I thank the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Emily Preston, of Senator HATCH's staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NELSON). Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, in a statement made on July 18, 1977, the President said that an election on union representation should be held within a fixed brief period of time after a request for an election is filed with the Board. This period should be as short as is administratively feasible. The Board, however, should be allowed some additional time to deal with complex cases.

The House version of the so-called labor reform bill, H.R. 8410, which passed the House on October 6, 1977, by a vote of 257 to 163, calls for a 25-day period. When the bill was considered in the Senate, an amendment was made that alters the election deadlines. The bill, as introduced in the Senate, would have required the NLRB to direct a representation election not more than 15 days after a petition is filed. Senator HARRISON A. WILLIAMS of New Jersey, committee chairman and the bill's chief sponsor, changed the time limit from 15 to 21 days before the subcommittee approved the bill on January 20.

By a surprisingly close vote of 8 to 7, the committee adopted an amendment by Senator ROBERT STAFFORD of Vermont, which was further amended by Senator THOMAS EAGLETON, of Missouri, requiring the National Labor Relations Board to direct an election in not less than 21 days and not more than 30 days and, if both the union and employer agree, an election could be held outside of that time period. Senator JAVITS, of New York, has been quoted as saying that he favored the amendment, calling it "a minor concession which would respond to the complaints of small businesses." The proponents of the legislation claim that a shortened period is necessary. In order to properly get this matter before the Senate, it is essential that the present method of handling elections and other matters be reviewed.

The National Labor Relations Board has been described as an agency with two important but limited roles. The first role is to provide honest ballot association. And second, the Board acts as a public law enforcer.

As an honest ballot association, it sets up and runs elections. These are the now commonplace employee elections in which the employees decide by secret ballot vote whether they want to be represented by a union and, if so, by which one. If a majority of those voting choose union representation, then by law the union is the exclusive agent for every employee in the voting unit. Now, this is true whether he or she casts a ballot or not and it is true regardless of the way which he or she may have voted and covers dealings with the employer concerning virtually all matters affecting wages, hours, and working conditions. Such an election usually results from the petition filed with the National Labor Relations Board by a union which seeks to demonstrate its majority status and thus gain governmental sanction and legally enforceable bargaining rights. Frequently, however, such an election is held because employees who have union representation have filed a petition for an election to oust the union which has been representing them.

The proponents of the so-called labor law reform bill would have you believe that there is presently no way to have quick, proper elections at which the employees have a right to decide whether or not they wish to be represented by a particular union or whether or not they do not wish to be represented by a particular union.

The Board has developed guidelines for the circumstances under which it will grant a petition for election submitted to it by a union or by employees trying to get out from under union representation. The Board will not hold an election during the life of a collective-bargaining contract of reasonable duration—not over 3 years. That rule has its roots in considerations of industrial relations stability. Effective collective bargaining cannot work if established relationships are allowed to be disrupted at frequent and unpredictable times.

Nor will the Board conduct an election if only a very small group of employees seem to want one. A 30-percent showing of interest is required. That is an administrative rather than a public policy rule, designed to save the Board the time and expense of holding an election when there is not enough employee interest to suggest that the election has any practical chance of resulting in a change in the status quo, either from union representation to removing union representation where the employees so wish.

As a part of running elections, one of the functions, then, of the National Labor Relations Board as an honest ballot association is to make rules and to apply and enforce them. Such rules cover not only when and if to run an election, but also determinations of what kinds of employee groups are appropriate for bargaining and, hence, for the holding of an election. Which employees are eligible to vote, and, once the votes have all been cast, whether the election is valid or invalid. Was it properly run by the National Labor Relations Board? Did one party or another conduct itself, either at the polls or in the course of the election campaign, in a manner which so tainted the atmosphere of the election as to make the result unreliable?

The National Labor Relations Board's role thus involves not only administering the mechanics of balloting, but also a substantial area of administrative supervision, rulemaking, and deciding disputes over whether its rules have been violated.

The Board's second role as it is now constituted and operating under the present labor law is as a public enforcer. Each one of the three words in that title embodies an important concept.

The Board is a public law enforcer. With but a few exceptions, only the Board can enforce this law. Unions cannot. Employers cannot. Employees cannot. A union cannot go into court and file a lawsuit against an employer complaining that the employer has committed unfair labor practices. An employee cannot go into court and do that either. An employer faced with illegal recognition picketing cannot go to court to enjoin that picketing or to seek damages caused by it.

When the National Labor Relations Act was passed, the concept was that there should be a public enforcer, not a rash of individually brought lawsuits seeking to enforce private rights and resulting in cluttering the courts with a mass of litigation over labor disputes.

That basic concept has continued, but some exceptions have been engrafted onto the law as the National Labor Relations Act has been amended. Employers can now sue unions for damages for certain prohibited secondary boycotts. An individual employee can now sue a union in a private suit if that union has failed to represent him fairly. A union can sue an employer for breach of a collective-bargaining contract. Despite these exceptions, however, the National Labor Relations Act continues to be primarily enforced by and through the National Labor Relations Board.

The concept of public prosecution has proved to be very sound. It has prevented harassment of parties by groundless lawsuits while at the same time insuring that law violations do not go undetected and unremedied because an injured party may not have either the resources or the will to maintain a private suit. Employers and unions have come to have respect for this law, because they know a public prosecutor will pursue alleged violations through litigation if voluntary compliance does not occur.

The National Labor Relations Board is a public law enforcer. It does not and cannot enforce anything but the law. This does not always seem widely understood. Many people seem to expect the Board to formulate and administer abstract justice in the labor relations field. Some seem to envision the Board as a governmentally sponsored Robin Hood with a mission of aiding the weak and restraining the strong. With some frequency, one hears the complaint that the Board does not stop big unions from forcing small, weak employers into paying highly inflationary wage rates, or that the Board will not help employees even though their employer has forced them to work unduly long hours or under onerous conditions, or that it has not helped some small union which seemed unable to win elections among employees in a major company whose lawfully conducted election campaigns are regularly successful in persuading employees to vote against union representation.

There are some who think that the Board's only function in life is to compel employees to belong to unions, that the success of the National Labor Relations Act and the success of the Board are measured only in terms of the industries that are completely organized. This denies the individual employee, the individual worker, the rights that should be guaranteed to him—that after being given adequate time in which to make a conscious decision and then with a secret ballot be able to determine whether or not he wishes to be represented by a union.

Still others see the Board in the role of the public's representative in bargaining and ask why it has not prevented inflationary settlements or settled lengthy strikes which are disruptive of the nation's economy.

The Board has authority to do none of these things. It has and should only have the narrow authority to be an enforcer of the law which gave rise to its existence.

This Congress has written and twice substantially amended the National Labor Relations Act. It is to those enactments and only to those enactments that one must look to find the boundaries of the Board's enforcement authority. Only where conduct of unions or employers is prohibited by the act does the Board have any authority to enter the picture. It is a public law enforcer, not a policy setter, not a setter in morals, economics, the conduct of internal union affairs, or the development of employer personnel practices.

Thirdly, the National Labor Relations Board is a public law enforcer. Within its own structure, this Board has a variety of interwoven processes by which it makes tentative determinations of whether the law has been violated. It has, however, no authority either to make final determinations of guilt or innocence or to remedy any violations which are tentatively found by it to have taken place. No order of this agency has any force or effect until a court concurs with the Board's findings and gives court sanction to a remedial order recommended by the Board. Other Federal and State agencies have administrative enforcement tools, such as the right to grant and revoke licenses. The National Labor Relations Board has none. Nor does a violation of the law administered by this agency give rise to any criminal liability.

If the Board finds that an unfair labor practice has been committed, it can enter an order designed to remedy the unfair practice. But if the respondent union or employer does not heed its order, then the Board must go to a court of appeals and persuade that court that the Board's order is worthy of enforcement under all of the circumstances. If the court agrees and enforces the Board order but the violation continues or remains unremedied, then and then only has the offending employer or union truly run afoul of the law, in which instance civil or criminal contempt penalties may be invoked. Because the National Labor Relations Board has been so settlement minded and because a large measure of voluntary compliance has been achieved, this basic lack of agency authority sometimes tends to be forgotten. It is and has been an important factor in the law's administration and the delicate balance between labor and management. We do not need to tamper with this delicate balance at this time.

The Board's role when the law is violated is public. The Board's role has its roots only in the law, and must be affirmatively enforced in a court of law by the petition of the Board.

The so-called labor relations reform bill wishes to put severe time constraints on the holding of elections. Organized labor is endorsing the measure and claiming that it needs to have the time between the filing of the petition for a certification election and the date of the actual election severely restricted. Let's examine the process by which a certification election is now held.

The National Labor Relations Board's election cases are presently begun when representatives of a union or of a group of employees file a petition for an election. When that election petition is filed, the Board's first act is to notify all interested parties. Thus, if a union files a petition seeking an election in an unorganized plant, the employer is promptly notified. If a group of employees files a petition to oust a union as the bargaining agent, the union and the employer are promptly notified. The reason for the notification is more than courtesy or legal formality. The Board wants to know promptly whether it can get the agreement of the other party to hold an election.

In a very substantial number of cases, the other party has shown itself willing to cooperate and the details of the election are worked out by voluntary agreement of the parties with the aid and assistance of a Board agent.

Such agreements can be reduced to writing and executed in the course of a Board-arranged conference, often within a matter of an hour or two, or, in the case of very large elections, perhaps a day or two. In these cases, the parties primarily want a referee. They want the election run correctly. They want proper notices of the election to be posted. They want the ballots counted by an impartial observer. They want someone to supervise the polling. And they want a proper certificate of the results. The Board performs all those jobs very well. It has accumulated a fantastic amount of experience in its 40 years in conducting elections.

To assist the parties in reaching these agreements, Board agents will be found in many places—on the premises of employers in remote country towns, in heavily industrialized segments of our cities, or aboard ships in harbors, and at virtually every hour of the day or night.

Even in the simplest of elections, there are many details to be tended to. Basics include suitable agreements about when and where the election will take place. Most employers are willing to permit an NLRB election to be held in a convenient location. Dates and times of day for the election are selected under the supervision of the Board and in a manner designed to afford the employees a convenient time to vote, while at the same time enabling the election to be conducted as efficiently as possible. For example, polling times are set to encompass the end of one shift and the beginning of another.

Printed notices designed to be impartial and to advise employees of both the details of the election and of their rights under the law are prepared and sent out to the locations involved for posting several days in advance of the election. Ballots must be printed, sometimes in one or more foreign languages, if there are a number of voters whose knowledge of English is limited. Election observers from both the union and the company must be instructed in their duties.

The utmost care must be taken to preserve the secrecy of the ballot, which means that suitable polling areas must be arranged for. Municipal voting booths may have to be borrowed or portable booths may have to be brought out to the election site by the Board agent. Ballot boxes which can be properly sealed and watched must be provided and brought to the election. Properly prepared ballots must also be ready in time for the election.

Polls must be supervised tactfully but firmly so that the voting can take place in an orderly and dignified manner. Proper announcements of the election may sometimes be made over the plant's loudspeaker system, usually by a Board agent. If there is a problem of releasing voters from work, suitable arrangements must be made and supervised by Board agents so that employees receive clear and timely notice of their right to leave their work stations to mark and deposit their ballots. The ballots must be counted and, if no objections are filed within the time period provided in the Board's rules, a properly worded certificate of the election's outcome must be issued.

Even though in most cases the parties primarily want a referee, there are a host of duties to be performed, ranging from simple clerical functions to considerable feats of diplomacy in arranging things to the satisfaction of all parties concerned so that time-consuming formal proceedings can be avoided. The holding of these elections is one of the most important functions that the Board performs. The administration of these elections is of vital significance to unions, employees, and employers. The present method of handling elections, the time frame within which the elections are held, the complexity of making certain that sanitary conditions exist should not be disturbed. The process is one that cannot be hurried if the people are to have a fair, honest election. The time constraints of the proposed bill are entirely too short in some cases—they may work in some. But the Board's discretion that has been determined from the judgment arrived at by holding thousands of elections adequately and correctly protects the rights of all parties. There is no need to amend the labor laws in order to put a severe time constraint on the holding of representation elections.

There are sometimes real controversies over whether there should be an election at all, over what unit, if any, is appropriate for the holding of an election, and over who is eligible to vote. Is John Doe a supervisor and thus ineligible to vote or is he merely a "leadman," a more experienced craftsman to whom employees look for guidance but who has no true supervisory duties, and thus eligible to vote? Does Jane Doe work with the unit with sufficient regularity to be a regular part-timer and thus eligible to vote or does she work so sporadically as to be deemed a casual employee without a continuing interest in terms and conditions of employment and thus ineligible to vote?

Some questions of eligibility can be postponed until after the election. Thus, if John shows up at the polls he may vote, but his ballot may be challenged by whatever party believes him ineligible. If his vote is necessary to determine the outcome of the election, the eligibility issue can be decided then. If his vote is not determinative, then it will not be necessary to resolve the challenge. But that procedure is followed only when the number of such voters is fairly small and will not unduly prolong the postelection procedures.

There are many serious questions about the size and shape of the unit, questions such as whether the group is appropriate at all for an election. Sometimes the question is, should an election be held in just one plant of an employer or are the employer's three plants so interdependent and so integrated that only a unit comprised of all three plants is an appropriate one in which to hold an election? Is there a contract in effect which bars an election until near its expiration? Or, does a contract claimed to be a bar not really cover this unit of employees? Is it defective as a bar because it contains illegal provisions?

These serious questions about the appropriateness of a unit cannot always be determined in advance. The legislation being considered would require the Board to adopt in advance rules that would determine units so that they could not be contested or changed. The Board has for many years had the authority to promulgate rules and regulations concerning units. The Board, with the greatest knowledge imaginable about the holding of elections and the appropriateness of units, has decided that it would be best for unions, employers, and employees to not attempt to promulgate rules and regulations in advance fixing units. The Congress should bow to this superior knowledge on the part of the Board. This legislation, which would require the Board to attempt to do that which in its wisdom it has seen fit not to do for so many years, would be completely unwise.

It is recognized that some disputes may not prove resolvable in the conference room by agreement of the parties. When agreement is not reached, a hearing must be held and the decisionmaking process invoked. Administratively, this means that the agency must provide somebody to conduct a hearing and somebody to make a decision. For over half of the Board's history to date, the decisionmaking function in this kind of proceeding lay with the full Board in Washington, D.C. The National Labor Relations Act was amended in 1959 and the Board was authorized to delegate substantial decisionmaking authority to its regional directors at its discretion. The Board has exercised most of that discretion and today only very few cases of this kind reach the full Board. On his own, a regional director may transfer a case of this kind to the Board for decision if he thinks the issues are extraordinarily difficult, complex, or novel. He is not, however, supposed to do so just because the record is long or the issue a little ticklish. In addition to such transfers, the Board reaches some cases by the review route. If a party believes the decision he gets from the regional director is wrong, he may for certain limited reasons request review by the Board in Washington. Such requests are filed in 25 to 35 percent of the cases and the Board grants review of about 10 percent of those requested. Thus, out of every 1,000 regional director decisions, only about 30 will actually be fully reviewed by the Board.

There have been accusations that there has been a great deal of game playing—that people have requested review when there were no genuine issues. This may be true. However, the overwhelming number of certification elections held are done so with a genuine interest on the part of all of the parties to have an honest and fair election. The Board and its regional directors have conducted thousands of elections. They know the people; they know the ones that are honest and truthful; they can require the holding of the elections; they can do it within a time frame that protects everyone. The hurrying of elections, the preventing of people from getting to know the real issues involved can do indefinitely more harm to the individual, to an employer, to a union than going through the orderly processes that have been established by the Board.

When the voting is completed and the ballots counted, the Board's role is not necessarily over. A party may protest that the election was not valid or, if there are challenged ballots in sufficient numbers to affect the outcome of the election, voter eligibility questions may have to be dealt with.

Protests of the validity of the election are called "objections" and a number of different kinds of objections may be made. For example, it may be asserted that the company or the union intimidated voters by making threats or offering bribes, or that last-minute material misrepresentations were made by one party or the other, or that some employees were prevented from voting, or that the Board agent conducting the election failed to keep the ballot box under close and careful observation at all times, or that improper electioneering occurred at the polling place. It is obvious from just these few examples that a potential exists in this area for a host of disputes and, thus, for further work for the agency.

The Board attempts to handle these issues without the necessity of holding a hearing on every objection. Parties making objections are required to support them with documents and by tendering witnesses. If the objections are legally sufficient, if proved, to require that the election be set aside, the documents will be reviewed and the witnesses interviewed by a Board agent. If they are legally insufficient, the objections may be dismissed without any further investigation. For example, if a union objects to an election because the employer told employees that he did not think unions were a good thing, no investigation would be made. Such employer comment is noncoercive "free speech" and would be legally insufficient to invalidate the election. The objection would be promptly dismissed. A similar dismissal would occur if an employer were to file an objection alleging that the union promised the employees it would negotiate a good contract for them if elected and that there would be big wage increases for everybody. Such forecasts of negotiating success are not regarded by the Board as improper and thus, again, the objection could be dismissed without the need of an investigation of the allegations.

In others, however, where the incidents alleged to have occurred would, if proved, be sufficient to affect the validity of the election, a factual investigation is required. Following the investigation, a report on objections is issued to the parties. That report may recommend that the election be validated, that it be set aside, or that the investigation was inconclusive and that a hearing is necessary before there can be a proper resolution of the issues of fact and law raised by the objections.

The investigative process may or may not eliminate the need for hearing and a written decision. If a hearing and written decision are required, the work is done by the regional offices and not by the Board in Washington.

The administrative functions to be performed after the voting include an investigation, a report on objections, and possibly a hearing and formal decision. Most of the functions in this area are performed in the regional offices, with some review functions being performed by the Board in Washington.

The labor law reform bill would change the concept of the Board as it now exists. It would give it certain authoritative rights that could destroy it as the settlement-minded agency that it now is and should continue to be. The new law would provide debarment powers which are severe to say the least. Ever since its inception, the National Labor Relations Board has been a public law enforcer.

Mr. President, I yield the floor to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. LAXALT. I thank the Senator from Idaho. Mr. President, I, too, am opposed to the so-called labor reform bill, H.R. 8410. I feel the Senate has far better things to do with what remains of this session than dissipate it in a prolonged struggle to alter what, by any objective analysis, is one of our better run regulatory agencies—the National Labor Relations Board. What is more, I feel, if enacted, H.R. 8410 will render the NLRB less efficient and less equitable than it is now.

As one who led the floor fight in the Senate against the situs picketing bill in 1975, I know the emotion and controversy which is generated by organizational issues. Both business and labor pull out all the stops. It is for good reason that observers have referred to the activities which surround congressional action on these matters as "holy wars" and any consideration of H.R. 8410 promises to be no exception. Just check the constituent mail, phone calls, and daily schedules which are cluttered with people who want to talk to us about labor reform—both pro and con. It is clear that both sides are geared up.

The focus of the combat is basic to the collective bargaining process as we know it. The NLRB is the agency established to enforce the National Labor Relations Act. Whether it is fair and efficient or inequitable and cumbersome is what this debate is all about.

President Carter introduced the Labor Reform Act to Congress with the stated objective "to make the laws which govern labor-management relations work more efficiently, quickly, and equitably." The President also noted that "unnecessary delay is the most serious problem." So. the need for this legislation is apparently to help reduce the problems of delay and to cure a number of related problems with our labor laws. Or, in the words of Secretary of Labor Marshall, "to reform the NLRB which has become a somewhat sluggish and unresponsive regulatory agency."

With all due respect to Secretary Marshall, President Carter, and other supporters of H.R. 8410, I must strongly disagree. It is my contention that the NLRB, outside of a few isolated cases, is an effective agency with an excellent record of maintaining the delicate balance between labor and management.

The NLRB performs two functions vital to the administration and enforcement of the NLRA. As was pointed out by the former chairman of the NLRB, Edward B. Miller, in his insightful analysis entitled, "An Administrative Appraisal of the NLRB," the NLRB is, first, an honest ballot association—that is an important distinction—and, second, a public law enforcer.

As an honest ballot association, the NLRB is responsible for determining whether particular groups of employees are to be represented by a labor organization. Thus, the Board must conduct employee elections during which it is decided by secret ballot whether the shop will be represented by a union and, if so, which one.

In addition to administering the actual election, the NLRB must decide a number of pre-election and post-election issues. Before any ballots are cast, the scope of the unit in which the election is to be held must be determined as well as what employees are part of each particular unit. Post-election issues usually relate to the conduct of the election, including threats or misrepresentations that may have affected the outcome.

An examination of the Board's election record reveals an efficient operation: Of the 9,000 elections conducted by the NLRB each year, 80 percent are held by agreement of the parties concerned and terminated within a median time of 44 days. On the regional board level, of the 1,614 elections held last year by the regional director, the median time from the filing of the petition until the vote was 75 days. Indeed, in only ½ of 1 percent of all cases is a median time of more than 75 days required, and these cases involve new and unusual issues requiring thorough consideration by the five-member Board here in Washington.

I will not deny that some issues do occur requiring detailed consideration by the Board. Yet, when 80 percent of the elections take place by mutual agreement of those affected in a median time of 44 days, it is obvious that the complaints about delays in the election process refer to isolated incidents. There is always room for improvement, but the facts show that the Board's performance in carrying out elections is highly commendable.

In the area of representational proceedings, the major changes proposed by H.R. 8410 can be described as follows:

(1) Hold quicker elections in units which the Board will establish by rulemaking;

(2) Provide union organizers access to an employer's property; and

(3) Restrain employers from exercising existing rights of appeal of Board representational decisions.

As stated, much of the intent of H.R. 8410 concentrates on speeding up the NLRB's representational proceedings. As reported out by the Senate Committee on Human Resources, the bill requires that where a majority of employees have indicated a desire to be represented by a union and where the bargaining unit sought conforms to a Board rule the Board must conduct an election not less than 21 days and no more than 30 days from the date the union files its petition. In most other cases, those where there is either no majority support or no rule, the Board must conduct an election not more than 45 days from the filing of the petition.

It is interesting to me that the proponents of this bill have such a strong attachment to haste in carrying out what they see as employee desires. In my opinion, voting for or against a union raises significant issues for each employee which require careful evaluation. Majority rule bears with it the consequences of foreclosing individual negotiations and requires adherence to a contract which someone else negotiated. Objectively assessing the importance of collective bargaining for individual rights, to me, requires careful consideration.

Union election campaigns, like other campaigns, require individuals to sift through the arguments, pro and con, and decide on a course of action. The potential shift from individual freedom of contract to aggregate freedom of contract is a terribly important issue.

Congress has previously recognized the substantial impact collective bargaining occasions on individual rights. In 1959, the Senate Labor Subcommittee considering government regulation of internal union affairs noted:

Under the National Labor Relations and Railway Labor Acts, the union which is the bargaining representative, has power in conjunction with the employer to fix a man's wages, hours, and conditions of employment. The individual employee may not lawfully negotiate with his employer. He is bound by the union contract. In practice, the union also has a significant role in enforcing the grievance procedure where a man's contract rights are enforced. The government which gives unions this power has an obligation to insure that the officials who wield it are responsive to the desires of the men and women who they represent.—(S. Rep. No. 187, 86th Cong., 1st. Sess. 20 (1959).)

One would think that these same concerns might lead to allowing employees the maximum, not minimum, time to make an informed decision on whether a union and, if so, which union should be chosen to represent their interests. By mandating that elections be conducted within a prescribed period of time and by mandating that the Labor Board establish bargaining units by rulemaking, the sponsors of H.R. 8410 will actually impair employee rights and increase litigation, an objective which the sponsors presumably wish to avoid.

The time periods mandated under H.R. 8410 amount to a bias on the part of the bill's proponents and sponsors. Since union organizers can readily secure employee signatures on authorization cards without employer knowledge, there will be little difficulty in meeting the majority requirement of the quickie election provision. Objectively, employees who have only been given a sales pitch by a union organizer should have more, not less, time to hear the other side of the story. Yet, H.R. 8410 gives an employer less time to get his story across after the union has made a successful pitch than it allows unions when their salesmen have not been successful in securing authorization cards.

Moreover, having the NLRB establish bargaining units by rulemaking is a concept which even the Labor Board has rejected on numerous occasions. The hostility toward rulemaking in the bargaining unit area was noted by former Board Chairman Frank McCulloch, when he stated in a speech to the American Bar Association that, in the labor relations area, rulemaking was "a cumbersome process—that necessarily impedes the law's ability to respond quickly and accurately to changing industrial practices." Similarly, in 1971, the Labor Board rejected a petition by the American Association of University Professors to establish bargaining units for faculty members in colleges and universities by rulemaking. Thus, to require, as H.R. 8410 does, that the Board utilize rulemaking for bargaining unit determinations is to have the Labor Board engage in a process rejected earlier on because it was not equitable. Indeed, if the Board wanted to make greater use of rulemaking, there is nothing to stop it from doing so.

Under H.R. 8410, the Labor Board is also given authority to impose a make-whole remedy when an employer refuses to bargain in a first contract situation. This remedy will result in the Government writing contracts for the employer and undermines the entire process of free collective bargaining, a process which lies at the cornerstone of labor-management relations in this country. The seriousness of this remedy cannot be underscored too heavily.

Under H.R. 8410, the Board is given authority to order a make-whole remedy based on the Bureau of Labor Statistics' average wage and benefits settlement index. The index is not relevant for many, particularly small, employers since it covers wage and benefits settlements for bargaining units containing over 5,000 employees. Thus, the Government would be using as a national economic index collective bargaining settlements with the automobile companies, steel companies or coal companies. Such settlements are hardly relevant for small employers or even for larger corporations in many industries.

In my opinion, the make-whole remedy is totally unncessary and represents an attempt to place a punitive provision into the law so that employers will not exercise their legal right of appeal. Since many Board decisions concerning bargaining unit issues are overturned in the courts, there is a need to maintain a viable avenue of judicial review. H.R. 8410 restricts that review. The presence of this remedy will, as recognized by the General Counsel of the Labor Board, serve to encourage the filing of more charges by unions and, hence, greater litigation.

Besides mandating units by rule and quick elections, the drafters of H.R. 8410 also propose to allow union organizers entry onto company property so as to afford equal access. The notion that unions need equal access is one which has been consistently rejected by the Board and Federal courts. Unions are already provided the names and addresses of employees in a bargaining unit and have ample means to communicate their position in any organizing campaign. The proposed equal access provision contradicts the Board's lengthy experience in carefully balancing the rights of labor and management.

Moreover, the proposed equal access provision raises substantial constitutional questions and is so fraught with uncertainty that it will also be the focal point of much litigation. The provision implies that, should management choose to speak to its employees on its time, it not only must afford union organizers the same opportunity but must pay its employees to hear the union organizers' sales pitch. The equal access provision is not even limited to periods when a petition is on file with the Labor Board, and it is subjected to an exceedingly broad interpretation, an interpretation that would enable virtually all labor organizers the opportunity to come on an employer's property just because the employer chose to exercise his free speech rights.

The NLRB's other major function, in addition to conducting elections, is to enforce the NLRA's unfair labor practice provisions. To carry out this responsibility the NLRB is divided into two independent parts: the Office of the General Counsel and the five-member Board. The General Counsel, acting through the NLRB regional directors and attorneys, exercises final authority in the investigation of unfair labor practice charges, the issuance of complaints based on those charges, and the prosecution of the complaints. The formal decisionmaking function is performed by the Board and its corps of administrative law judges.

The Board's record in this area is commendable. By following the practice of avoiding time-consuming litigation whenever possible, more than 95 percent of the approximately 35,000 unfair labor practice charges filed last year were resolved without a hearing in a median time of 55 days.

H.R. 8410 contains three proposals which supporters claim will expedite the processing and deciding of unfair labor practice cases. Briefly stated, the three provisions would increase the size of the Board from five to seven members, require a summary affirmance procedure for resolving uncomplicated cases by two Board members, and require court review petitions to be filed by an aggrieved party within 30 days of the Board's order. In my opinion, upon review, these measures will prove to be counterproductive.

First of all, Mr. President, proponents for expanding the Board from 5 to 7 members claim that by increasing the size of the Board and allowing it to continue deciding cases via three-member panels, the workload of each individual Board member is reduced and case decisions will be expedited. All well and good, but, by focusing on the number of decisionmakers rather than on the decisionmaking process itself, H.R. 8410 embraces an approach characterized by former NLRB chairman McCulloch as an "oversimplified, mathematical approach, not carefully tooled to the realities of the Board's operations."

It should be kept in mind that each decision issued by a three-member panel of the Board will still have to be cleared for issuance by all of the nonparticipating members. Under the terms of H.R. 8410, instead of 2 nonparticipating Board members, clearance from 4 will be required. Additionally, in the more complex cases which are currently considered by the full Board, consensus will be 40 percent harder to attain and dissents will be more frequent than found today. The end results are bound to cause a lengthening, rather than a shortening of case processing time, in my opinion.

Turning now to the summary affirmance procedure proposed by H.R. 8410, I have concluded that this provision is neither desirable nor necessary. Under current Board practices, cases fit for summary treatment receive it regularly now. In fact, the Board adopts the administrative law judge's decision in approximately 20 percent of its cases. These are the ones suitable for summary affirmance. They are decided as quickly as the proposed summary procedure outlined in H.R. 8410 would allow.

The other 80 percent of the cases are reversed or modified in some respect by the Board. Consequently, in the vast majority of instances, a Board decision on the merits would be required in any event. The summary procedure contained in the Labor Reform Act would simply add one more time-consuming step to the process. In the final analysis, summary affirmance will delay rather than expedite overall case processing by the NLRB.

In another attempt to expedite the enforcement of Board orders, H.R. 8410 permits the Board to obtain automatic enforcement of its decisions in a court of appeals, unless a petition for review is filed within 30 days of the decision. Under existing law, the Board's orders are unenforceable until affirmed by the court of appeals after full review of the merits upon either the Board's application for enforcement on a party's petition for review.

Underlying this proposal is the assumption that 30 days is a sufficient period of time within which respondents can decide whether or not to comply with Board orders. In many cases, this assumption is simply not valid. Under current practice, during the period immediately following issuance of a Board order, the parties and the Board's regional staffs attempt to compute the cost of compliance. In many cases, such as those involving multiple discharges, the computations may be so complex that the regional staff is unable to ascertain within 30 days what the respondent's financial liability will be.

In addition, the vast majority of all unfair labor practice cases—about 69 percent—decided by the Board, closed on voluntary compliance with a Board order without resort to the courts. In some of these cases, additional time beyond 30 days was required to obtain that voluntary compliance. By requiring that petitions for review be filed within 30 days, this proposal seriously jeopardizes the efforts of the Board to obtain voluntary compliance and may require significant additional appellate court litigation. Additional litigation, of course, requires additional time.

Finally, Mr. President, a review of the Board's record will show that this proposal does little besides confirming present practice at the expense of needed flexibility. Although in the late 1960's and early 1970's the Board did require over 250 days to file petitions for enforcement after attempts to obtain voluntary compliance failed, for the last few years enforcement petitions have been filed by the Board in a median time of approximately 30 days from failure of voluntary compliance. In sum, this proposal designed to expedite enforcement of Board orders may cause a litigation explosion, thereby increasing the time required to resolve unfair labor practice cases.

Passage of H.R. 8410 by the Senate will only result in making the NLRB less efficient, increase case handling delays, require more litigation by our already overburdened courts, further delay elections, and insure that employees will be less than fully informed before voting on unionizing. I feel it would be far more advantageous to devote our time and resources to true Government reform which is not embodied in H.R. 8410.

After all, Mr. President, everyday at least one of us stands up on this floor and decries an instance where big Government has mishandled a situation or unfairly muscled one of our constituents, a daily occurrence on this floor and in our offices. These complaints are sincere, come from both sides of the aisle, this has nothing to do with partisanship, and reflect a general dissatisfaction Americans throughout this country evidence over the performance of their Federal Government. The system simply is not responsive.

And, in view of the many pressing requirements for Government reform which surround us in this town, it is almost amusing that we are considering this particular piece of legislation labeled as it is a "reform" measure. Though tagged "reform," we are dealing with a special interest measure having a targeted constituency and taking time away from what could be a true reform task if that is really the aim of this Congress.

Instead of focusing on the National Labor Relations Board in the name of "reform," it seems to me the Congress should spend its time more fruitfully concentrating on problems within the Environmental Protection Agency. HUD, or some of the other Federal bureaucracies which appear at odds with the needs and aspirations of most of our citizens.

Right now the rural community of Winnemucca in my State is engaged in a dialog with EPA that is positively surreal. The agency is upset with the town because of its air quality or, as Washington sees it, lack of quality. EPA has pinpointed an air pollutant and told the people this particle must be removed immediately or suffer the pains of fines and a cutoff of Federal funding. Well, that's a rather harsh approach, but what makes the whole matter utterly ridiculous is that the pollutant EPA wants Winnemucca to get rid of is dust. We are talking here about the dust that is kicked up by the wind and blows in off the desert.

It has been my suggestion that Winnemucca counter by applying for an EPA pollution control grant. With the moneys attained a special altar to the rain gods could be constructed to petition the Heavens periodically for waters to wet down the dry lands.

This tale of Winnemucca dust and the Federal response is not unique to Nevada. People everywhere are extremely upset with the course Government has been steering for a number of years, for far too many years. And the direction we have chosen has produced some tragic results which cannot be treated lightly.

Just over 20 years ago, under the guidance of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, about $37 million was spent erecting what was to be a revolutionary urban renewal project in the ghettoes of St. Louis. The Pruitt-Igoe Housing Complex consisting of 33 11-story buildings was constructed to house 10,000 people. The concept, planning, design, and building of Pruitt-Igoe were accompanied by the standard Federal fanfare and promises that a new life was dawning for many of the underprivileged in St. Louis. This complex was to be a model for urban renewal projects across the country.

Unfortunately, things did not work out as had been promised and many dreams were shattered. First of all, most of the new residents of Pruitt-Igoe had never occupied a high rise complex and could not acclimate. And a good portion of the early tenants were displaced persons from a shanty town in the area. A lack of familiarity with the accommodations led, according to the Executive Director of the St. Louis Housing Authority, to tragic situations like those who tried to defrost their refrigerators by lighting fires in them. A coarchitect of the project acknowledged that Pruitt-Igoe was designed by middle-class whites for a group whose values and lifestyle they did not understand.

Predictably, the area began to deteriorate. The frustrated tenants who had been dumped into Pruitt-Igoe from surrounding slums were having their hopes dashed. The disappointment was manifested as the residents became victims of, and participants in, rapes, murders, muggings, and vandalizing. A few years after people began occupying Pruitt-Igoe, the incidents of rape, robbery and aggravated assault was 2½ times that of the entire city of St. Louis. This is in one development—2½ times that of the entire city. And, because of its massive structure and design, the complex was impossible to police effectively. The city's police chief noted that, "The only security there was for the thief."

The cost of this project ran well over $57 million when interest on bonds, a failed modernization effort, operating subsidies, and other costs are computed. $57 million went into that ill-fated project. A short time ago HUD pronounced Pruitt-Igoe a failure and it has since been razed. $57 million down the drain—another misguided Federal project.

How in the world did we get so far off-base here that $57 million was literally thrown down a rathole? Those funds could have improved the lives of every man, woman and child who suffered through this failed Federal experiment.

The sad thing is that we in Congress sit here and debate the merits of measures like H.R. 8410 which bears the bogus label of "reform" when our energies could be spent on genuinely improving the functions of government if that is what we truly want.

We have already heard and, undoubtedly, will be told more about the need to pass this bill because proponents claim it offers the working person a helping hand. That charade was exploded earlier in this statement. But our workforce does, of course, face some difficulties this Congress could deal with without manufacturing legislation that turns an advantage towards special interests.

For example, each year our Government contributes millions of tax dollars to international organizations which, in turn, loan money to developing nations. This is as it should be. And, as members of the governing bodies of these groups, we are expected to exercise some scrutiny over how these moneys are distributed. I doubt anyone expects us to act in contravention to our interests, especially people here at home. Well, that expectation may be a bit optimistic.

For instance, currently the domestic copper market is suffering through a depression. World prices have undercut our own because many producing nations refuse to cooperate and, instead, glut the market with this mineral. Consequently, plants across America have been compelled to reduce work forces or shut down altogether. Yet, today the United States is considering supporting a $322.6 million loan proposal by the International Monetary Fund for the financially troubled, state-owned copper industry of Zambia. And Zambia is one of those countries that is responsible for the depressed conditions of our own copper industry. Why have we not rejected this proposal out-of-hand until some understanding can be reached about the responsibilities copper producers should be expected exercise?

Would it not make a lot more sense to address ourselves to problems like this here in the Senate and try to straighten out these situations so a segment of the workforce could be put back on the job? What good are we doing them today? Strengthening the unions would not mean much to those for whom jobs are not available.

The bottom line here is this. The argument offered by the proponents of the bill claims reform of a government function is vitally needed to protect the working person in America today. That argument emanates from a narrow constituency interested primarily in advancing organized labor with a boost from Congress.

We agree on one thing, reform in this town is certainly called for. We part company on the scope of the effort. I say broaden our horizons and tackle those agencies where weaknesses have been so evident for years and where those weaknesses penalize an entire population.

The American people, I believe, are all for government reform. What we are proposing to do here should not be confused with such an effort and I doubt very seriously that many see what we are doing as helpful towards making our Government a more responsive system. And that is what reform is all about.

END STAGE RENAL DISEASE PROGRAM

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD). The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, under the previous order the Chair lays before the Senate a message from the House on H.R. 8423.

The message is as follows:

Resolved, That the House agree to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 8423) entitled "An Act to amend titles II and XVIII of the Social Security Act to make improvements in the end stage renal disease program presently authorized under section 226 of that Act, and for other purposes", with the following amendment:

In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the said amendment, insert:

That (a) title II of the Social Security Act is amended by inserting immediately after section 226 the following new section:

"SPECIAL PROVISIONS RELATING TO COVERAGE UNDER MEDICARE PROGRAM FOR END STAGE RENAL DISEASE

"SEC. 226A. (a) Notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in section 226 or title XVIII, every individual who—

"(1)(A) is fully or currently insured (as such terms are defined in section 214 of this Act) or would be fully or currently insured if his service as an employee (as defined in the Railroad Retirement Act of 1974) after December 31, 1936, were included in the term 'employment' as defined in this Act, or (B) is entitled to monthly insurance benefits under title II of this Act or an annuity under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1974, or (C) is the spouse or dependent child (as defined in regulations) of an individual who is fully or currently insured or would be fully or currently insured if his service as an employee (as defined in the Railroad Retirement Act of 1974) after December 31, 1936, were included in the term 'employment' as defined in this Act, or (D) is the spouse or dependent child (as defined in regulations) of an individual entitled to monthly insurance benefits under title II of this Act or an annuity under the Railroad Retirement Act of 1974;

"(2) is medically determined to have end stage renal disease; and

"(3) has filed an application for benefits under this section; shall, in accordance with the succeeding provisions of this section, be entitled to benefits under part A and eligible to enroll under part B of title XVIII, subject to the deductible, premium, and coinsurance provisions of that title.

"(b) Subject to subsection (c), entitlement of an individual to benefits under part A and eligibility to enroll under part B of title XVIII by reasons of this section on the basis of end stage renal disease—

"(1) shall begin with—

"(A) the third month after the month in which a regular course of renal dialysis is initiated, or

"(B) the month in which such individual receives a kidney transplant, or (if earlier) the first month in which such individual is admitted as an inpatient to an institution which is a hospital meeting the requirements of section 1861(e) (and such additional requirements as the Secretary may prescribe under section 1881(b) for such institutions) in preparation for or anticipation of kidney transplantation, but only if such transplantation occurs in that month or in either of the next two months, whichever first occurs (but no earlier than one year preceding the month of the filing of an application for benefits under this section): and

"(2) shall end, in the case of an individual who receives a kidney transplant, with the thirty-sixth month after the month in which such individual receives such transplant or, in the case of an individual who has not received a kidney transplant and no longer requires a regular course of dialysis, with the twelfth month after the month in which such course of dialysis is terminated.

"(c) Notwithstanding the provisions of subsection (b)—

"(1) in the case of any individual who participates in a self-care dialysis training program to the third month after the month in which such individual initiates a regular course of renal dialysis in a renal dialysis facility or provider of services meeting the requirements of section 1881(b), entitlement to benefits under part A and eligibility to enroll under part B of title XVIII shall begin with the month in which such regular course of renal dialysis is initiated;

"(2) in any case in which a kidney transplant fails (whether during or after the thirty-six-month period specified in subsection (b)(2)) and as a result the individual who received such transplant initiates or resumes a regular course of renal dialysis, entitlement to benefits under part A and eligibility to enroll under part B of title XVIII shall begin with the month in which such course is initiated or resumed; and

"(3) in any case in which a regular course of renal dialysis is resumed subsequent to the termination of an earlier course, entitlement to benefits under part A and eligibility to enroll under part B of title XVIII shall begin with the month in which such regular course of renal dialysis is resumed.".

(b) Section 226 of such Act is amended—

(1) by striking out subsections (e), (f), and (g), and

(2) by redesignating subsections (h) and (i) as subsections (e) (f), respectively.

SEC. 2. Part C of title XVIII of the Social Security Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"MEDICARE COVERAGE FOR END STAGE RENAL DISEASE PATIENTS

"SEC. 1881. (a) The benefits provided by parts A and B of this title shall include benefits for individuals who have been determined to have end-stage renal disease as provided in section 226A, and benefits for kidney donors as provided in subsection (d) of this section. Notwithstanding any other provision of this title, the type, duration, and scope of the benefit provided by parts A and B with respect to individuals who have been determined to have end-stage renal disease and who are entitled to such benefits without regard to section 226A shall in no case be less than the type, duration, and scope of the benefits so provided for individuals entitled to such benefits solely by reason of that section.

"(b)(1) Payments under this title with respect to services, in addition to services for which payment would otherwise be made under this title, furnished to individuals who have been determined to have end-stage renal disease shall include (A) payments on behalf of such individuals to providers of services and renal dialysis facilities which meet such requirements as the Secretary shall by regulation prescribe for institutional dialysis services and supplies (including self-dialysis services in a self-care dialysis unit maintained by the provider or facility), transplantation services, self-care home dialysis support services which are furnished by the provider of facility, and routine professional services performed by a physician during a maintenance dialysis episode if payments for his other professional services furnished to an individual who has end-stage renal disease are made on the basis specified in paragraph (3)(A) of this subsection, and (B) payments to or on behalf of such individuals for home dialysis supplies and equipment. The requirements prescribed by the Secretary under subparagraph (A) shall include requirements for a minimum utilization rate for covered procedures and for self-dialysis training programs.

"(2)(A) With respect to payments for dialysis services furnished by providers of services and renal dialysis facilities to individuals determined to have end-stage renal disease for which payments may be made under part B of this title, such payments (unless otherwise provided in this section) shall be equal to 80 percent of the amounts determined in accordance with subparagraph (B); and with respect to payments for services for which payments may be made under part A of this title, the amounts of such payments (which amounts shall not exceed, in respect to costs in procuring organs attributable to payments made to an organ procurement agency or histocompatibility laboratory, the costs incurred by that agency or laboratory) shall be determined in accordance with section 1861(v). Payments shall be made to a renal dialysis facility only if it agrees to accept such payments as payment in full for covered services, except for payment by the individual of 20 percent of the estimated amounts for such services calculated on the basis established by the Secretary under subparagraph (B) and the deductible amount imposed by section 1833 (b).

"(B) The Secretary shall prescribe in regulations any methods and procedures to (i) determine the costs incurred by providers of services and renal dialysis facilities in furnishing covered services to individuals determined to have end-stage renal disease, and (ii) determine, on a cost-related basis or other economical and equitable basis (including any basis authorized under section 1861(v)), the amounts of payments to be made for part B services furnished by such providers and facilities to such individuals. Such regulations shall provide for the implementation of appropriate incentives for encouraging more efficient and effective delivery of services (consistent with quality care), and shall include, to the extent determined feasible by the Secretary, a system for classifying comparable providers and facilities, and prospectively set rates or target rates with arrangements for sharing such reductions in costs as may be attributable to more efficient and effective delivery of services.

"(C) Such regulations, in the case of services furnished by proprietary providers and facilities may include, if the Secretary finds it feasible and appropriate, provision for recognition of a reasonable rate of return on equity capital, providing such rate of return does not exceed the rate of return stipulated in section 1861(v)(1)(B).

"(D) For purposes of section 1878, a renal dialysis facility shall be treated as a provider of services.

"(3) With respect to payments for physicians' services furnished to individuals determined to have end-stage renal disease, the Secretary shall pay 80 percent of the amounts calculated for such services—

"(A) on a reasonable charge basis (but may, in such case, make payment on the basis of the prevailing charges of other physicians for comparable services) except that payment may not be made under this subparagraph for routine services furnished during a maintenance dialysis episode, or

"(B) on a comprehensive monthly fee or other basis for an aggregate for services provided over a period of time (as defined in regulations).

"(4) Pursuant to agreements with approved providers of services and renal dialysis facilities, the Secretary may make payments to such providers and facilities for the cost of home dialysis supplies and equipment and self-care home dialysis support services furnished to patients whose self-care home dialysis is under the direct supervision of such provider or facility, on the basis of a target reimbursement rate (as defined in paragraph (6)).

"(5) An agreement under paragraph (4) shall require, in accordance with regulations prescribed by the Secretary, that the provider or facility will—

"(A) assume full responsibility for directly obtaining or arranging for the provision of—

"(i) such medically necessary dialysis equipment as is prescribed by the attending physician;

"(ii) dialysis equipment maintenance and repair services;

"(iii) the purchase and delivery of all necessary medical supplies; and

"(iv) where necessary, the services of trained home dialysis aides;

"(B) perform all such administrative functions and maintain such information and records as the Secretary may require to verify the transactions and arrangements described in subparagraph (A);

"(C) submit such cost reports, data, and information as the Secretary may require with respect to the costs incurred for equipment, supplies, and services furnished to the facility's home dialysis patient population; and

"(D) provide for full access for the Secretary to all such records, data, and information as he may require to perform his functions under this section.

"(6) The Secretary shall establish, for each calendar year, commencing with January 1, 1979, a target reimbursement rate for home dialysis which shall be adjusted for regional variations in the cost of providing home dialysis. In establishing such a rate, the Secretary shall include—

"(A) the Secretary's estimate of the cost of providing medically necessary home dialysis supplies and equipment;

"(B) an allowance, in an amount determined by the Secretary, to cover the cost of providing personnel to aid in home dialysis; and

"(C) an allowance, in an amount determined by the Secretary, to cover administrative costs and to provide an incentive for the efficient delivery of home dialysis; but in no event shall such target rate exceed 70 percent of the national average payment, adjusted for regional variations, for maintenance dialysis services furnished in approved providers and facilities during the preceding fiscal year. Any such target rate so established shall be utilized, without renegotiation of the rate, throughout the calendar year for which it is established. During the last quarter of each calendar year, the Secretary shall establish a home dialysis target reimbursement rate for the next calendar year based on the most recent data available to the Secretary at the time. In establishing any rate under this paragraph, the Secretary may utilize a competitive-bid procedure, a pre-negotiated rate procedure, or any other procedure which the Secretary determines is appropriate and feasible in order to carry out this paragraph in an effective and efficient manner.

"(7) For purposes of this title, the term 'home dialysis supplies and equipment' means medically necessary supplies and equipment (including supportive equipment) required by an individual suffering from end-stage renal disease in connection with renal dialysis carried out in his home (as defined in regulations), including obtaining, installing, and maintaining such equipment.

"(8) For purposes of this title, the term 'self-care home dialysis support services', to the extent permitted in regulation, means—

"(A) periodic monitoring of the patient's home adaptation, including visits by qualified provider or facility personnel (as defined in regulations), so long as this is done in accordance with a plan prepared and periodically reviewed by a professional team (as defined in regulations) including the individual's physician;

"(B) installation annd maintenance of dialysis equipment;

"(C) testing and appropriate treatment of the water; and

"(D) such additional supportive services as the Secretary finds appropriate and desirable.

"(9) For purposes of this title, the term 'self-care dialysis unit' means a renal dialysis facility or a distinct part of such facility or of a provider of services, which has been approved by the Secretary to make self-dialysis services, as defined by the Secretary in regulations, available to individuals who have been trained for self-dialysis. A self-care dialysis unit must, at a minimum, furnish the services, equipment, and supplies needed for self-care dialysis, have patient-staff ratios which are appropriate to self-dialysis (allowing for such appropriate lesser degree of ongoing medical supervision and assistance of ancillary personnel than is required for full care maintenance dialysis), and meet such other requirements as the Secretary may prescribe with respect to the quality and cost-effectiveness of services.

"(c)(1)(A) For the purpose of assuring effective and efficient administration of the benefits provided under this section, the Secretary shall establish, in accordance with such criteria as he finds appropriate, renal disease network areas, such network organizations (including a coordinating council, an executive committee of such council, and a medical review board, for each network area) as he finds necessary to accomplish such purpose, and a national end stage renal disease medical information system. The Secretary may by regulations provide for such coordination of network planning and quality assurance activities and such exchange of data and information among agencies with responsibilities for health planning and quality assurance activities under Federal law as is consistent with the economical and efficient administration of this section and with the responsibilities established for network organizations under this section.

"(B) At least one patient representative shall serve as a member of each coordinating council and executive committee.

"(C) The Secretary shall, in regulations, prescribe requirements with respect to membership in network organizations by individuals (and the relatives of such individuals) (i) who have an ownership or control interest in a facility or provider which furnishes services referred to in section 1861 (s)(2)(F), or (ii) who have received remuneration from any such quality or provider in excess of such amounts as constitute reasonable compensation for services (including time and effort relative to the provision of professional medical services) or goods supplied to such facility or provider; and such requirements shall provide for the definition, disclosure, and, to the maximum extent consistent with effective administration, prevention of potential or actual financial or professional conflicts of interest with respect to decisions concerning the appropriateness, nature, or site of patient care.

"(2) The network organizations of each network shall be responsible, in addition to such other duties and functions as may be prescribed by the Secretary, for—

"(A) encouraging, consistent with sound medical practice, the use of those treatment settings most compatible with the successful rehabilitation of the patient;

"(B) developing criteria and standards relating to the quality and appropriateness of patient care; and network goals with respect to the placement of patients in self-care settings and undergoing or preparing for transplantation;

"(C) evaluating the procedure by which facilities and providers in the network assess the appropriateness of patients for proposed treatment modalities;

"(D) identifying facilities and providers that are not cooperating toward meeting network goals and assisting such facilities and providers in developing appropriate plans for correction; and

"(E) submitting an annual report to the Secretary on July 1 of each year which shall include a full statement of the network's goals, data on the network's performance in meeting its goals (including data on the comparative performance of facilities and providers with respect to the identification and placement of suitable candidates in self-care settings and transplantation), identification of those facilities that have consistently failed to cooperate with network goals, and recommendations with respect to the need for additional or alternative services or facilities in the network in order to meet the network goals, including self-dialysis training, transplantation, and organ procurement facilities.

"(3) Where the Secretary determines, on the basis of the data contained in the network's annual report and such other relevant data as may be available to him, that a facility or provider has consistently failed to cooperate with network plans and goals, he may terminate or withhold certification of such facility or provider (for purposes of payment for services furnished to individuals with end stage renal disease) until he determines that such provider or facility is making reasonable and appropriate efforts to cooperate with the network's plans and goals.

"(4) The Secretary shall, in determining whether to certify additional facilities or expansion of existing facilities within a network, take into account the network's goals and performance as reflected in the network's annual report.

"(5) The Secretary, after consultation with appropriate professional and planning organizations, shall provide such guidelines with respect to the planning and delivery of renal disease services as are necessary to assist network organizations in their development of their respective networks' goals to promote the optimum use of self-dialysis and transplantation by suitable candidates for such modalities.

"(6) It is the intent of the Congress that the maximum practical number of patients who are medically, socially, and psychologically suitable candidates for home dialysis or transplantation should be so treated. The Secretary shall consult with appropriate professional and network organizations and consider available evidence relating to developments in research, treatment methods, and technology for home dialysis and transplantation. The Secretary shall periodically submit to the Congress such legislative recommendations as the Secretary finds warranted on the basis of such consultation and evidence to further the national objective of maximizing the use of home dialysis and transplantation consistent with good medical practice.

"(d) Notwithstanding any provision to the contrary in section 226 any individual who donates a kidney for transplant surgery shall be entitled to benefits under parts A and B of this title with respect to such donation. Reimbursement for the reasonable expenses incurred by such an individual with respect to a kidney donation shall be made (without regard to the deductible, premium, and coinsurance provisions of this title), in such manner as may be prescribed by the Secretary in regulations, for all reasonable preparatory, operation, and postoperation recovery expenses associated with such donation, including but not limited to the expenses for which payment could be made if he were an eligible individual for purposes of parts A and B of this title without regard to this subsection. Payments for postoperation recovery expenses shall be limited to the actual period of recovery.

"(e)(1) Notwithstanding any other provisions of this title, the Secretary may, pursuant to agreements with approved providers of services and renal dialysis facilities, reimburse such providers and facilities (without regard to the deductible and coinsurance provisions of this title) for the reasonable cost of the purchase, installation, maintenance and reconditioning for subsequent use of artificial kidney and automated dialysis peritoneal machines (including supportive equipment) which are to be used exclusively by entitled individuals dialyzing at home.

"(2) An agreement under this subsection shall require that the provider or facility will—

"(A) make the equipment available for use only by entitled individuals dialyzing at home;

"(B) recondition the equipment, as needed, for reuse by such individuals throughout the useful life of the equipment, including modification of the equipment consistent with advances in research and technology;

"(C) provide for full access for the Secretary to all records and information relating to the purchase, maintenance, and use of the equipment; and

"(D) submit such reports, data, and information as the Secretary may require with respect to the cost, management, and use of the equipment.

"(3) For purposes of this section, the term 'supportive equipment' includes blood pumps, heparin pumps, bubble detectors, other alarm systems, and such other items as the Secretary may determine are medically necessary.

"(f)(1) The Secretary shall initiate and carry out, at selected locations in the United States, pilot projects under which financial assistance in the purchase of new or used durable medical equipment for renal dialysis is provided to individuals suffering from end stage renal disease at the time home dialysis is begun, with provision for a trial period to assure successful adaptation to home dialysis before the actual purchase of such equipment.

"(2) The Secretary shall conduct experiments to evaluate methods for reducing the costs of the end stage renal disease program. Such experiments shall include (without being limited to) reimbursement for nurses and dialysis technicians to assist with home dialysis, and reimbursement to family members assisting with home dialysis.

"(3) The Secretary shall conduct experiments to evaluate methods of dietary control for reducing the costs of the end stage renal disease program, including (without being limited to) the use of protein-controlled products to delay the necessity for, or reduce the frequency of, dialysis in the treatment of endstage renal disease.

"(4) The Secretary shall conduct a comprehensive study of methods for increasing public participation in kidney donation and other organ donation programs.

"(5) The Secretary shall conduct a full and complete study of the reimbursement of physicians for services furnished to patients with end stage renal disease under this title, giving particular attention to the range of payments to physicians for such services, the average amounts of such payments, and the number of hours devoted to furnishing such services to patients at home, in renal disease facilities, in hospitals, and elsewhere.

"(6) The Secretary shall conduct a study of the number of patients with end renal disease who are not eligible for benefits with respect to such disease under this title (by reason of this section or otherwise), and of the economic impact of such noneligibility of such individuals. Such study shall include consideration of mechanisms whereby governmental and other health plans might be instituted or modified to permit the purchase of actuarially sound coverage for the costs of end stage renal disease.

"(7) The Secretary shall conduct a study of the medical appropriateness and safety of cleaning and reusing dialysis filters by home dialysis patients. In such cases in which the Secretary determines that such home cleaning and reuse of filters is a medically sound procedure, the Secretary shall conduct experiments to evaluate such home cleaning and reuse as a method of reducing the costs of the end stage renal disease program.

"(8) The Secretary shall submit to the Congress no later than October 1, 1979, a full report on the experiments conducted under paragraphs (1), (2), (3), and (7), and the studies under paragraphs (4), (5), (6), and (7). Such report shall include any recommendations for legislative changes which the Secretary finds necessary or desirable as a result of such experiments and studies.

"(g) The Secretary shall submit to the Congress on April 1, 1979, and April 1 of each year thereafter a report on the end stage renal disease program, including but not limited to—

"(1) the number of patients, nationally and by renal disease network, on dialysis (self-dialysis or otherwise) at home and in facilities;

"(2) the number of new patients entering dialysis at home and in facilities during the year;

"(3) the number of facilities providing dialysis and the utilization rates of those facilities;

"(4) the number of kidney transplants, by source of donor organ;

"(5) the number of patients awaiting organs for transplant;

"(6) the number of transplant failures;

"(7) the range of costs of kindey acquisitions, by type of facility and by region;

"(8) the number of facilities providing transplants and the number of transplants performed per facility;

"(9) patient mortality and morbidity rates;

"(10) the average annual cost of hospitalization for ancillary problems in dialysis and transplant patients, and drug costs for transplant patients;

"(11) medicare payment rates for dialysis, transplant procedures, and physician services, along with any changes in such rates during the year and the reasons for those changes;

"(12) the results of cost-saving experiments;

"(13) the results of basic kidney disease research conducted by the Federal Government, private institutions, and foreign governments;

"(14) information on the activities of medical review boards and other networks organizations; and

"(15) estimated program costs over the next five years.".

SEC. 3. (a) Section 226(a) of the Social Security Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "specified in subparagraph (B)" and inserting in lieu thereof "specified in paragraph (1)"; and

(2) by striking out "specified in subparagraphs (A) and (B)" and inserting in lieu thereof "specified in paragraphs (1) and (2)".

(b) Paragraphs (2) and (3) of section 226(e) of such Act (as redesignated by subsection (b)(2) of the first section of this Act) are each amended by striking out "subsection b" and inserting in lieu thereof "subsection (b)".

SEC. 4. (a) Section 1811 of the Social Security Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "section 226" and inserting in lieu thereof "sections 226 and 226A";

(2) by striking out "and" at the end of clause (1), and inserting in lieu thereof a comma; and

(3) by inserting immediately before the period the following: ", and (3) certain individuals who do not meet the conditions specified in either clause (1) or (2) but who are medically determined to have endstage renal disease".

(b) Section 1833(a)(1) of such Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of clause (C), and

(2) by adding the following after "section)," in clause (D): "and (E) with respect to services furnished to individuals who have been determined to have endstage renal disease, the amounts paid shall be determined subject to the provisions of section 1881, and".

(c) Section 1833(a)(2) of such Act is amended by inserting "(unless otherwise specified in section 1881)" after "other services".

(d) Section 1861(s)(2) of such Act is amended—

(1) by striking out "and" at the end of clause (D);

(2) by inserting "and" at the end of clause (E); and

(3) by adding the following new clause after clause (E):

"(F) home dialysis supplies and equipment, self-care home dialysis support services, and institutional dialysis services and supplies;".

(e) The first sentence of section 1866(a)(2)(A) of such Act is amended by inserting the following before the period: "(but in the case of items and services furnished to individuals with endstage renal disease, an amount equal to 20 percent of the estimated amounts for such items and services calculated on the basis established by the Secretary)".

(f) Section 1814(b)(1) of such Act is amended by inserting "and as further limited by section 1881(b)(2)(B)" after "1861(v)".

SEC. 5. The third sentence of section 1817(b) of the Social Security Act, and the third sentence of section 1841(b) of such Act, and section 1876(b)(2)(B) of such Act, are each amended by striking out "Commissioner of Social Security" and inserting in lieu thereof "Administrator of the Health Care Financing Administration".

SEC. 6. The amendments made by the preceding sections of this Act shall become effective with respect to services, supplies, and equipment funished after the third calendar month which begins after the date of the enactment of this Act, except that those amendments providing for the implementation of an incentive reimbursement system for dialysis services furnished in facilities and providers shall become effective with respect to a facility's or provider's first accounting period which begins after the last day of the twelfth month following the month of the enactment of this Act, and those amendments providing for reimbursement rates for home dialysis shall become effective on April 1, 1979.

SEC. 7. Section 15(d) of Public Law 93–233 (as amended by section 7(c) of Public Law 93–368 and the first section of Public Law 94–368) is amended by striking out "October 1, 1977" and inserting in lieu thereof "October 1, 1978".

SEC. 8 (a) The first sentence of section 1905(c) of the Social Security Act is amended—

(1) by striking "and (3)" and inserting in lieu thereof "(3)"; and

(2) by striking out the period at the end thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the following ", and (4) meets the requirements of section 1861(j)(14) with respect to protection of patients' personal funds.".

(b) The fourth sentence of section 1905(c) of such Act is amended by striking out "clauses (2) and (3)" and inserting in lieu thereof "clauses (2), (3), and (4)".

(c) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall, by regulation, define those costs which may be charged to the personal funds of patients in intermediate care facilities who are individuals receiving medical assistance under a State plan approved under the provisions of title XIX of the Social Security Act, and those costs which are to be included in the reasonable cost or reasonable charge for intermediate care facility services as determined under the provisions of such title.

(d)(1) The amendments made by subsections (a) and (b) shall become effective on July 1, 1978.

(2) The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare shall issue the regulations required under subsection (c) within 90 days after the date of enactment of this Act but not later than July 1, 1978.

(e) Section 20(c)(2) of the Medicare-Medicaid Anti-Fraud and Abuse Amendments (Public Law 95–142) is amended by striking out "section 1905(g)" and inserting in lieu thereof "section 1903(g)".

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TALMADGE. I yield.

ORDER FOR CONSIDERATION OF SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 89

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, this request has been cleared all around. I ask unanimous consent that upon completion of action by the Senate on H.R. 8423, Senator STEVENSON be authorized to call up for immediate consideration a concurrent resolution authorizing the printing of additional copies of the Senate Ethics Committee's hearings on the Korean inquiry, and that there be a time limit on the measure of not to exceed 10 minutes, equally divided between Mr. STEVENSON and Mr. SCHMITT.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield, so that we can have a quorum call when the intervening measures are dealt with?

Mr. TALMADGE. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

END STAGE RENAL DISEASE PROGRAM

The Senate continued with the consideration of the message from the House of Representatives on H.R. 8423.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, debate on the motion to concur in the House amendment to the Senate amendment to the bill shall not exceed 20 minutes, to be equally divided between Senator TALMADGE and Senator CURTIS.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I am willing to respond to any questions the distinguished Senator from Nebraska may have.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. President, with regard to the renal dialysis measure before the Senate, H.R. 8423, I believe that a number of significant steps are undertaken which should improve the delivery of services in this critical area. A more appropriate balance should be struck between facility dialysis and home dialysis under the provisions of the bill, and new reimbursement mechanisms are put in place which should establish a desirable move away from pure cost-related reimbursement.

As many of the Members know, I have had a "hold" on this bill to enable us to review the changes which were made by the House. Language was added by that body in the expressed wish to avoid a conference; that language, as it relates to the establishment of goals and guidelines, differs somewhat materially from the bill that was reported by the Committee on Finance and adopted by the Senate. In the belief that the original House-passed language—which would have established, as an overall objective, the goal that a majority of kidney patients be placed in home care—would have interfered with physicians' professional judgments and would have created arbitrary standards, the Senate deleted these provisions. The House has now restored language which would direct network organizations to develop goals regarding home dialysis and transplantation; to identify facilities and providers that "are not cooperating toward meeting network goals and assisting such facilities and providers in developing appropriate plans for correction"; and to file an annual report, to include a full statement of their goals, data on their performance in meeting their goals (and comparative performance data on facilities and providers), identification of facilities that "have consistently failed to cooperate with network goals," and recommendations on the adequacy of network services in achieving their goals.

In addition, the bill would authorize HEW termination or suspension of a facility or provider which "has consistently failed to cooperate with network plans and goals" until HEW determines that it "is making reasonable and appropriate efforts to cooperate." The legislation would also empower HEW, "in determining whether to certify additional facilities or expansion of existing facilities within a network, (to) take into account the network's goals and performances • • •" and to provide guidelines to assist networks in the development of their respective goals to promote optimum use of self-dialysis and transplantation of suitable candidates.

Finally, the measure gives specific legislative sanction to network organizations and their coordinating councils, executive committees, and medical review boards, and mandates patient representation on coordinating councils.

In light of the Senate's express deletion of the goal language which was in the original House legislation, I have several concerns about the provisions of the bill as it now stands. I have no trouble with the establishment of goals per se, but these appear to be goals and guidelines with potential sanctions that may go far beyond what is consistent with the Senate's original intention. The last thing we want is to give further Federal entities—be they network organizations or HEW—further arbitrary control over the practice of medicine. We have had enough experience with the health planning guidelines in recent months to make it clear that we do not want arbitrary, bureaucratically established "standards" imposed on local treatment decisions. Accordingly I have several questions that I would like to direct to the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee to clarify legislative intent in this critical area; this is particularly important, I think, in the absence of a conference committee report.

First, is my understanding correct that goals are to be developed only by network organizations and that these organizations are local in nature?

Mr. TALMADGE. That is correct. Any such numerical goals are to be developed only by the local network organizations.

Mr. CURTIS. Second, even though the legislation mandates only a patient representative on the coordination councils, is the intention to continue the present practice where each facility is represented on such councils?

Mr. TALMADGE. The bill does not call for any change in the representation of facilities on the coordinating councils. However, it does require the Secretary to prescribe regulations concerning membership by individuals to prevent conflicts of interest.

Mr. CURTIS. Third, is my understanding correct that, first, the goals network organizations are to develop are to be general statements of desirable direction and not numerical in nature? second, the goals are never intended to interfere with individual treatment decisions or the practice of medicine by the individual's physician? and third, the medical, social, and psychological suitability of the patient is to be the primary consideration, and is to supersede any goals, in the decision as to whether he is treated with home dialysis or facility dialysis?

Mr. TALMADGE. Network goals on the placement of patients are not intended to be rigid numerical quotas.

The bill is quite clear in stating that decisions about the treatment of patients are to be made on a patient-by-patient basis and that each decision is to take account of the individual patient's particular medical, psychological, and social situation, and is not to be overridden in order to satisfy any goals.

Mr. CURTIS. Fourth, are the guidelines (which HEW is authorized to adopt) intended to be solely to assist networks in an advisory way, and not in any sense to be standards imposed or required by the Federal Government?

Mr. TALMADGE. That is correct.

HEW's guidelines are intended only to assist networks in the development of their respective goals to promote optimum appropriate use of self-dialysis and transplantation for suitable candidates.

Mr. CURTIS. I thank the distinguished chairman. I believe it important that these issues be clarified before we move to concur with these latest changes made by the House.

Mr. President, I have no further remarks, and whenever the distinguished chairman of the subcommittee is ready to yield back his time, I shall yield back mine.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I am pleased that this important legislation is on its way to the White House.

Just a few days ago the President indicated to me his support of the bill and his desire to see H.R. 8423 enacted into law as soon as possible.

Giving credit where credit is due, I would like to compliment the work on this measure by the House Ways and Means Committee.

I also compliment the ranking minority member of the subcommittee, the Senator from Kansas (Mr. DOLE), who was most cooperative. I also compliment the staff, who worked diligently on this matter.

It should also be noted that a bill with similar objectives was originally introduced by Senator LONG in the 94th Congress.

The strong support of Senator MAGNUSON in moving this bill through the Congress should also be acknowledged.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, as I have noted in my previous remarks on the end stage renal disease bill, this program has given hope to thousands of individuals. It has protected them from possible financial disaster that frequently is caused by the prohibitive costs of dialysis and transplantation.

Problems with this program have existed in the past and it is these problems that we have attempted to address with this legislation.

COST OF PROGRAM

The cost to the Federal Government of the end stage renal disease program has risen at a faster rate than any of us expected. Current estimates by the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, indicate that the cost of the program in fiscal year 1978 will be $900 million and will continue to rise.

Our concern has been to determine ways to reduce costs without placing the patients' welfare in jeopardy. We believe an increase in the use of home dialysis is a step toward solving the problem.

HOME DIALYSIS

It has been demonstrated that the cost of home dialysis can be considerably lower than that of institutional dialysis after the first year. Additionally, home dialysis is seen as the treatment of choice for many patients, because it enables them to build the dialysis treatments around their life rather than build a life around dialysis.

PATIENT AND PHYSICIAN DECISIONMAKING

Our legislation, while removing the fiscal disincentives to home dialysis, in no way attempts to mandate any one particular form of treatment. That decision is appropriately left to the physician and the patient.

It should also be noted that it has always been our assumption that only those patients who are medically, socially, and psychologically suitable would be placed in home dialysis. No artificial goals or standards should be allowed to override these considerations.

REIMBURSEMENT SYSTEM

There have been numerous criticisms in the past of our methods of reimbursement for renal dialysis services. When the program was enacted in 1972 we recognized the difficulties that would arise in developing a reimbursement system that was equitable. Little data was available at that time on actual treatment costs. This legislation attempts to make the system a more equitable one. In an attempt to lower costs it is our intention that the reimbursement system, with respect to dialysis services furnished by facilities to patients, will encourage more efficient and effective delivery of services.

The Secretary will be authorized to develop numerous methods of reimbursement, including where possible, the use of prospectively set rates, target rates, and other such incentives that they determine will encourage a more cost-effective system. It is contemplated that in some instances a simple cost related system will be most appropriate where as in others another method may be more effective.

CLASSIFICATION AND COMPARISON SYSTEM

Inherent in the development of a reimbursement system which provides incentives for good management and efficiency, we believe the development of a system for classifying and comparing facilities may well be appropriate.

RELATED ORGANIZATIONS

The bill authorizes the secretary to utilize any basis under section 1861(v) of the Social Security Act for reimbursement. This would enable the Secretary to collapse profit generated by a vertically integrated company. While there are certain circumstances in which this would be appropriate, this principle should not work to discourage arrangements designed to encourage efficiency.

It seems to me that the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare should consider the possibility of determining whether, and the extent to which, such arrangements may work to reduce program costs so program savings can be taken into account in deciding whether profit should be allowed.

COST SHARING

The bill also authorizes the Secretary to initiate target rates, with a provision for sharing cost savings with the Government. This is an innovative approach. But it should be recognized that the incentive payments that proprietary facilities earn will be subject to taxes, the same as their other profits. The Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare should carefully review the performance of the proprietary facilities to determine whether the amount of the incentive payments that can be retained after taxes is sufficient to effectively promote efficiency, or whether an alternative incentive payment system would be appropriate.

CONCLUSION

End stage renal disease is a frightening, lifelong condition for a great number of people. This bill will do much to improve our assistance to these individuals.

I thank my colleagues for their support of this legislation, and I thank the distinguished Senator from Georgia (Mr. TALMADGE) for his work and leadership in this area.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I yield back the remainder of my time, and I move that the Senate concur in the House amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. TALMADGE. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

AUTHORITY TO PRINT ADDITIONAL COPIES OF "KOREAN INFLUENCE INQUIRY"

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the previous order, the Chair recognizes the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, I send to the desk a concurrent resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The concurrent resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 89) authorizing the printing of additional copies of volume II of the Senate hearings entitled "Korean Influence Inquiry."

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, this concurrent resolution has been discussed with the minority; it has been discussed with the chairman of the Rules Committee and the ranking minority member of that committee.

It would authorize printing, for the use of the Senate Select Committee on Ethics, 2,000 additional copies of its hearings entitled "The Korean Influence Inquiry."

I do not know of any objection to the resolution, and I urge its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the concurrent resolution.

The concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 89) was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed for the use of the Senate Select Committee on Ethics two thousand additional copies of volume II of its hearings of the Ninety-fifth Congress, second session, entitled "Korean Influence Inquiry".

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LABOR LAW REFORM ACT OF 1978

The Senate continued with the consideration of H.R. 8410.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my remarks made this day will not be in violation of the second speech rule under the rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. HATCH. Yes.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the able Senator.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Terry McCourt, of Senator LAXALT's staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor during consideration of the pending bill and any votes thereon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of my remarks be printed in the RECORD immediately following my remarks made earlier this morning as though they were given at the same time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Mr. HATCH's remarks at this point are printed earlier in today's RECORD.)

Mr. HATCH. I notice that the distinguished Senator from North Carolina is here, and I am delighted to yield the floor at this time in favor of him.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. President, I do thank my distinguished colleague, for I do have a conflict in my scheduling today.

Mr. President, on three other occasions I have spoken here on the floor of the Senate with regard to the proposed legislation which is before us.

I have dealt so far on the Senate floor with the motivations behind the labor law reform bill and the specifics of the first section of the bill, that part dealing with delay.

Today, I wish to discuss a part of the bill which is so serious that it deserves separate attention, the section of S. 2467 which creates a rule known as "equal access." I believe that this provision is the most serious change proposed under the bill and I want to spend a few moments exploring it.

Section 6 of S. 2467 directs the National Labor Relations Board to create a rule which provides that if an employer addresses his employees on his own premises or during working hours concerning representation issues, then the labor organization, upon notice to the employer of its intent to represent the employees, would be given an opportunity to come onto the premises and address the employees for the same amount of time.

In other words, if an employer speaks to his own employees on his own property at his own expense, then a labor organization would be able to come onto the premises, on the employer's time and at his expense to address the employees concerning representation issues. My understanding of the bill is that it is not limited to captive audience speeches but could apply to written presentations as well.

Now, I have some serious reservations about this approach. Mr. President, I wish to present some considerations that I hope the supporters of this bill will take up and respond to during the course of our discussion.

My first concern is that the Congress is taking what is a remedy under current practice and making it into a rule of general application. Let me be specific on this point. Under current practice what this bill calls "equal access" is already available. It is a remedy for extreme violations of the law or to cure physical imbalances that deny employees an ability to get information from unions.

Mr. President, under current law, what this bill terms "equal access" and what I call "remedial access," is already available.

For example in the Supreme Court case of NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox Co., 351 U.S. 105 (1956), the court stated that the right of self-organization depends in some measure on the ability of employees to learn the advantages of self-organization. If the location of a plant and living quarters place employees beyond the reach of reasonable union efforts to communicate with them, the employer may be directed to allow the union to come onto his property to approach his employees. What this case noted, as did several others such as the Tamiment case (NLRB v. Tamiment, 451 F.2d 794 (1st Cir. 1971)), the Kutsher's case (NLRB v. Kutsher's Hotel, 427 F.2d 200 (2nd Cir. 1970)) and the Grossinger's case (NLRB v. S & H Grossinger's Inc., 372 F.2d 26 (2nd Cir. 1967)), was that if an employer's workers are living on the employer's property and unions are excluded from those premises, then the employer may be forced by a court or by the Board to allow a union to come and speak on the premises. A remedy of the imbalance is available and remedial access is provided after careful review. As a remedy, one case noted that it is so much of an invasion of property that if the union was allowed to come on the property, the employer was not required to provide the union with an opportunity equal to that which the employer had taken to address the employees.

Let me state that remedial access is available not only when a physical situation interferes with access to information; it is also available when an employer is ruled to have repeatedly violated the law such that information is denied or where he has committed serious unfair labor practices. Let me give an example, in the J. P. Stevens case, an administrative law judge ruled on December 21, 1977, that the company would have to allow union representatives into its plant for reasonable amounts of time to communicate with the employees. While I would not pass on the merits of this case, the NLRB has seen fit to order remedial access and to allow the union in question to have two 30-minute speeches to the employees. In short, we have remedial access for either physical advantage or for repeated violations of the law. The remedy is managed by the courts and by the NLRB.

SITUATION TODAY

Mr. President, we are dealing with apples and oranges here. Simple equations, that if an employer speaks, then a union should have equal time, are just that—simple and divorced from any reality. What we have now, under the delicate framework created by the NLRB and the courts, is, I repeat, equal access. An employer cannot go to an employee's home and a labor organization cannot come onto company property. Other rules, hammered out over a long period of time, have created a situation which guarantees an employee equal access to information. Where this right is denied, we have a remedy.

PRIVATE PROPERTY

We began in this country with the concept that private property is an important value, something to be guaranteed by the Constitution. An employer's workplace was his private domain. During the years, it was determined that employees had a right to the protection of their health so maximum hour and minimum wage laws were passed; in recent times, to protect workers from unsafe conditions, the Occupational Safety and Health Act was passed.

I might mention, much to the surprise of many, the Supreme Court yesterday ruled that even in this situation private property was important, and that Federal inspectors could not go onto private property, in the absence of consent of the owner, without adequate court orders.

I have not read the case, and I am not in a position to comment on the details of it. But it is some indication of the importance placed by the courts in this day and time on private property.

To allow them to bargain collectively, which is the real purpose of the law, the National Labor Relations Act was passed. All of these things were created and in a way involved the Government in the operation of the workplace. In all of this, the employer gave away and was given little in return. Now we see under this proposal the final attack on the workplace. No longer may an employer control who comes on and off his property; the Federal Government will do that for him.

POLICY DETERMINATION

I believe the challenge that must be met by the proponents of this bill is whether they can ask the Congress in good faith to determine that every employer in this country is violating our labor laws such that they deny their employees information. If this is not the case, and I do not believe it is the case, then we should not take what is a remedy and make it into a rule. If we cannot make that determination, then I do not think we should make remedial access a national policy.

CONSTITUTIONALITY

The second point I would like to deal with is the reality that exists today in labor-management relations. The reality denies any need for so-called equal access or for making remedial access into a rule of practice. The reality is that this bill is attempting to apply the equal time concept of public elections to representation elections. There is no link, Mr. President. A political election is conducted in public and interferes with no one's property rights. A representation election centers on collective bargaining and involves some very important property rights. Providing in S. 2467 that equal time should not interfere with normal business operations is an insufficient guarantee. Besides the infringement on constitutional property rights—the taking of property without due process by requiring an employer to pay for union speeches—I have a concern about the chilling effect of this proposal on the freedom of speech guaranteed by the first amendment. We already have limits on employer speech and now we could be adding more restraint. There is to my mind a very real constitutional question raised by the equal access provision. I hope the sponsors of this bill will address it.

As I mentioned earlier, the decision of the Supreme Court yesterday, in the OSHA case, which was rendered after I prepared my remarks for delivery today, adds even greater emphasis to the question of the constitutionality of this provision.

MANAGEMENT OF ACCESS

There is another reality to be faced and that is management of the proposal. What about retail stores which have large showrooms? How are we to police who is on the floor and who is campaigning? Are we to limit the types of communication raised by this bill? Would the posting of a safety poster by an employer require equal time for a union? The reason I raise these problems is because I believe that one day they will be the subject of court cases. I raise them, because the first part of the bill seeks to cure delay; this part of the bill will, in my judgment, create the need for extensive court review and further delay. The bill creates problems which it attempted to cure at another point.

SUMMARY

The reasoning of S. 2467 seems to be that either employers are denying employees information or that there is a link between the inability to get on an employer's property and the drop in votes in favor of union representation. Both of these are weak arguments. There is no indication that there has been a massive campaign to deny employees access to information about the benefits of collective bargaining through union representation. Nor is there any proof that employees reject unions, because of an absence of union campaign materials. Let me be candid, Mr. President, on the whole I believe that labor-management relations in this country are at a very good level and again I am at a loss to see a need for the provisions of this bill. Again I would challenge the Senate to determine that there is such a problem in this country to necessitate our creating an imbalance in our labor laws and to create a rule which I believe to be unjustified, unnecessary, of doubtful constitutionality, and which makes a policy judgment which is ill-advised.

Mr. President, in the several months that this matter has been pending in Congress, I have given much thoughtful and careful consideration to the merits of the bill as my time permitted. I have tried, in the several comments I have made on this floor, to give an analysis, as thoughtful an analysis as I can, on the objectives and the problems raised in the bill.

We have sought the advice of the Congressional Research Service on the various issues, to assure ourselves that we were on sound ground. With regard to the question which I have addressed today, concerning labor union access to employees during organizational campaigns, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD immediately following my comments today a memorandum prepared by the Congressional Research Service on this question, dated January 19, 1978.

There being no objection, the memorandum was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C.,
January 19, 1978.

From American Law Division.
Subject: Labor Union Access to Employees During Organizational Campaigns.

The access of labor unions to employees during organizational campaigns is a matter which involves an adjustment between the employees' right of self-organization and the employers' right to maintain discipline in their establishment. In the course of administering the Act, The National Labor Relations Board and the courts have established certain basic presumptions concerning the rights of employees, employers, and nonemployee organizers to communicate through personal solicitation, the distribution of literature, and the holding of meetings.

In general, a rule adopted by an employer that prohibits union solicitation by employees outside working time, although on company property, is an unreasonable impediment to self-organization and therefore discriminatory in the absence of evidence that special circumstances make the rule necessary for maintaining production and discipline. Republic Aviation Corp. v. NLRB, 324 U.S. 793, 803 n. 10 (1945). On the other hand, the promulgation and enforcement of a no-solicitation rule for working hours must be presumed valid in the absence of evidence that it was adopted for a discriminatory purpose. Peyton Packing Co., 49 NLRB 828, 843–44 (1943).

Oral solicitation by employees may be prohibited only during working hours, while the distribution of literature may be prohibited both during working hours and in working areas. Stoddard-Quick Mfg. Co., 138 NLRB 615 (1962).

The rules applicable to nonemployees, however, are substantially different. An employer may prohibit the distribution of union literature by nonemployee union organizers if reasonable efforts by the union through other available channels will enable it to reach the employees, and if the employer does not discriminate against the union by allowing distribution by other nonemployees. NLRB v. Babcock & Wilcox, 351 U.S. 105 (1956). Therefore, nonemployee organizers can enter the property of an employer only if the employees are so inaccessible as to make attempts through usual channels ineffective or practically impossible. See, e.g., Central Hardware Co. v. NLRB, 407 U.S. 539 (1972).

If an employer makes a "captive audience speech" to his employees on company time and on the business premises, he is not obliged to give the union an opportunity to reply, where the union has other means to carry its message to the employees. Livingston Shirt Co., 107 NLRB 400, 409 (1953).

The Board has taken different positions on the problem of captive audience speeches over the years. Under the original Wagner Act of 1935, the Board prohibited captive audience speeches. Clark Bros., 70 NLRB 802 (1946). In 1947, the Taft-Hartley Act amended section 8(c) to assure the employer's right of free speech. The Board responded by promulgating the equal opportunity doctrine, which obliged the employer to permit a reply if he delivered captive audience speeches coupled with no-solicitation rules. Bonwit-Teller, Inc., 96 NLRB 608 (1951). This doctrine was reversed two years later by the Livingston Shirt case, supra.

In 1966, the Board declined to reinstate the Bonwit-Teller rule, and instead voted to postpone any reconsideration of the question of plant access until it had the benefit of experience under the Excelsior rule. The Excelsior rule requires the employer to furnish the union with the names and addresses of all employees prior to the representation election. Excelsior Underwear, Inc., 156 NLRB 1236 (1966).

The proposed Labor Reform Act of 1977, as passed by the House on October 7, 1977, would require the Board to reinstitute the equal access policy by means of its rulemaking power. The bill requires the Board to issue regulations providing that if an employer addresses employees on its premises or during working time on issues relating to representation by a labor organization, then the employees shall be assured on equal opportunity to obtain in an equivalent manner information from the union. H.R. 8410, 95th Cong., 1st Sess. (1977).

The rules promulgated by the Board would be subject to reasonable conditions, including due regard for the needs of the employer to maintain the continuity of production. The rules would also provide that employees are assured an equal opportunity overall to obtain such information from the employer and the labor organization, with due regard for the employees' rights to self-organization, the labor organization's right to conduct meetings without undue interference, and the employees' right to the privacy of their own homes. Such rules would be subject to a Congressional veto after being promulgated by the Board.

Mr. MORGAN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I want to compliment my distinguished colleague from North Carolina on his remarks. Obviously he has done his homework, and he always does, and has contributed in excellent fashion to the discussion of this legislation now pending before the Senate.

DRUG REGULATION REFORM

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, before beginning my remarks on the bill, I would like to call the attention of the Senate to some testimony given before a Senate committee recently.

MR. ROUSE AND MR. COLLEY OFFER ANALYSIS OF S. 2755, THE DRUG REGULATION REFORM ACT OF 1978

Mr. President, last week Mr. Elmore Rouse, president of the National Pharmaceutical Alliance and Mr. William Colley, counsel of the alliance testified before the Subcommittee on Health and Scientific Research of the Senate Committee on Human Resources. NPA is an association of over 100 small pharmaceutical firms dedicated to preserving the small business aspect of this industry and the competition and innovation it provides. Such small firms provide over 30 percent of all pharmaceutical supplies used today. Mr. Rouse is also president of Mayrand, Inc., a pharmaceutical company located in Greensboro, N.C.

The Subcommittee on Health and Scientific Research is considering the first major revision of the Food, Drug and Cosmetic Act since the enactment of the so-called Kefauver amendments in 1962. The National Pharmaceutical Alliance points out that the results of these amendments have been numerous, but not the ones intended. The purpose of the amendments was to remove ineffective drugs from the market. However, it is generally conceded by those knowledgeable in the field, including the 1975 Economic Report of the President, that the number of ineffective drugs on the market has not been reduced.

The total number of drugs introduced on the American market has declined dramatically from an average of 43 new drugs before 1962 to only 17 between 1962 and 1971 to 13 since 1971. In addition, 75 percent of the drugs developed by American pharmaceutical companies cannot be sold in the United States and are only sold in other countries.

The cost of the 1962 amendments are staggering. It costs approximately $1 billion a year to taxpayers to administer the FDA. The pharmaceutical companies must now spend between $8 and $20 million to get each new drug approved as compared to as little as $1 million before 1962. In addition, approval takes from 7 to 10 years as compared with 1 to 2 years before the amendments. And paperwork has increased from an average of 75 pieces of documentation required in the past to anywhere up to 200,000 pieces of paper. These requirements cost the consumer approximately $0.50 per prescription in additional costs.

Higher prices due to the more limited competition has cost consumers $50 million a year in their drug expenditures.

Hidden costs, such as the effect on the economy of forcing small drug companies out of business because they could not afford the cost required to fulfill the post 1962 FDA requirements, are impossible to estimate.

The absence of drugs on the American market which are available in other countries makes these amendments discriminatory against the poor who cannot travel to get the drugs they need.

Mr. President, last year I introduced legislation to amend the 1962 amendments to limit the regulatory power of the Food and Drug Administration. That bill, S. 1683, has been endorsed by the National Pharmaceutical Alliance and many experts concerned with American health care such as Prof. Yale Brozen of the University of Chicago. Earlier this year, I introduced S. 3018, the "Food and Drug Reform Act of 1978" which makes further proposals to hold down the cost of prescription drugs.

In their testimony on S. 2755, presently being considered by the subcommittee, Mr. Rouse and Mr. Colley provide an important analysis, especially in regard to the impact of many of its provisions on the small pharmaceutical firms. Because of the importance of the issues and the significant contribution of Mr. Rouse and Mr. Colley, I ask unanimous consent that a portion of their testimony be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TESTIMONY OF THE NATIONAL PHARMACEUTICAL ALLIANCE

Mr. Chairman: We appreciate the opportunity to present the views of the small drug companies on the Drug Regulation Reform Act of 1978 which will have a tremendous impact, to say the least, on our members. NPA was not in existence when the last major reform of the drug laws took place 16 years ago, but we look forward to working with the Subcommittee in perfecting this legislation which will restructure the regulatory system regarding drug products in the United States.

NPA supports reform of the drug laws. There are many provisions of S. 2755 that we wholeheartedly endorse. However, we do have reservations about some of the sections of the bill. Because of limitation of time, we would like to submit for inclusion in the record our detailed comments on the bill and merely touch on some of the highlights during our appearance today.

In our opinion, the bill gives unprecedented discretionary authority to the Secretary which would have a devastating effect on the small drug companies. The Secretary could literally put a company out of business by exercising the powers conferred upon him by S. 2755 to (1) issue his own subpoena commanding the presence of individuals anywhere in the United States; (2) require batch certification for any drug; (3) require virtually any records which in his judgment are appropriate; (4) conduct searches of private property without limitations; (5) restrict hearing rights and due process guarantees of manufacturers; (6) limit the distribution and use of prescription drug products; (7) impose severe fines on the basis of nonjudicial proceedings; (8) require investigations for suspected or even trivial adverse effects; and (9) permit FDA to be prosecutor, judge and jury in imposing civil penalties. NPA recognizes that a federal agency must have reasonable authority to fulfill its responsibility, but the discretionary provisions of this bill go far beyond the authority that should be conferred on the Secretary.

We oppose the requirement for licensing for individual over-the-counter products. We believe it would be an unnecessary burden on the small companies when the same information is available through the Drug Listing Act of 1972. We also strongly believe that the OTC Monograph Review program should be incorporated into S. 2755.

Although we endorse the general provisions of Section 158, we believe it essential that sampling or furnishing starter dosages be permitted in response to written physician requests and appropriate records are maintained indicating the amount of the drug product, the date, and the name of the physician. The small company cannot afford to advertise in the medical journals, print colorful brochures, or host educational seminars. For many of our members the only method of making the physician aware of their products is to provide starter doses for the evaluation by the doctor.

We enthusiastically endorse Section 197 of the bill which provides for federal preemption of the state laws concerning the packaging and labeling of drug products. This has been an extremely troublesome area for our members since many states have conflicting laws and regulations.

With respect to Section 147 which requires the name of the actual manufacturer to appear in the identification labeling, we would like to have the option of listing the name and address of the manufacturer or the manufacturer's registration number. If a distributor purchases a drug product from various manufacturers, he would have to print different labels with each purchase. However, if he were able to utilize the registration number, he could mass produce his labels and merely overprint the number.

NPA supports the criminal penalties provision that substitutes willful offenses and negligence for the strict liability doctrine embodied in the Park case. However, we suggest that the definition of negligence contained in S. 2040 be adopted, thereby providing for consistent interpretation.

We oppose the publication of a federal compendium on the grounds that it is not needed. The physician and the pharmacist have presently available to them all the information that would appear in the compendium.

We believe a more flexible method of defining drug efficacy should be adopted. In those instances where scientific evidence of effectiveness cannot be demonstrated, the Secretary, on advice of qualified experts, should be allowed to exercise discretion. This was done in the medical devices amendments of 1976 and we urge that similar langauge be included in S. 2755.

Mr. Chairman, thank you again for giving us the opportunity to testify and we are prepared to offer our assistance in achieving the goals and objectives of S. 2755.

LABOR LAW REFORM ACT OF 1978

The Senate continued with consideration of H.R. 8410.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, just so that the record may be perfectly clear in terms of the rules governing this debate, I should like to propound three or four parliamentary inquiries.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state his inquiries.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

First, Mr. President, rule XIX of the Standing Rules of the Senate provides that "no Senator shall speak more than twice upon any one question in debate on the same day without leave of the Senate." Under the precedents, the "same day" refers to the same legislative day; is that not correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, it is also my understanding that under the precedents, the word "question" in the portion of rule XIX which I have previously quoted refers to such things as amendments, amendments to amendments, and motions, such as motions to recommit, motions to postpone to a day certain, or motions to postpone indefinitely. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HELMS. So, Mr. President, for instance, each Senator would be entitled to give two speeches in the same legislative day on each amendment that was called up and pending before the Senate even if he had already spoken twice on the pending bill or on another amendment to that bill. Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, is it also true that a Senator who has given two speeches on the same question in the same legislative day would still be entitled to be recognized for the purpose of calling up an amendment or making a motion, suggesting the absence of a quorum, asking for the yeas and nays, or for any other proper purpose under the rules, except for the purpose of making a third speech on the same question? Is that correct?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator is correct.

Mr. HELMS. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, last week during this debate, I discussed briefly the results of a poll conducted by the Opinion Research Corp. of Princeton, N.J. This poll, as I said on that occasion, concerned the public attitudes toward labor issues. I am glad to see that a new poll, the results of which have been released today by the distinguished Senator from Tennessee, the able minority leader (Mr. BAKER), tend to confirm the findings of the Opinion Research Corp.

The interesting thing about this new poll is that the survey was conducted by Pat Cadell's polling organization. As we all know, Mr. Cadell is President Carter's personal pollster.

In any event, during my discussion of the Opinion Research poll last week, my good friend, the able Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS), suggested that the complete results of the poll be made public. This I promised to do. So at this time, Mr. President, in accordance with that commitment to my good friend from New Jersey, I ask unanimous consent that the results of a nationwide survey on attitudes toward labor issues conducted by the Opinion Research Corp. be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HELMS. The nationwide survey on attitudes toward labor issues, confidential survey conducted for the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, December 1977, follows:

ABOUT THE SURVEY

Research procedures

The findings presented in the attached tables are based on telephone interviews with a national probability sample of 1,018 adults age 18 and over. The interviewing was conducted during the period of December 16–18, 1977. All interviewing was conducted by experienced interviewers from a central WATS facility, with constant supervision.

Survey objectives

The purpose was to obtain from a representative sample of the American public attitudes and opinions toward a number of current labor issues. The survey was sponsored by the Chamber of Commerce of the United States.

Sampling

Opinion Research Corporation's master sample is based on a new probability sample design, prepared in consultation with J. Stevens Stock of Marketmath, Inc., and modified and updated by ORC.

The essential characteristic of probability sampling is that, for each person in the population under study, the probability that he will be included in the sample can be specified. This means that the degree of reliability of any finding from a study based on a probability sample can be estimated mathematically.

This new sample design is a major improvement over standard areal probability designs now in common use There areal methods depend upon the use of maps showing geographic segments for which rough population estimates can be made. These maps are often out of date and otherwise inaccurate; and population estimtaes are frequently unreliable for small geographic areas, particularly as time passes from one census to another. The new sampling method eliminates these important problems of traditional probability sampling by using current address directories as the basis for a system of defining intervewing starting points—a system which, of course, includes in the sample households not in the directory as well. The new method is both statistically and administratively as efficient as possible, providing the most reliable data for any given expenditure.

The ORC master sample consists of 360 counties in the contiguous United States. This master sample of 360 counties comprises, in fact, six sub-samples of 60 counties each. Each of these subsamples is itself a national probability sample. Depending on the needs of any particular study, the master sample can be used as a whole, or any combination of the six subsamples can be used.

To construct the sample, the counties within each state were arranged in order of descending population size, and all the states were grouped in geographical order from Maine to California. Sixty counties were then chosen by statistical procedures that ensure representative geographical distribution. This process was repeated to obtain the six subsamples that make up the master sample of 360 counties.

The next step in the sampling design was to select an area from each of the 360 counties in the master sample. Again, a probability sampling method was used to select, within each county, a minor civil division as defined by the Bureau of the Census. A minor civil division may be a town, township, city, or part of a city. The probability that any particular minor civil division was selected in a county was proportional to the population of that minor civil division. Thus, the larger a minor civil division, the greater the likelihood that it be selected.

In sampling for the WATS line usage, we employ the basic ORC sampling plan to determine the telephone books that cover the minor civil divisions. These telephone books constitute the primary sampling units.

From each primary sampling unit, we draw an equal number of telephone numbers that appear to be residential. In order to obtain both listed and unlisted numbers, we add a fixed quantity (from one to ten) to each telephone number for purposes of providing a list of numbers for actual dialing. For example, if the number that comes up is 672–2424, adding one, we would dial 672–2425. The result is an equal probability random selection of all residential telephone households in the United States.

Once all interviews have been completed, weighting procedures are employed to ensure that the sample properly represents the population from which it was drawn. This sampling procedure is rigorous in concept and practice and allows for the exact determination of the statistical precision of any finding.

Reliability of survey percentages (sampling tolerances)

Results of any sample are subject to sampling variation. The magnitude of the variation is measurable and is affected by the number of interviews and the level of the percentages expressing the results.

The table below shows the possible sample variation that applies to percentage results reported in this study. The chances are 95 in 100 (the 95% confidence level) that a study result does not vary, plus or minus, by more than the indicated number of percentage points from the result that would be obtained if interviews had been conducted with all members of the universe represented by the sample.

Sampling tolerances when comparing two survey results

Tolerances (or sampling variation) are also involved in the comparison of results from different parts of any sample (subgroup analysis). A difference, in other words, between two subgroups must be of at least a certain size to be considered statistically significant. The table below is a guide to the sampling tolerances applicable to such comparisons in this survey. These figures, too, represent the 95 percent confidence level.

SUMMARY OF FINDINGS

Very little support (22 percent) exists among members of the general public for the passage of federal legislation that would make it easier than it now is for unions to organize non-union employees. As a matter of fact, as many people (25 percent) believe that there should be legislation that would make organizing non-union employees more difficult than at present. Four in ten (40 percent) do not believe the current laws should be changed. Source Q.19.

The lack of support for legislation that would simplify union organizing efforts is evident not only in all parts of the country, but also among people of all political persuasions—Democrats as well as Republicans and Independents. This view is held by those who say they have read or heard about new labor reform legislation as well as by those who say they are not aware of such legislation.

In fact, the proposal to make it easier for unions to organize does not win majority support from current union members. Only one-third (33 percent) support the idea, while almost half (48 percent) think that the present laws should not be changed.

As it is, the majority of Americans think that the power and political influence of organized labor already is too great.

Most people (63 percent) think that there is too much power concentrated in the hands of labor leaders of big unions in this country. This is the attitude of majorities of people in all major political subgroups and among liberals as well as conservatives. Even union members tend to feel this way. Source Q.20.

By better than four to one (60 percent vs. 14 percent), the public thinks that labor unions have more power than employers. Again, this is the attitude of majorities of people in all major political subgroups and among liberals as well as conservatives. Source Q.9.

The public today continues to believe that labor unions in this country have "grown too powerful." Half (51 percent) of the people feel this way, while 18 percent would like to see unions have more power and 26 percent believe that the power of unions is "about right." These latest findings are in line with the trend in public attitudes in previous ORC studies, which showed a shift toward the "too powerful" alternative in the public's thinking between 1974 and 1975. Source Q.10.

If anything, more people think that present federal laws favor labor unions (26 percent) than feel that employers are favored (14 percent). Furthermore, almost as many people (39 percent) blame labor unions for frequently violating the current labor laws as blame employers for doing the same thing (45 percent). Q. 8, Q. 22, 23

Generally speaking, the public does not have a very high opinion of organized labor when it comes to its impact on the economy.

For example, the government, compared with either labor or business, is singled out as being the prime cause of inflation. However, almost twice as many people (31 percent) blame labor unions for inflation as blame business (16 percent). Q. 1, 2

Also, among those who believe the country is making economic progress, labor unions are given the least credit, in comparison with either government or business, for their contribution to the economic progress of the country. People who believe that the personal freedoms of Americans are being threatened are more likely to be concerned about labor unions (22 percent) than business (9 percent), although government is feared the most (62 percent). Q. 3, 4, Q. 6, 7

The public as a whole (61 percent) thinks that labor union leaders do at least a fair job of representing the interests of their members, although union members appear more divided than the public as a whole in this regard. Q. 13

On the other hand, half of the general public (51 percent) believe that labor union leaders do a poor job of acting in the best interests of the public as a whole, while 44 percent think that labor union leaders are doing at least fairly well (35 percent) or very well (9 percent) in this regard. Q. 14

Significantly, the public believes that, when labor leaders take a public stand on political matters, they usually represent their own views rather than the views of their members. What is more, union members feel the same way. Q. 17

Furthermore, the majority of Americans (56 percent) think that labor unions are too much involved in political action. Four union members in ten also are of the same opinion. Q. 15

Most Americans (73 percent) think that organized labor has at least a fair amount of influence on Congress (44 percent think it has a great deal of influence). And, on balance, those who think any such influence exists think that it is excessive. Q. 16, Q. 16A

Indeed, the majority (54 percent) of Americans would favor a law that would prohibit the spending of union dues for political purposes. In fact, as many union member (51 percent) favor such a law as oppose it (48 percent). Q. 18F

In general, the public favors the enactment of laws that might curb union power and protect employees' rights in unionization and collective bargaining practices:

Large majorities of both the general public (77 percent) and union members (83 percent) continue to approve the secret ballot as the only way to determine whether or not non-union employees want union representation. This view is in line with attitudes expressed in previous ORC studies. Q. 18A

Similarly, high percentages of both groups (81% and 79%) would approve a law that requires worker approval by secret ballot before a strike can be called. Again, this is in line with similar findings in previous ORC studies. Q.18B

Large majorities of both the general public (83%) and union members (75%) approve of a legal requirement that, after a strike has been in effect for 30 days, a secret ballot be taken among members to determine their wishes about continuing or not. This, too, reflects similar views in previous ORC studies. Q.18C

The public also strongly favors (72%) a law that would allow a person to get and keep a job without joining a union, an issue on which even union members themselves are divided. Q.18D

The public as a whole is pretty much divided in its opinion (48% in favor, 45% opposed) in respect to a law that might make it easier for labor unions to organize the employees of a small business. The higher the income and the higher the education, the more people are opposed to such a law. Moreover, among those most opposed to such a law are people who say that they work for small companies. Q.18E

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, there are some who have participated and who are participating in this debate who profess no desire to contravene the wishes of the overwhelming majority of the American people by increasing the power of union leaders. They state that they understand that this legislation is not designed to increase the power of the union leaders, but, rather, to overcome certain procedural delays used to thwart the labor laws.

With all due respect, Mr. President, I am constrained to say that anyone believing that will believe anything.

Let me cite one example. Under the Senate version of this legislation, elections concerning union representation must be conducted no less than 21 nor more than 30 days from the time a petition is filed. Before an election can be held, however, it would seem logical that determinations be made as to such basic questions as who can vote, what unit would be represented by the petitioning union, who would be in that unit, and so forth.

Under the present system, these issues are naturally decided prior to the election. In most cases, these questions are not complex and elections are held without undue delay. In a few cases, however, these questions may require some hearings.

In any case, the pending bill proposes to conduct the election between 21 and 30 days after the petition is filed, regardless of whether these issues have been settled or not. In other words, the election is held even though no one is sure who is permitted to vote. If there is a dispute, the ballots have to be impounded and the issues decided after the election.

The ostensible purpose of all this is said to be to expedite elections. That, admittedly, it would do. But what counts is not the election but the election results. The purpose of the election, after all, is to determine whether the workers want a union. Let us assume that they do. They can cast their votes for unionization, but only after the results have been certified is their employer obligated under the law to recognize the union.

Mr. President, what difference in terms of time does it make if, for instance, there are 60 days of hearings before the election or 60 days of hearings after the election? I submit that the difference is none at all. In each case the union, if it wins the election, will be certified at the same time. So this section does not expedite anything. Then what does it do? That is a good question: What does it do?

Now we are getting down to the bottom line, Mr. President.

What it does is cause elections to occur before the employer, especially the small businessman, has had sufficient time to tell his side of the story to his own employees. It causes the election to be held before the employees have had sufficient time for reflection. It causes the election to be held before there is sufficient time for exaggerated or even false union promises and inducements to be rebutted. So this was a very clever tactic on the part of those who drafted this proposal. Perhaps it is not quite clever enough.

The point, Mr. President, is that this is the story of this piece of legislation through and through. Consider the so-called debarment section. This section is designed to blacklist companies unfavored by the newly packed National Labor Relations Board to prevent them from receiving Federal contracts for 3 years.

Now what do we have here, Mr. President? If there ever were a case of cutting off one's nose to spite one's face, this has to be it.

Remember, Mr. President, although sometimes it is hard for some to do, that the purpose of the labor laws is to aid workers, not union leaders. But what would happen with many companies if they were barred from Federal contracts?

Obviously, many of them would have to go out of business.

And who would be unemployed as a result? The same workers that we presumably are trying to protect. Of course, Mr. Meany would still have his job; all of the other union leaders would have their jobs and their chauffeur-driven limousines and their big annual salaries. So I guess it boils down to this: It is always easy to sacrifice someone else for a cause, just so long as you, yourself, do not have to sacrifice.

That is what the workers of this country had better understand about this piece of legislation. This bill goes on and on, section after section, provision after provision, and nowhere, Mr. President, does it expedite anything. It pretends to. For example, it increases the membership of the Board from 5 to 7 members, and it certainly will increase the staff, making up to $40,000 or $50,000 a year apiece. The Senator from North Carolina, admittedly, is a bit naive about the Federal bureaucracy, but I remain absolutely convinced that the way to speed things up in this country is to have fewer bureaucrats, not more. Instead of having to get five members of the board to agree on things and achieve some degree of unanimity, now we are going to have a situation, if this bill is passed, wherein seven must have a meeting of the minds.

It is just a coincidence, of course, that the two additional members would be appointed by President Carter and will undoubtedly be pro-big union in their outlook. Oh, Mr. President, certainly that is just a coincidence. Nobody in his right mind would assume that there is anything else to it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator yield for just a comment?

Mr. HELMS. Yes.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just want to observe that that, obviously, is a fair comment, nothing wrong with that. But on the record, President Carter has had two appointments to the board and we have not gotten any big labor background person. Fanning was reappointed and he was originally appointed by President Eisenhower; Mr. Truesdale the other appointment has had a career within the National Labor Relations Board. So on the basis of the record, we have not had big labor backgrounds with those two appointments.

Mr. HELMS. We shall see with those additional two. We shall see.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am glad to hear that we shall have that opportunity.

Mr. HELMS. We shall see. Perhaps we will have that opportunity; perhaps we shall not.

As I was saying, it is just a coincidence, Mr. President, that the two new members that will be appointed to the Board if this legislation is enacted will undoubtedly have the blessings of big labor. Surely, all of this is just coincidence, and surely the Moon is made of green cheese.

Mr. President, a true labor reform bill—and I say that advisedly, because this bill is neither a reform bill nor a labor bill—a true labor reform bill would, I think, address itself to such issues as union violence, union racketeering, the solvency and the management or mismanagement, as the case may be, of union trust funds, and the double-dipping of certain relatively minor union officials that hoist their salaries into the six-digit range. Surely, a true labor reform bill would address itself to featherbedding and wildcat strikes.

If such a bill addressed even some of these issues, and, in all fairness, if it also addressed certain management abuses, I believe such a piece of legislation would be welcomed and it would be accepted by the overwhelming majority of the Members of the Senate. But such issues, Mr. President, will not be addressed, because we know who has the veto power over what and whom. And I am not talking about the constitutionally established Presidential veto power.

Let us talk about a couple of the issues that should be included in any true labor reform bill. Maybe the salaries of union officials would be a good place to start. Who is the highest paid trade unionist in America today? George Meany? Frank Fitzsimmons? No, his name is Harold Friedman. That is right, Harold Friedman. Virtually unknown, even in his hometown of Cleveland, Mr. Friedman heads a small local of the Bakery and Confectionery Workers Union, as well as a local of the Teamsters' Union. He also serves on the national executive board of a bakery union. His combined income from these three union positions in 1976 was what? Would you believe $337,182, Mr. President?

Mr. Friedman is just one of dozens of big union officers and little union officers around the country who have attained the six-digit income level. He, like the others, does so by the double-dipping technique which is so scathingly rebuked in other quarters by the same major news media which endorsed this bill.

These union officers receive separate paychecks for separate union offices. Yet those same politicians who wax so eloquently against our retired servicemen for so-called double dipping, even though they are receiving no more than they were promised as an inducement to enlist in the armed services, close their eyes to these flagrant abuses. I imagine that they hope that the average working man who belongs to a union or the average working woman who belongs to a union will not realize that he or she is being ripped off. It seems to me, that a true labor reform bill would address this kind of issue and not be silent in seven languages about it.

It is important to remember that most of these six-digit salaries paid to union bosses are not approved by the union membership. They do not have a thing in the world to say about it. They do not have a chance to approve or disapprove.

I have an amendment at that desk which I intend to call up at the appropriate time which addresses itself to this issue. Just so it will be a matter of record, it is amendment No. 1725 and it is written very simply so that everybody can understand it. Let me quote it:

> Every labor organization shall require the approval of the membership, by secret ballot, of any increases in salary, allowances, and other direct or indirect disbursements (including reimbursed expenses) for each officer or employee, who during the fiscal year of such labor organization, received more than $50,000 in the aggregate from such labor organization and any other labor organization affiliated with it or with which it is affiliated, or which is affiliated with the same national or international labor organization.

Now, we will have some discussion about this at the time the amendment is called up. But, even so, I am sure it will be voted down. That is the way things so often work around here. Even if by some miracle the amendment should be accepted, it would not have a long livelihood when it reached conference.

The reason these things will happen is because this is not a piece of legislation for the union member. It is purely and simply and clearly a piece of legislation by and for the union leaders of this country.

Now then, Mr. President, let us turn back to the question of union violence which, unfortunately, is almost constantly in the news in one part of the country or another.

Here is another area for true labor reform.

If we learned anything from the recent coal strike, surely we learned that it gives one a vivid look at a very unfortunate and ugly side of the labor union movement.

Mr. President, let all understand I do not believe for a moment the vast majority of union members condone or participate in violence against their fellow workers. They do not, and I want to make that clear.

But that is the way it always is with violence and lawlessness. It is a small minority. The only difference is that in general society we do not tolerate it. But in the union movement it is overlooked; it is swept under the rug.

The average citizens with whom I talked during the recent coal strike simply could not understand what gives the radical mine workers, and others who engage in union violence, what appears to be special exalted privileges in our Republic, privileges that are not shared by ordinary citizens.

What gives them the privilege to threaten bodily harm to innocent people? What gives them the privilege to destroy public and private property, obstruct highways, and forcefully prevent citizens from even going about their business?

What gives them the right to say that it is useless for the President of the United States to obtain a Taft-Hartley back-to-work injunction because, as they said on television repeatedly, they were not going to obey the law?

I saw some televised reports on some striking miners who were playing poker, and they laughed at the President of the United States. They said, "He can do anything he wants to, but we're not going to obey the law. We're not going to obey the law."

But I submit that such an attitude, Mr. President, is frightening, and is being allowed to grow and to fester because the leadership of some unions and some of their members have announced in no uncertain terms that they will not obey the law and they do not care whether the Nation is cold, or whether business is shut down, or whether schools must close. They are not going to obey the law.

Why then, Mr. President, do we not have a bill before us that addresses itself to this kind of needed reform?

If we did, and if it did, the Senator from North Carolina would not be engaged in extended debate on this question. He would be standing beside the Senator from New Jersey exhorting his fellow Senators to approve the bill.

"We will not obey the law." That has been repeatedly declared with snickers and ridicule of the President of the United States. And what was the response to this arrogance on the part of the administration which, surely, must have felt affronted? What was the response of most of those who are so interested in passing this legislation?

I may be wrong, and I hope I am, Mr. President, but it seemed to me to be a collective shrug of the shoulders and a "boys-will-be-boys" attitude.

Well, the majority of the good, decent, American people just do not understand and will not accept that kind of thinking, Mr. President. In fact, if I am any judge of the attitude of the American people as I travel around this country, they are becoming more and more fed up.

No citizen—and I repeat, no citizen—has the right to declare arrogantly that he will not obey the law and that he fears no consequences.

Now, surely, Mr. President, a citizen can disobey the law as a form of protest, or to make a point, or even as a matter of conscience, but in a civilized society, this citizen must be prepared to pay the consequences for so doing. The twin ogres of anarchy and barbarism will always be breathing down the back of decency and order, and a civilization, if it is to survive, must be unceasingly vigilant.

When the President takes the oath of Office, under the Constitution, he says the following:

> I do solemnly swear that I will faithfully execute the Office of President of the United States, and will to the best of my ability, preserve, protect and defend the Constitution of the United States.

One of the duties of the President, under article II, section 3 of the Constitution is to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed." This is basic to all Government. It is not surprising that the legitimacy of the new American Republic was not firmly established until, by force, George Washington put down the "whiskey rebellion."

The laws should be "faithfully executed," Mr. President. A message should be sent out loud and clear that arrogrant defiance of the law will not be tolerated in the United States; because we have no choice: We must send some message. We can either let it be known that no citizen is above the law, or we can send out a message to every union in the land:

Make any demand you want, strike long enough to create a threat of misery to be imminently inflicted on the general populace, declare that you will obey no law that does not suit your purposes—and you will be sure to get what you want. One message or the other, Mr. President, we are going to send. But by refusing to tolerate violence, fraud, and racketeering, we will not be crushing something in a wholly negative sense, but we will be defending liberty in a most positive sense; for history teaches us that liberty depends on order.

Not to make a choice, Mr. President, is to make a choice. To accept open defiance of the law is to condone open defiance of the law. And just as sure as the sun rises in the east, we eventually become part of what we condone.

Sometimes I wonder whether we have lost our capacity to become indignant at anything. I watched with disgust while night after night during the coal strike I would see scenes of violence on the television—smashed windows, overturned vehicles, spikes and nails on the highway, threats of personal injury or death, sometimes carried to fruition. We hear much talk today about "human rights" abroad. What about the human rights of the decent, law-abiding American citizen, who simply wants to be able to go to work in the morning, unmolested and unthreatened by union violence.

So here we have a labor "reform" bill, so-called, that totally ignores union violence, racketeering, large-scale fraud of pension funds. But is that all right? Does that satisfy the conscience of the Senate? Who, after all, are victims of violence and theft of union funds? It is the average working man and working woman, the union members who pay their dues.

I realize that some will respond by telling me that the vast majority of union members and leaders are law-abiding and honest. Fine. I will agree to that. I said that earlier in my remarks. So why do not those who are law-abiding and honest, and those politicians who claim to speak for them, get together and do something about those who are not? If we must judge by the pending legislation, this is not going to happen.

Just this past Monday, May 15, the Jack Anderson column appearing in the Washington Post and other publications pointed out that mobster influence in labor unions has not abated since the days that our distinguished late colleague, Senator John McClellan, investigated the matter 20 years ago.

I, of course, cannot vouch for the accuracy of everything contained in Mr. Anderson's column, or any other column he writes. But he does invite us to do some serious reflecting. I think it might be useful for this column to appear in the RECORD at this point. It is headlined "Mobsters Still Infest Labor Unions," by Jack Anderson:

Two decades ago, the late Sen. John McClellan (D-Ark.), the embodiment of righteous wrath, held hearings that shook the labor movement. He exposed links between labor bosses and crime lords. His investigation led to the conviction of Teamsters president James R. Hoffa.

The flamboyant Hoffa has been liquidated, according to underworld informants, by the mobsters he befriended, and McClellan has succumbed to old age. But little else has changed. The labor racketeers still infest the unions.

We have sought to bring the story of labor racketeering up-to-date. The Teamsters, for example, brought in the former All-American football player, Daniel Shannon, to clean up its Central States Pension Fund, which allegedly has made illegal loans to gangsters.

Last year, he testified before the Senate investigations subcommittee about the mobsters he had discovered in the shadows. He blasted Allen Dorfman, a convicted racketeer, by name. Intelligence documents in our possession describe Dorfman as "the man to see to get a loan."

Shannon was forced to resign as a pension fund trustee, say our sources, because he dared to stand up to the mob. Now we have learned that Shannon has received death threats. In view of Hoffa's experience, these cannot be dismissed lightly.

The Justice Department and Senate subcommittee are conducting a low-key investigation of the death threats. The federal authorities will try to determine whether they are related to Shannon's previous testimony and are intended to prevent him from testifying again.

Since he is still under Senate subpoena, it would be a federal crime to prevent him from testifying. Our sources believe this should deter any underworld hit men. But as a precaution, the government is protecting him.

We have also been checking into Local 210 of the International Laborers Union, a brass-knuckle local, which controls the construction industry in Buffalo, N.Y. We have identified Local 210 as the power base of the late Stephano Magaddino, who has been named in Senate testimony as the former boss of Buffalo's "powerful, well-entrenched organized crime syndicate."

The syndicate's "principal remaining source of power," according to the Senate testimony, "is complete control of a single, though important union local."

We have determined this is Local 210; it was run by Victor Randaccio whose brother, Freddy, is listed in federal records as a Mafioso.

A Mafia killer, whom our sources have identified as Dan Domino, is carried on the union payroll as a "custodial" worker. "He specializes in enforcer type activities, and he is believed to have been responsible for some four unsolved murders," testified Robert Stewart, who heads the federal strike force offices in Buffalo and Newark. Earlier, Domino was "convicted of bank robbery in 1968."

Labor Department records show he started out as a "business agent" for the notorious Local 210. But the Labor Department forced the union to oust him after he was convicted of "making a false loan application to a federally insured bank." The local immediately rehired him for two "custodial" jobs, paying him a combined annual salary of $18,500.

A companion local in Niagara Falls, according to Senate testimony, is also dominated by an organized crime figure. Without naming the union, Stewart testified: "There have been persistent rumors over the past five years of extortionate demands upon industry, acts of property destruction and assorted misconduct.

"Authorities have found it impossible, however, to develop a viable prosecution because the atmosphere of intimidation is so complete that no one is willing to testify."

We have identified this racketeer-ridden union as Local 91, which is run by Michael (Butch) Quarcini.

Stewart summarized the problem in urgent language. "Unless there is a drastic improvement in the enforcement capabilities of the federal government," he declared, "the trend . . . created by the labor racketeering problem cannot be reversed."

Footnote: Our associate Marc Smolonsky tried without success to get comments from the two locals. An attorney for Local 210 said only: "They didn't know what Stewart was talking about." An official of Local 91 said: "There is no one here, and I can't talk to you." He refused to put Smolonsky in touch with anyone else who could speak for the union.

The point, Mr. President, is this: this labor reform bill, which is neither a labor bill nor a reform bill, does not address that issue.

Apparently the authors of this legislation consider that there are more important "reforms" to be initiated such as quickie elections and NLRB board packing schemes.

Criminal conduct, however, is only part of the story. Dramatic and well-publicized examples of misconduct should not be permitted to obscure the continuous day-to-day cost of unreasonable and concentrated power in the hands of a few union leaders. Strikes, chronic and uncontrollable absenteeism, featherbedding, jurisdictional disputes, inefficient production techniques, and interruptions in the smooth flow of commerce all exact a toll on the American people, on the consumers of America about whom Members of this Senate so constantly profess a deep concern. The fact that it may be statistically difficult or impossible to exactly measure this toll should not be an excuse for ignoring it.

I hope we will not engage in the rather puerile economic argument which declares that, after all, it is "only business" that is being hurt. Any time there is waste, unneeded expense or inefficiency in the economy, that waste, unneeded expense, or inefficiency is eventually borne by all of the consumers, including, I might emphasize, union members themselves.

We pay through higher taxes, sometimes through inflation, sometimes through poorer quality of goods or services, but eventually every one of us pays.

Therefore, in the most literal sense, the curb of union abuses is in the national economic interest. It is in the consumer's interests. Every citizen has a stake in such reform, but it must be true reform, and it is dismaying that this bill contains nothing that addresses this serious problem.

The economic cost of abuse of union power, if this legislation should be enacted, will be extended from the Northeast where it is now concentrated so as to ravage the prosperous South and the West.

A few months ago I received a letter, Mr. President, from a good friend of mine in Winston-Salem, N.C., Mr. Harry Bagnal.

In his letter, Harry Bagnal told the story of just one episode of abusive union power, and the cost, not to mention the frustration, to just one business caught in a typical union "Catch-22" situation.

This will be considered, no doubt, as a small episode, insignificant, I suppose, but it was not insignificant to Mr. Bagnal. You multiply this episode daily by thousands of similar instances, and then one comes to an understanding of what this legislation will do to the economy. It is sad irony that the people who can least afford further erosion of their purchasing power, the blue collar workers of this country, are the very citizens whose interests are supposed to be advanced by this bill. But then we must not forget this is not a labor union member bill; it is a labor union leader bill.

I want to share Mr. Bagnal's letter, to which I alluded a moment ago, with the Senate. My dear friend from New Jersey has often declared that the purpose of this bill is to establish what he calls justice in labor-management relations, so let me read this letter and, perhaps, there will be some light thrown on where the injustices truly lie.

The letter was dated February 15 of this year. He said:

Hon. JESSE HELMS,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR JESSE: I am writing to bring a matter to your attention. I would appreciate knowing if there is any action you might take on our behalf or if anything could be done. I will briefly explain what happened to the best of my knowledge.

This company received an order from Leyenaar Hardhout in Rotterdam, The Netherlands for some kiln dried Oak dimension furniture parts. Due to the strike at the port we were delayed in shipping this order for several months. When the strike was settled we delivered part of this order from Jackson, Tennessee to the Wilmington Bonded Warehouse by a truck owned by Tennessee Dimension in Jackson, Tenn. on December 16, 1977. On January 9, 1978 we delivered additional parts for this order from Associated Forest Products Company in Live Oak, Florida. This was also shipped on their own truck and delivered to the Wilmington Bonded Warehouse. When both shipments were received, they were loaded into a container for overseas shipment and sent over to the port of Wilmington to be loaded on a container ship. The International Longshoremen's Union refused to load this on a vessel at the port and the vessel sailed without the shipment. We called Hipage Company which has an office in Wilmington and acts as our forwarding agent and were informed that since the material was not loaded in a container by the Union we would have to pay a $1,000.00 fine or this would not be loaded on any future ship. They also stated if we did not comply they would strip this container and leave the material at the port. We called the North Carolina Ports Authority to see if they could get this container loaded on a vessel, but they said that they had no authority to make the Union load any container they did not desire to load. This material in the container had a value of $19,472.12. The Hipage Company paid the International Longshoreman's Union fine of $1,000.00 and we repaid this amount to the Hipage Company for this expense and the container was loaded on the M.S. Poplawski. We were informed that Union can refuse to load on board any container loaded within a 50 mile radius of Wilmington. Since this stock would have been ruined if it had been unloaded at the dock and not in a warehouse that is bonded or secured or heated, we could not deliver this directly to the port. We have shipped many containers to our customer in Rotterdam and all previous shipments were loaded in containers at the mill and shipped to the port. Since this was not possible because the material came from two different mills approximately 800 miles apart, we handled this in the only manner we could. This is the most outrageous thing I know of and it is inconceivable to me that a company in this country must pay extortion or blackmail to a labor union. We are a small company and it is not possible for us to become involved in a long and costly law suit. I understand there are a number of other companies that have been involved in the same thing. It is no wonder we have a large trade deficit and that no country wants to do business with shipping companies in the states. In the last year and a half we have probably shipped the equivalent of sixty to eighty container loads but we do not intend to ship through the North Carolina ports again.

I would like to know if there is any action you can take or any assistance you can give us in recovering our $1,000.00 and to see that this terrible situation does not occur again.

Looking forward to hearing from you soon, I am

Sincerely yours,
DIMENSION ENTERPRISES,
HARRY BAGNAL.

(Mr. RIEGLE assumed the chair.)

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the destruction wrought by compulsory unionism is not restricted to economic devastation. It also can be expressed in human terms. A few days ago I ran across a poignant article appearing in the Chicago Sun-Times about an outstanding young schoolteacher who was fired for her unwillingness to compromise her professionalism by supporting a union. Let me share this with my colleagues. It is from the Chicago Sun-Times of Thursday, May 4, 1978. The headline is "An 'Outstanding' Teacher Is Fired," and this is the story:

Susan LaVine—by all accounts, an excellent German teacher—has the unhappy distinction of being the first teacher in Illinois to be fired because she won't pay her union dues.

LaVine, who taught for four years at Lyons Twp. High School in west suburban La Grange beginning in 1973, won an evaluation in February, 1977, that praised her with great extravagance.

The evaluation, by Estela Gahala, chairman of the school's language department, begins this way:

"As her immediate supervisor and one of her teaching colleagues, I need an entirely new list of superlatives to express adequately my professional and personal opinion of her."

LaVine, whose job experience also includes teaching English to West German high school students, was a member of the Lyons Twp. High School Faculty Assn. when it met on the first day of the 1975–76 school year to consider ratifying a new contract.

She objected to a new article in the agreement that established the school as an "agency shop." That meant that a teacher who chose not to join the union still had to pay it an amount equivalent to dues paid by members.

But the agreement was ratified with the agency-shop provision intact, and LaVine protested by refusing to pay her $122 annual dues. The school board, acting under its contract with the union, fired her in March, 1977.

"I was a member of the association and would join again," said the teacher. But she believes that dues-paying union membership "is not what makes a teacher good, or what he should be retained for. It's a matter of principle."

I might interject here, Mr. President, that of course it is a matter of principle. But let me continue the article from the Chicago Sun Times:

She was ordered reinstated in March, 1978, after an arbitration hearing conducted by a hearing officer for the state Board of Education. But LaVine has not returned to the classroom because the high school, on behalf of the union under the contract, is suing in Circuit Court to overturn the ruling.

"She is an outstanding teacher: she plans well; she is imaginative and inventive in her methodology; she is thorough in her presentation; she has complete mastery of her subject; she understands and likes young people; she is concerned about their intellectual, social and personal development. Her students love her and learn from her . . . ."

The arbitrator, James F. Stack, citing LaVine's high ratings, noted that she stood accused of "deficient and unsatisfactory performance as a teacher" for her refusal to abide by the agency-shop article.

He said firing a teacher for that reason was a violation of the Illinois School Code, which holds that a teacher may be dismissed, in Stack's words, only when his or her "moral character, mental capacity and ability" are in question.

LaVine, whose husband, Lester, is principal of the elementary school in Lincolnshire, now is spending most of her time in their Gurnee home with their year-old daughter.

"I do hope to return to teaching," she said. "A lot depends on how this case comes out."

"Any school would be fortunate to have her services. I only hope that Lyons Twp. High School will continue to be graced by them indefinitely."

The point, Mr. President, is that this pending legislation, which is neither a labor bill nor a reform bill, does not even look in the direction of a problem like this. Nowhere in this bill is there a "reform" addressing itself to this problem. The committee having jurisdiction of this legislation is called the Human Resources Committee, and my good friend, the distinguished Senator from New Jersey (Mr. WILLIAMS) is chairman of this committee.

What, I ask, ever happened to the "human resources" of Susan LaVine, a good teacher, an effective teacher, a teacher loved by the students, a teacher who knows how to teach, a teacher who is dedicated. What happened to her human rights? What happens to the rights of the students who will no longer be able to benefit from her outstanding capacity to communicate knowledge and learning to these young people?

(Mr. KENNEDY assumed the chair.)

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield briefly at that point?

Mr. HELMS. I yield, Mr. President, on the condition that I not lose my right to the floor and that my yielding will not cause my subsequent remarks to be considered a second speech on the same legislative day.

Mr. RIEGLE. I appreciate the Senator's yielding. Are you suggesting—of course, our bill does not purport to cover public employees. Is the Senator suggesting it ought to? Is that the point he is making?

Mr. HELMS. The point I am making is that this bill accomplishes nothing except to facilitate pushbutton unionism. It does not address itself to the human problems. It does not address itself to violence. It is a bill that, if it was not written by George Meany and his associates, it well could have been. That is the point I am making.

Mr. RIEGLE. If the Senator will yield a moment further, the reason for my question was, I was wondering about your raising the case of this teacher, which falls outside the jurisdiction of what we are proposing here. Is it your suggestion that we ought to redraft this legislation so as to cover public employees as well?

Mr. HELMS. I do not think NLRA jurisdiction should be extended to public employees. I do think, however, that all Americans should be able to pursue their chosen occupations without being harassed by labor unions.

Mr. RIEGLE. Well, I thank the Senator.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I think it is clear to any reasonably objective observer that we have before us a bill which labeled as "reform," it is not reform at all, but purely and simply, as characterized by one of the newspapers in my State the other day, an attempted power grab by the big labor bosses who feel, hopefully mistakenly, that they have the votes to ram this legislation through this Congress.

There will be no ramming, Mr. President. We are going to be on this bill for a long, long time, unless it is pulled down by the majority leader at some appropriate time.

Having said all this—and I shall conclude momentarily—I would gladly support legislation aimed at true reform. But frankly I must confess that I wonder if the proponents of this legislation are interested in true reform. Surely, no one is so naive to think that only business needs reforming. Why, then, does this legislation address not one, not one reform aimed at the powerful union leaders and the powerful mechanisms which are growing in monopoly influence in this country?

I think most of us know the answer, Mr. President. That is why the Senator from North Carolina is standing here this afternoon, attempting, in a virtually empty Chamber, to show why the legislation must be defeated, and as we say in North Carolina, to the length of my cable tow I will see to it that it is defeated as long as I have two legs to stand on in this Chamber.

Its defeat would not in any way foreclose true reform which, I say again and again, I would favor. Rather, the defeat of this bill would sow the seeds of true reform that perhaps could be enacted by the next Congress.

Mr. President, I yield the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. What is the will of the Senate?

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without, objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, we have listened to the distinguished Senator from North Carolina and we have listened to other colleagues with reference to labor reform. The Senator from Kansas spoke briefly this morning about certain sections of the so-called labor reform legislation, whether or not certain sections were inflationary.

In addition, the Senator from Kansas continued his analysis of the bill on a section-by-section basis. The analysis that we have now completed is part of the RECORD. I understood earlier in the debate the distinguished Senator from New York at some appropriate time would address the analysis to indicate to the Senator from Kansas and others whether it was accurate, whether it was objective, and whether it raised questions which should be considered as we get into the amendment stage, if and when we get into the amendment stage.

At this point the Senator from Kansas would address another area, because it appears to some that the Labor Law Reform Act transforms the NLRA from a remedial to a partially punitive statute.

First, the bill would subject any employer found by the Board to have willfully violated a Board or court order to debarment from all Federal contracts for a period of 3 years. Second, the bill provides that employers who unlawfully refuse to bargain during initial contract negotiations shall be subject to a make-whole remedy measured by Bureau of Labor Statistics (BLS) figures relating to collective bargaining settlements in units with 5,000 or more employees. Finally, this bill provides that employees who are unable to work as a result of unfair labor practices occurring during certain specified periods of time may receive an award of backpay in an amount equal to "1½ the employee's wage rate—less the wages the employee has earned" during the backpay period. The extraordinary relief is available during periods when the employees are, first, seeking to certify a union; second, seeking to decertify a union; third, seeking to rescind a union security agreement; and fourth, prior to execution of an initial collective bargaining agreement.

These punitive remedies conflict with Congress' original intent to restrict the NLRB's power to undoing the effect of the unfair labor practices committed. The U.S. Supreme Court first defined the limits of the Board's remedial jurisdiction in Consolidated Edison Co. of New York, Inc., against NLRB, stating:

> The power to command affirmative action is remedial, not punitive, and is to be exercised in aid of the Board's authority to restrain violations and as a means of removing or avoiding the consequences of violation where those consequences are of a kind to thwart the purposes of the act.

Although the application of this formula has undergone minor modifications through the ensuing years, as the circumstances of particular cases have dictated, the general principles stated therein have retained their validity.

For example, the Supreme Court has often upheld Board decisions which have the legitimate purpose of removing or avoiding the effects of an unfair labor practice. Thus in Virginia Electric & Power Co. against NLRB, the Court approved remedies purported to restore the status quo as a means of depriving the violator of the advantage gained by the unfair labor practice. And in Phelps Dodge Corp. against NLRB, the Court fashioned a remedy directed toward returning the parties to the position which would have existed, but for the illegal conduct. Alternatively, the Board's relief may be justified on the grounds that it prevents the consequences of a violation from thwarting the purposes of the act.

Conversely, the Court in local 60, Carpenters against NLRB, that where "no 'consequences of violations' are removed * * *; and no 'dissipation' of the effects of the prohibited action is achieved, * * * the order * * * becomes punitive and beyond the power of the Board."

The Supreme Court has held that a Board order, which directed the employer to pay to appropriate Government agencies an amount of money equal to that which had been earned by discriminatorily discharged employees on "work relief projects" and to credit that amount of money to a backpay award, was beyond the Board's remedial authority. Such payments, the Court claimed, had neither the effect of making employees whole nor of assuring them of their right to bargain collectively. Hence, the remedy served no statutory purpose, indeed, the Court felt that such payments were in the nature of an exaction, since the "work relief" payments constituted consideration for valuable services which the Government received.

Significantly, in Republic Steel the Court also rejected the Board's argument that the remedy was permissible since it would have the effect of deterring others from violating the act. Although a remedy may incidentally act as a deterrent, the Court noted that if the NLRB was permitted to impose remedies solely on the basis of acting as a deterrent, the Board would be free to set up any system of penalties which it could deem adequate to that end. The Court's holding reflects the principle that the rational relationship between unlawful conduct and the relief which is granted is not satisfied when the remedy purports to achieve ends other than those contemplated by the statute. Moreover, the remedies which the Board has fashioned have, with few exceptions, proven quite adequate in remedying flagrant, repeated or widespread unfair labor practices.

CEASE AND DESIST ORDERS

The most common of all NLRB remedial orders is the "cease-and-desist" order; that is, an order directing a party found to have engaged in an unfair labor practice to cease and desist from the particular conduct found to be unlawful. Sometimes, the Board goes further and orders the offender also to cease and desist from "any other conduct" violative of rights guaranteed in the act.

In 1941, the Supreme Court, in NLRB against Express Publishing Co., set out the doctrine that the Board must consider the nature and seriousness of the unfair labor practices found, the offender's past history of violations, and the probability of recurrence. These guiding principles, still valid today, are the bases upon which the Board can rely in order to justify its issuance of a broad cease-and-desist order.

Pursuant to the Express Publishing doctrine, the Board may justify a broad order where the additional violations restrained bear some resemblance to the violation(s) found. For example, in Windsor Manufacturing against NLRB, the court held that a broad order couched in the language of section 7 was justified where, in addition to a section 8(5) violation, there was evidence of other misconduct violative of section 8(1).

In another case, Marshfield Steel Co. against NLRB, the employer had challenged an order directing him to cease and desist from discouraging membership in the United Steelworkers of America "or in any other labor organization," on the grounds that the company had not engaged in violations against members of any union other than the steelworkers. The court reasoned that the employer's reliance on Express Publishing was misplaced, stating that the doctrine stood for the proposition that the Board could not restrain an employer from committing "other unfair labor practices in which it has not been found to be engaged * * *," while the order in the case at bar "merely restrains (the employer) from conducting against other labor organizations the same unfair labor practices in which it has been found to be engaged." The court concluded that the order was fully within the guidelines of Express Publishing, as the restrained violations bore complete resemblance to those which the employer had already committed.

Furthermore, because many employers have several plants and multistate operations, and unions often operate on a regional or national basis, the Board has often ordered remedial action that extends beyond the immediate units involved in the case. Thus, where it had been shown that the employer had instituted a systemwide, centrally directed, and coordinated policy to commit unfair practices, the courts have found that the Board had properly included all the employer's plants within its order.

Moreover, the Board may properly consider that, if not deterred, the employer would pursue the same discriminatory policies at every unit within a certain geographic area, and may apply its cease-and-desist order to that entire area. Cases demonstrate that when emloyers who have such a coordinated systemwide policy commit flagrant unfair labor practices, the courts have not hesitated to find the application of Board orders to plants other than those at which the violations occurred to be found particularly appropriate. When the employer controls several corporations, or one corporation with separate divisions, Board orders applying to more than one division or corporation have also been upheld.

The importance of the Board's cease-and-desist powers cannot be overestimated, considering that the employer may thereafter become the target of contempt of court proceedings for future violations of that order.

NOTICE AND ACCESS REMEDIES

In addition to the negative, or cease and desist, provisions of an NLRB order in an unfair labor practice case, the Board's remedy will almost always include an affirmative requirement covering the posting of notices. Compliance usually requires that, for a period of 60 days, the respondent employer or union will post, and maintain in a conspicuous location, a signed notice which sets forth the terms and conditions of the cease-and-desist order.

Generally, the provisions covering notification simply stipulate that the notice be posted in conspicuous places, such as bulletin boards, time clocks, department entrances, meeting hall entrances, or dues payment windows. If, however, "flagrant and gross" unfair labor practices are involved, the Board may require extraordinary notification provisions in addition to the normal posting requirements. In an attempt to neutralize the effect of aggravated unfair labor practice conduct, the board has ruled that the respondents mail a copy of the notice to each employee.

The Board has also required the employer to make his bulletin board available to the union for a specified period of time.

ATTORNEYS' FEES AND LITIGATION EXPENSES

In Tiidee Products, Inc., the Board noted that litigation expenses normally are not recoverable by the charging party in Board proceedings even though the public interest is served when the charging party protects its private interest before the Board. But the Tiidee decision further indicated that the Board would order payment of attorneys' fees and litigation expenses when the respondent's defense is "frivolous."

Cases indicate a "frivolous" defense is one which obviously lacks merit, is not debatable, and not one which fails simply upon the administrative law judge's resolutions of conflicting testimony.

The Supreme Court explained in Heck's that—

It cannot be said that the finding here that Heck's asserted at least "debatable" defenses to the unfair labor practice charges, whereas objections to the representation election in Tiidee were "patently frivolous," might have been viewed by the Board as putting the question of remedy in a different light. We cannot say that the board in performing its appointed function of balancing conflicting interests, could not reasonably decide that where "debatable" defenses are asserted, the public and private interests in affording the employer a determination of his "debatable" defense, unfettered by the prospect of bearing his adversary's litigation costs, outweigh the public interest in uncrowded dockets.

REIMBURSEMENT FOR LOST UNION ORGANIZING EXPENSES, DUES, AND INITIATION FEES

When union organizing campaigns have been subject to employer unfair labor practices the Board has been requested to require the employer to reimburse the union for losses in organizing expenses and dues. In Heck's, Inc., the Board held that the union had not established that the respondent's conduct had contributed to the loss of any dues or fees.

Following the Heck's decision, the Board issued Tiidee Products, Inc., in which it denied a similar request for organizing expenses and lost dues and fees. The Board did not state, however, that such a remedy should never be granted, but rather held that there was "no nexus" between the employer's unlawful conduct and the union's preelection organizing expenses. After the Board issued this Tiidee decision, Heck's decision reached the District of Columbia circuit in Food Store Employees, Local 347 against NLRB. In view of the Board's statement that the conduct of Heck's had probably caused the union additional organizational costs, the Court, relying on Tiidee, ordered such remedies paid the union. The Supreme Court reversed the court of appeals and determined that the case should have been remanded to the Board for a determination of whether or not there existed a nexus between the employer's conduct and the union's preelection organizing expenses. On remand, the Board did not deal directly with the merits of the union's claim for organizational expenses. Rather, it determined, as it did with the union's request for legal expenses, that the employer's defenses were debatable rather than frivolous. As the previous discussion indicates, where the employer has a frivolous defense, organizing expenses may be ordered if the union can show a nexus between the employer's illegal conduct and an increase in the union's organizing expenses.

COURT CONTEMPT AND INJUNCTION PROCEEDINGS

Once the Court enforces a Board order pursuant to section 10(E) of the NLRA, the employer may be subject to contempt of court proceedings. This makes available powerful sanctions beyond the purely remedial power of the Board.

It is well established that courts should impose whatever sanctions are necessary under the circumstances to grant full remedial relief, to coerce the contemnor into compliance with the Court's order, and to fully compensate the complainant for losses sustained.

Thus, in NLRB-related civil contempt proceedings, the courts will routinely order respondents to pay the Board all fees, costs, and expeditures incurred during the contempt proceedings. These include counsel fees incurred in investigation, preparation, presentation, and final disposition of the contempt case. Further, in order to assure that the respondent complies with the terms of the decree, the courts consistently order a fine for each further violation plus a fine for each day each violation continues. In NLRB against Amalgamated Local Union 355 (Robin Ford), the court anticipated future violations and ordered compliance fines of $10,000 from the union, and $2,000 from each of two union officers. Also in that case, if such future violations were of a continuing nature, the union and officers would have been required to pay fines of $1,000 and $2,000 per day respectively. In NLRB against Johnson Manufacturing Co., the employer who had refused to bargain in good faith with the union was fined $50.000, which was to be returned if the employer presented within 60 days satisfactory evidence of compliance with the new court order.

In contempt proceedings involving employer refusals to bargain, the Fifth Circuit has devised remedies which surpass those employed by the Board in similar violations. In NLRB against Schill Steel Products, Inc., the employer was ordered to bargain until full agreement or bona fide impasse was reached. The existence of such impasse was to be decided by the court, and the failure to find such an impasse was to be considered a failure to bargain in good faith. Such a failure would subject the employer to compliance fines of $5,000 for the violation, plus a fine of $1,000 for each day the violation continued. In addition, the employer was not permitted to refuse to meet with the union at reasonable times, or to withdraw recognition from the union until further order of the court. Also, unless the union gave written permission otherwise, bargaining sessions were to be held at least 15 hours per week. Sworn reports signed both by employer and union were to be filed with the court clerk and the Board every 30 days detailing the nature and course of the bargaining. If the Board determined that the employer was not bargaining in good faith, it was required to submit a report and supporting brief to the court and propose appropriate sanctions. If the company was found to have engaged in bad faith bargaining, the compliance fines mentioned above would then be imposed. The court may issue a writ of body attachment under which the appropriate officer or agent of the offending respondent will be confined to jail until compliance with the court's decree is forthcoming.

Finally, if it can be shown that the respondent "knowingly, willfully, and intentionally" violated the Court's decree, the Board may petition the court to find the respondent criminally liable for his conduct. Sentences for criminal contempt include monetary fines and imprisonment.

One basic legal principle continually recurs in this discussion: the NLRB has been granted broad authority by Congress to fashion unfair labor practice remedies in order to effectuate the policies of the National Labor Relations Act. This power is subject to the stipulation that its use be restricted to undoing the effects of unfair labor practices found to have been committed. Stated in another and perhaps more conclusory fashion, Board orders must be remedial and not punitive or confiscatory.

For the most part, the remedies utilized by the Board are accepted as appropriate manifestations of the Board's remedial powers. For example, bargaining orders, backpay, reinstatement, notice posting, and cease-and-desist orders are all considered to be "traditional" remedies which the Board may apply with flexibility and discretion.

NLRB and judicial decisions have also recognized that respondents who engage in repeated or flagrant violation, or who advance frivolous defenses to unfair labor practice charges, deserve to receive harsher and more imaginative remedies. Thus, the Board has fashioned remedies designed to confront the particular circumstances of the violations found. For example, where a respondent has demonstrated a proclivity to violate the act, and where it can be anticipated that further violations will occur, the Board will issue a "broad" order which requires that the act not be violated "in any other manner." Also, special notice provisions may be ordered to inform the employees that an unfair labor practice has been found and is being remedied. The respondent may be required to mail the notice to the employees, given the union access to company bulletin boards, or read the notice aloud to the employees. Where a flagrant unfair labor practice is unaccompanied by a debatable defense, the respondent may be ordered to pay attorneys' fees and litigation expenses.

The act also provides the NLRB with authority to seek injunctions to prevent the continuance of unfair labor practices where it can be shown that such relief is "just and proper." If such an injunction is issued, the unfair labor practice will be restrained until the Board issues a final order which will then contain the appropriate NLRB remedy. Under section 10(l) of the act, the general counsel is required to seek an injunction from a U.S. district court against certain specified union unfair labor practices. Injunctions against other unfair labor practices are covered by section 10(j). While the injunction is in effect, a breach of the injunction will subject the defendant to powerful contempt of court sanctions.

Other contempt sanctions are available for use against a respondent who violates a Board order which has been enforced by the appellate courts. The NLRB order has then become the order of the court and a refusal to comply with that order, or the commission of a similar future violation, will subject the contemnor to whatever sanctions are necessary under the circumstances to grant full remedial relief, to coerce the contemnor into compliance with the court's order, and to fully compensate the complainant for losses sustained. These sanctions in almost all NLRA civil contempts cases will include payment to the Board of fees, costs, and litigation expenses incurred. Additionally, the court can coerce compliance by fining the contemnor and even placing his responsible officer or agent in jail through a writ of body attachment. Willful violations may be prosecuted by way of criminal contempt, with its attendant penalties of fines and imprisonment.

As shown, harsher remedies presently are available for use against the flagrant or recalcitrant violator. But availability is not the only touchstone for their utilization. In dealing with requests for these extraordinary remedies, the Board and courts have recognized that when the severe remedy is ordered, they must address questions involving the fundamental fairness of the proceeding. One basic problem is the possibility that harsh remedies and penalties tend to coerce respondents with potentially meritorious claims into settling the case in order to avoid the remedy. In order to minimize this chilling effect on the assertion of possibly valid defenses, the Board and courts have rejected requests for attorneys' fees, litigation costs, union organizing expenses, and "make whole" remedies for refusals to bargain, where the respondent has been able to present a debatable, or nonfrivolous defense.

The potential unfairness becomes more pronounced when considering that high financial penalties will most affect litigants with small financial resources. A flagrant violator with a sound economic position, however, may be able to pay the price and continue violating the act. If such a violator is undeterred by potential contempt of court compliance fines and jail terms, the possibility of paying double back pay may not deter him either. While valid reasons exist for concern about those respondents who repeatedly commit serious labor practices, those concerns should be balanced by recognizing, as the Board and courts have done, that certain proposed remedies in this area are unacceptable, because they may unfairly coerce settlements and hinder a full determination of whether the alleged violation actually occurred.

Mr. President, the Congress has too often in the past failed to distinguish between small and large businesses when legislation is passed. Examples abound of where every mom and pop grocery store or small manufacturer has to meet the same standards as the corporate giants of America. All of us have been deluged with the complaints about the application of ERISA, the Employee Retirement Income Security Act, to small businesses. We should be forewarned of the consequences of imposing this kind of excessive penalties on small businesses before we act on this bill. The Senator from Kansas continues to have grave doubts about the impact that this bill will have on our economy.

DEPARTURE FROM HISTORICAL PREMISES

Mr. President, during the extended debate which has already taken place on the Labor Law Reform Act, most of the remarks have focused on the problems which would be created by enactment of this bill. The proponents have argued that the problems encountered under present law justify a change in the National Labor Relations Act.

I would like to take a different approach in this speech in the next few minutes. I want to address the aspects of this bill which represent a change in the underlying philosophy of the National Labor Relations Act. Many experts feel that this act would depart from the primary focus of protecting employee rights and begin to make the statute punitive rather than remedial. These experts question whether the use of debarment, 1½ back pay and other remedies will change the act's basic philosophy from encouraging good-faith bargaining to punishing violations.

To properly understand the underlying foundations of the National Labor Relations Act, it is necessary to look at the original debate and discussion on this legislation. Many of the remarks made back in 1935 remain as true today as they were then. The Senator from Kansas believes that our decisions on H.R. 8410 can be guided by the thoughts and statements of our predecessors who created the National Labor Relations Act, recognizing a lot of time has passed. We have had changes take place. It is a different world. Labor and management are far different than in 1935.

One of the major forces behind creation of the National Labor Relations

Board was a great Senator, Senator Wagner. His remarks made when that bill first came to the floor are very illustrative. His first statement was:

Today, with economic problems occupying the center of the stage, we strive to liberate the common man from destitution, from insecurity, and from human exploitation.

Mr. President, those views apply today to both employers and unions. No one seriously contends that unions are in an inherently inferior bargaining position. When we free employees from "exploitation," we must recognize that that exploitation can come from more than one source. Any action that we take which unbalances the carefully reached equilibrium between employers and unions has the potential to make employees subect to the "exploitation" of the party we give more power to, and that happens in many instances when we start tinkering around with Government programs, Government regulations, and Government edicts.

DUTY TO BARGAIN COLLECTIVELY

The 1935 act made it an unfair labor practice for an employer to refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of his employees. Senator Wagner, in his explanation of this provision, said:

It does not compel anyone to make a contract of any kind if no terms are arrived at that are satisfactory to him. The very essence of collective bargaining is that either party shall be free to withdraw if its conditions are not met.

The act is designed to encourage collective bargaining without forcing anyone into a contract. Yet, if Congress imposes penalties which are so severe they could destroy a business, an important part of the freedom to contract has been taken away.

When an employer is faced with loss of Government contracts that may be a major part of his business, he may be induced not to pursue or defend claims because he is not assured of having his defense upheld. For example, if an employee or group of employees file an unfair labor practice petition, the employer is faced with a possible award of 1½ back pay. Any employer without unlimited financial resources may be forced to settle without even presenting a defense which might be found valid. The risk is too great.

H.R. 8410 has been challenged as having the potential of making the NLRB no longer a disinterested forum. Suggestions have been made that the newly expanded Board may not reflect a variety of viewpoints and that, with the new members, one side of all disputes will be given a more favorable hearing. Also, the bill contains new penalties which will weigh more heavily against employers than unions in their actual application. For example, debarment can be applied against unions, however, few unions and many employers have Government contracts.

The Senate was cognizant of the problems which could be created if the NLRB failed to provide an impartial forum. In speaking of the NLRA, Senator Wagner noted that—

In applying the healing balm of an unright, impartial, and peaceful forum to industry and labor it will benefit employers, workers, and the country at large.

The present Congress should be careful that we do not take actions, which are well intentioned, but may nevertheless have the ultimate effect of denying any party access to an impartial trier of fact. If either employers or unions feel, even if these beliefs are unfounded, that the NLRB does not give them a fair hearing, they will resort to higher court review. Because of the structure of the NLRA, many cases which are now settled by consent will have hearings before the NLRB so that the order can then be appealed to the district court or court of appeals. The costs of this litigation both to the parties and the Government will not be insignificant.

Mr. President, when the National Labor Relations Act was debated in the House, it was not adopted without significant opposition. Those who opposed that legislation, like those who oppose this bill, are not puppets for business interests. Those formers members of Congress were concerned about the rights of workers, too. Those men, so far as this Senator knows, were honest and forthright in expressing their concerns about the possible implications of the NLRA.

However, I might suggest that it was often the case that perhaps certain horror stories were told on either side. Legislation often is never as good as its proponents claim and never as bad as its opponents claim.

Fortunately, most of their worst fears did not come to pass. However, some of them were well founded, as is evidenced by subsequent legislation passed by Congress. I refer in particular to the 1947 amendments to the NLRA, the Labor Management Relations Act and the 1959 act. The Labor Management Reporting and Disclosure Act.

One Congressman who spoke on the 1935 act made this observation about that bill:

It places the relation of employer and employee upon a permanent and unalterable war basis. It rests upon the false assumption that the interests of employer and employee are by their intrinsic nature absolutely irreconcilable.

The Senator from Kansas does not agree that that has been the effect of the 1935 act. Yet, the problems created by that act have required Congress to make subsequent changes. I believe that it is important that we keep these fears of our predecessors in mind. We must insure that we do not create the kind of problems that they feared.

EMPLOYEE RIGHTS PARAMOUNT

Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas—and many other Senators—has some very intense concerns about this bill. Unlike most of the Congressmen who opposed the 1935 act, my primary misgiving is not about the direct effect of this bill on employers and their businesses. While many of the sections of this bill can be predicted to have an adverse impact on the normal course of some businesses, the free enterprise system and its component parts will survive almost anything that Congress can do to them. It may not be easy, but business will survive.

It will survive, perhaps, through some court ruling as we had yesterday, which said, in effect, that you cannot make surprise visits. We all want health and safety, but we also want to preserve some balance in this country—some balance for business and some balance for labor. I suppose it is fair to say that we are talking about business now in the broad sense, not the giant corporations, not those who, by one ruse after another, abuse the NLRA.

The uppermost concern of the Senator from Kansas is how this will impact the vast majority of American workers. Undoubtedly, some employees have been denied the right to fully exercise their legal rights by the actions on some employers who have violated the law or the spirit of the law, or somehow frustrated the rights of employees. Equally true is the fact that unions have at times denied employees, most notably minorities, the opportunity to make reasoned decisions and incur the benefits of the collective-bargaining system.

Mr. President, the method to correct these past abuses of employee's rights is not to pass legislation which will cause more deprivations or other rights of other employees. The legislative history and the case law that surrounds the National Labor Relations Act and its accompanying legislation reveals that employees are best protected when a balance between the employer and the union exists. When this balance is absent, the employee suffers more than the employer or the union.

The 1935 act was originally spawned by the labor disturbances that occured during the depression. At that time, the principal problems was a failure by employers to recognize unions as the bargaining agents of their employees. So-called company unions were created by the employer as an excuse to avoid recognizing other, legitimate unions. The 1935 act corrected this problem by compelling both recognition of and bargaining with employee-chosen unions.

The equilibrium between labor unions and employers was not brought to a balance until the 1947 adoption of the Taft-Hartley Act. That legislation protected employees against some abuses of unions that occurred due to the imbalance created by the 1935 act. The employees' right to have a free and uncoerced choice in selecting a representative or in choosing not to select a representative was established. This is what we are ultimately trying to preserve.

The basic philosophy of the National Labor Relations Act is to encourage good faith bargaining between the adverse interests of the employers and the employees. This philosophy can only be continually carried out by leaving untouched the balance that has been so carefully reached by the adoption of the NLRA. The important thing is that the employee, the workingman, be free from exploitation from either side. Passage of the so-called Labor Reform Act—I am talking about the Labor Reform Act in its present form—would damage this equilibrium by giving one party added strength which would enable them to exert more influence on the workingman and take away from his freedom of choice. This is not what our predecessors intended when the act was adopted. I would urge that the balance that has been carefully established not be upset without very compelling reasons.

PROTECTION OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. President, although the Washington Post has since changed its opinion on whether this bill should be passed, the Post made a point in an editorial on March 15, 1978, which the Senator from Kansas believes should be made again. In that editorial, the Post pinpointed the basic problem permeating the labor reform act when it said that Members of Congress had "lost sight of the need to change the law so that it better protects the rights of workers." The article continued by saying that—

> This bill does improve the protection of some of those rights against abuses by management, but it does nothing to protect them from labor unions. And one kind of abuse is about as common as the other these days. The main focus of this legislation is on the rights of unions—as unions, not as representatives of workers.

And there is a vast difference, I might say, between that.

The proponents of this legislation have given us many speeches why larger fines and penalties are needed against employers, however, the necessity for similar action against unions has been virtually ignored. Therefore, an examination of the judicial treatment of cases involving employees subjected to fines by labor unions illustrates how the benefits of the labor law reform would run primarily to unions.

In 1935, Congress enacted the National Labor Relations Act, the Wagner Act, in order to protect employees who want to join or assist labor unions. During the next 12 years, unions grew signicantly in both size and power. As a result, in 1947, in order to curtail some of the ways in which unions were exercising their power, Congress again passed legislation in the field of labor law. It amended the Wagner Act by passing the Labor Management Relations Act, the Taft-Hartley Act. This act, among other things, restricts union conduct by defining union unfair labor practices.

In drafting the Taft-Hartley Act, Congress had to balance, on the one hand, the maintenance of employee freedom which lies at the heart of industrial democracy, and on the other hand, the right of a labor union to discipline its members so it can function effectively. Congress attempted to guarantee employee freedom by amending section 7 of the Wagner Act.

Section 7 states in part that—

> Employees . . . shall also have the right to refrain from any and all such activities except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment.

That final reference in the section refers to the practice of having a closed snop which is primarily a matter of State law. Some States such as my home State of Kansas have made the decision that employee rights are better served by not allowing any business to require union membership as a condition of employment.

Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield briefly for a unanimous-consent request?

Mr. DOLE. I am happy to yield, even for a half-hour.

Mr. RIEGLE. I appreciate it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Mr. Richard Yurko, of my staff, be accorded the privilege of the floor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. DOLE. Would the Senator like to have more time?

Mr. RIEGLE. Not at the moment. The Senator is very gracious offering it.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator's asking me to yield. I will be happy to yield at length with anyone without losing my right to the floor, either in or out of the Chamber.

Mr. President, at the same time that Congress changed section 7, Congress limited the power of the union to discipline its members by enacting section 8(b)(1)(A) which states:

> It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents (1) to restrain or coerce (A) employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7: Provided, That this paragraph shall not impair the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership therein.

The amendment to section 7 referred to in this section gave employees "the right to refrain from any or all such activities," except under certain collective bargaining contracts.

Section 8(b)(1)(A) limits the action a union may take against a member by making it an unfair labor practice to restrain or coerce an employee in the exercise of his section 7 rights. At the same time, the proviso in section 8(b)(1)(A) makes clear that the union may adopt internal rules on membership requirements.

The Senator from Kansas believes that these amendments were necessary, given the condition of the labor movement and labor-management relations at that time. Yet, despite the obvious need for this section, a great amount of litigation has occurred because of it. This may serve as a lesson for us in the consideration of this bill. Many of the provisions of this bill are equally certain to engender many new court cases. We must carefully weigh the benefits of each before we subject the court system to this additional burden.

Beginning in 1967, the Supreme Court has had to decide a series of cases dealing with union discipline. These decisions have answered some of the questions raised by these sections. An examination of these cases will reveal that some questions of union discipline are still unresolved. It appears that these uncertainties might have properly been a subject for congressional consideration. Nevertheless, none of the problems that I am going to address are covered by this bill.

It just seems to this Senator that Congress should not allow itself to look at only one side of the picture. The other point that should be made before discussing the cases is the length of time that litigation has been occurring under these amendments. The act was passed in 1947 and many of the questions have only been recently resolved. More than 30 years of cases have not answered every question. Some of the sections that H.R. 8410 would change originated in the 1935 act. Before we throw out 40 years of case law and NLRB decisions, we must judge the benefits of the changes as compared to the costs of again unsettling this area of the law. In decisions such as this, caution dictates that the justification for change be very compelling before this kind of action is taken.

Turning to the cases that I previously mentioned involving union discipline, I want to emphasize that the important issue is not whether the courts have found some union action illegal. It is unquestioned that both labor and management have committed many violations of this law. The major issue is that this legislation does not evenly address the problems created by both parties. This unbalanced nature of the bill may cause severe problems in the future.

One of the first major cases in this area was NLRB against Allis-Chalmers Manufacturing Co. This case posed the question of whether judicial enforcement of a reasonable fine against a full member of a union for crossing a properly authorized picket line to return to work during a strike is an unfair labor practice. The issue was whether the fine represented an improper restraint on the rights of the members or did it represent a legitimate control device for the union.

Justice Brennan for the court decided that a union may impose a reasonable fine on members for crossing a picket line. The majority concluded that if the fine itself is legitimate, then there is no question of its enforceability in court. Since the relationship between a member and the union is viewed as contractual, the contractual obligations are enforceable in court.

Mr. President, at this point I would like to note how this relates to the section of H.R. 8410 that denies an injunction against wildcat strikes. These are strikes in violation of a valid contract. The employer could not obtain a temporary injunction against a wildcat strike regardless of how much his business will be hurt. I believe that the Supreme Court showed the proper respect for contracts when it allowed court enforcement of its provision. The portion of H.R. 8410 which undermines the contractual relationship is highly questionable.

The minority in the Allis-Chalmers case challenged whether a valid contract existed between the employee and the union. While the arguments made carry some weight, the majority was clear in its affirmation of the contractual relationship. Unfortunately, the Senate is not as firm in its support for the maintenance of a contractual relationship.

LIMITS ON WORK

In 1969, another case concerning union discipline reached the Supreme Court.

In Scofield against NLRB, the Court was called upon to decide whether a union could legitimately impose fines on members for violating a union rule concerning production and pay ceilings. The issue was whether a member had the right to earn as much as he can by his efforts, or may a union limit the amount a member may earn per day in order to serve union goals.

Justice White, for the Court held that the rule restricting daily earnings was one that served legitimate union interests and was not contrary to any public policy. As such, it was valid and could be enforced against members by court-enforceable fines. The Court reasoned that such unity or action was manifestly a matter affecting the interest of the group and was important to its collective bargaining strength.

Another point raised in the Scofield case bears directly on the bill before the Senate. The court pointed out that the fines imposed were reasonable in amount. The court in a later decision determined that the reasonableness of the fine is to be settled in State courts.

The important point this raises in reference to H.R. 8410 is the Court's insistence that, notwithstanding the contract, the fines must be reasonable. If the same standard of reasonableness were to be applied to some of the sections of this bill, I believe they would not pass muster. For example, debarring an entire company and causing the possible layoff of many workers does not seem to be a reasonable penalty for any but willful violations of the act.

The dissenting Justices in subsequent cases have questioned the effectiveness of allowing State courts to determine the reasonableness of fines. As Justice Douglas noted:

> It is no answer to say that the reasonableness of a fine may be tested in a State-court suit. That envisions a rich and powerful union suing a rich and powerful employee. Employees, however, are often at the bottom of the totem pole, indigent and unworldly when it comes to litigation. . . . In my view the Labor Board can not properly perform its duties unless it determines whether the nature and amount of the fine levied by a union constitute an unfair labor practice.

It would appear that if the Senate is seriously worried about the rights of individual employees, and not just the rights of unions, this area seems to be a proper subject for amendment in any labor law reform bill.

MEMBERSHIP FOR DISCIPLINARY PURPOSES

In the Granite State case in 1972, the Court held that a union may take direct disciplinary action only against its members. But a union can, in many circumstances, interfere with the job rights of nonmembers by requesting the employer to impose discipline for improper work-related conduct. The core question is who counted as a full union member. Most cases have revolved around whether an employee who pays only the required fees without participating in the union is a member of the union.

An employee who has paid dues to keep his job must carefully refrain from any act which exceeds the minimum legal obligation to avoid being a full union member. If he does exceed the minimum, he may be deemed to have indicated an intention to become a full member. As a full member, he suddenly finds himself subject to union discipline.

In this instance, the courts have offered little guidance as to what actions are sufficient to alter an employee's status from nonmember to member. No specific list has been drawn of what actions cross the nebulous line. Therefore, if an employee participates in union activities or receives union benefits, he risks being considered a union member without having made a conscious decision.

The fundamental question in the context of this bill is whether the union should assume the burden of full disclosure to the employee before he makes his decision. Such disclosure would at least demonstrate that the employee has an opportunity for a reasoned choice by knowing his options and their advantages and disadvantages. It would also put the burden of proof concerning membership where it should be—on the party trying to curtail the freedom on the individual.

The employee should be given a clear choice by the union, reasonably explained, so that he knows his alternatives and their consequences. If he chooses not to join, but merely to pay dues, the union should accept that decision as part of the employee's exercise of his right to not join a union. Given the disparity between the union with professional staff and experienced administrators and the individual employee, such disclosure by the union does not seem unreasonable. Nevertheless, the legislation before us fails to even address this problem.

RESIGNATION

In the past, almost no unions had, in their bylaws, provisions relating to resignation. It was commonly understood that one simply ceased paying dues in order to resign from union membership. Recently, some unions have amended their bylaws to place restrictions on a members' right to resign. Many union constitutions also place such restrictions on resignation.

These restrictions have been criticized on several grounds. They severely limit the right to resign and may not give the employee the option to do so at any relevant time. He may be unable to resign at or after the time a policy is decided, when a strike is called, or during a strike.

In order to restrict the right of a member to resign, the union rule must serve a legitimate union interest. Since it impinges on individual rights, it must be narrowly written if it is to be valid. Neither the Board nor the Supreme Court has ruled on whether any restrictions are valid. It may be appropriate for Congress to act now to prevent any undue restriction on the individual rights of the very employees the Labor Law Reform Act is purported to protect.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, each time that the Senator from Kansas has addressed the Senate on this bill, I have emphasized that the paramount concern of the Senate should be the protection and expounding of employee rights. I have outlined several cases where union practices can restrict these rights. The proponents of this bill have also listed numerous cases of violations by employers. I am certain that violations of the spirit and letter of the National Labor Relations Act have been committed by both sides.

Yet, the bill in virtually every section would only work to remedy the supposedly massive violations by employers. Since I believe that the vast majority of American businessmen want to abide by the law, I must question the harshness of some of these remedies. I also must question the wisdom of only addressing one side of the problem.

The Senator from Kansas knows that the intention of every member of the Human Resources Committee is to make improvements in our national labor law. The only reason that the Senator from Kansas has engaged in this extended debate is that I share their belief that improvements need to be made. Unfortunately, after an examination of all of the provisions in this bill, I cannot agree that it would make an overall improvement.

At the present time, a relatively stable balance between the power of organized labor and the employers they bargain with has been established. This balance was achieved despite the problems that the proponents of this legislation have pointed out. This balance has been the primary protection to employees against the manipulation and exploitation by their side. Most labor disputes are settled by a compromise. If we give one side a clear advantage, the incentive to bargain will be less. As our predecessors in Congress have found, the ones who are hurt by an unequality in power are the individual workers. They suffer more than either the union or the employer.

Mr. President, the collective bargaining process has worked very well, especially in the last few years. With a few notable exceptions like the recent coal strike, the United States has been in a period of labor peace. The Senator from Kansas believes that large credit for that peace must go to those policies that have made the bargaining power of both parties equal and thereby forced good-faith bargaining.

We must be very careful in taking any actions which could upset this balance that has been established. The balance will be destroyed if we only look at one side of the problem, as the committee bill does. Only if we see the whole picture can we make the proper decisions. The Senator from Kansas is convinced that if this bill is adopted in its present form, the delicate balance will no longer exist. Regardless of the other benefits that may or may not be achieved, placing a major stumbling block in the path of encouraging collective bargaining is too big a price to pay.

Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STEVENSON). Does the Senator from Kansas withhold his suggestion?

Mr. DOLE. I withhold the request and I yield the floor.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my remarks continue following the earlier remarks I have made on two separate occasions today, and that this not be considered a third speech in violation of the two-speech rule.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Chair.

(Mr. HATCH's remarks are printed earlier in today's RECORD.)

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I yield the floor.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, may I ask my friend from Utah whether he would like me to take some time now and fill in until his next speaker arrives to address the question of labor law reform?

Mr. HATCH. I am delighted to do whatever the distinguished Senator wants.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There is need for a lot of clarification on the RECORD on the issue which has been before us for a week or more.

Mr. HATCH. I will be glad to do the clarifying myself, if that is the desire of the distinguished Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Are you asking me to yield to you for another speech?

Mr. HATCH. Either way. If you care to take over, or if you care to recess for the day, it is all right with me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. There are two matters I wanted to discuss. Both deal with the content of speeches delivered by proponents of the bill, the Senator from Indiana (Mr. LUGAR) and the Senator from New Mexico (Mr. SCHMITT). I had thought I would wait until they were here. Does the Senator have any knowledge of whether they are coming in again this afternoon?

Mr. HATCH. I do not believe they will be back today, but I will certainly have them both here tomorrow.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, I think maybe some of the observations I would like to make probably should be in the RECORD today, and then we might be able to develop the matters further with them when they are here.

Mr. HATCH. Yes; I do not think either of the Senators would be upset if the Senator from New Jersey would put his remarks into the RECORD, except for those matters, perhaps, that they would need to be in attendance to answer.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I appreciate that. Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana dealt with the Cambridge Report survey, which was first introduced into the debate this morning by the distinguished minority leader; and his talk raises certain questions that I wanted to discuss.

I think it could be agreed that in polling public opinion it is difficult to formulate questions in a manner that is both precise and does not suggest a response. The Cambridge poll presented several questions that, in my view, were not accurate if they were intended to elicit public opinion about the bill that is before us here in the Senate. As an example, one of the questions was put this way:

> In general, do you think the rules by which unions gain the right to represent employees need to be made easier for the unions or not?

That was the question.

This question certainly does not accurately reflect the bill before us. The bill does not make the rules easier for a union to organize workers, yet the question was put in exactly those terms:

> Do you think the rules by which unions gain the right to represent employees need to be made easier for the unions or not?

What we have before us is a bill that makes it easier for employees to obtain the information they need to decide. The bill makes it easier for workers to decide in a prompt election whether they want a union. All of the provision here run directly to the individual, the employee, not to the union. It goes to the employee in terms of the opportunity to be educated and informed on the decision that he or she will have to make at the time of the election. It makes it easier for the employee to have an opportunity to express that decision in a democratic election, whether that decision is to have a union, or not to have a union.

So instead of asking a question in terms of making it easier for unions, I was wondering, as the Senator from Indiana was speaking, what the response would have been if the question was put this way:

> Do you think the rules should be changed to make it easier for workers to get information equally from both sides before they vote on whether or not they want a union?

I would have asked the Senator whether he would agree that had this question been asked, the answer, given the American public's sense of fair play, would have been quite different than as it was to the question presented in the Cambridge poll.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield at that point?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Yes.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I would not think that question would be fair under the facts in this bill. If equal access were to be applied, I think this would be unequal. Today the balance is in favor of labor with regard to the special treatment that it gets in regard to explaining its provision. If we add the equal access provision, that gives it almost total control over the explanation concerning the unionization of any particular business.

I do not think the Senator from Indiana would think that was a fair question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Here is another question, on page 5 of the Cambridge poll:

> One possible change in the labor law would allow labor union organizers to go on to the property of businesses at any time, including working time, and try to recruit members. Do you favor or oppose this idea?

This is probably the most inaccurate description of what the bill does in terms of equal access, yet that was the preface to the question, "Do you favor or oppose this idea?" The preface to that was, "One possible change in the labor law would allow labor union organizers to go on to the property of businesses at any time, including working time."

The bill's equal access provision does not grant this opportunity or right at all. There is nothing in the bill which says that the union organizers can go on to company premises at any time. With a reading of the bill itself we can see that there are situations where the employer opens the door and creates thereby an equal opportunity for the employees to have access to information from those who would advocate the union. But in no way does it open that door at any time to union organizers to come on to the property.

Here, again, we have the question that is leading the person interviewed to the answer, the classical case of a leading question.

I wonder if in asking public opinion about access, the results would have been different if the question had been put this way:

> If the employer calls the workers together in the plant to give an antiunion speech, do you think the workers should have an equivalent opportunity to hear the other side?

A question put in that form would reflect what this bill seeks and provides, an equivalent opportunity to match, in argument, the arguments made by the employer. That is all. Under the legislation, it certainly would not be at any time and at the will or the instigation of those who are advocating the union. It is only when the employees have been systematically exposed to the views of the person who speaks with the most authority, the employer, that the other side would get its opportunity for the presentation of its opposing view.

Again, I think the great American spirit of fair play would result in a clear answer by the American people of yes if the question had been phrased to accurately describe exactly what is in our bill.

On page 6 of the poll included in the RECORD earlier today, this question was put:

> When union elections are held, should the election be held immediately after some employees indicate they want a union, or should there be a waiting period such as a month between then and the election so that both the union and the business can explain their positions and campaign for support among employees?

First, I would have to say that my first reaction in hearing that question was that it is not talking about this bill at all, because the bill does not require or even suggest that elections be held immediately.

Second, what the question suggests as a reasonable waiting period, about a month, is pretty close to what this bill does provide, as a matter of fact. The shortest period is 21 days and for the simplest situation the period is 21 to 30 days.

On this question, Mr. President, if the actual terms of the bill had been related I wonder whether the results would have been different.

I think that the same 70 percent would have favored the bill's provisions without the erroneous suggestion that the alternative was to hold the election immediately. After that, regarding a waiting period of about a month, the result probably would have been the same.

Another question that was asked in the Cambridge survey:

Some people say that if a majority of employees of a firm or factory want to have a labor union, then every employee should have to pay dues to the union since the union will be representing them. Do you agree with this idea or not?

This has to do with the so-called right-to-work issue. Yet there is nothing in this bill that would deal with the right-to-work issue or would compel union security agreements. Including that question in this poll stacks up an opinion and an attitude that is in character with so much of the opinion and attitude about this bill that has been developed; a focus on issues that have no part, are not relevant to, are not included within, and are not going to be included in this bill.

I just raise this because I did feel that the Senator from Indiana, in raising it earlier today, had been very reasonable in his approach. I wanted to commend him for that, but I also wanted to point out that the questions in the Caddell Cambridge reports poll do not reflect the bill before us; therefore, the answers to the questions are not reliable in determining what American public opinion is on this legislation.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am happy to yield.

Mr. JAVITS. I think the Senator is rendering a fine service by analyzing this policy and the results; therefore, I wish to associate myself with his views.

I point out that in the Joint Economic Committee, we had a series of hearings as to polls and what they mean, with testimony by the outstanding experts—Lou Harris and a whole group of other people who take polls. Their testimony is clear that the answers are heavily dictated by the questions. This is the technical side, the professional side of polling. How you write the question is a decisive factor in what answers you get and what the percentages are. The Senator has gleaned that truth from this analysis which he has just made. That is their professional testimony, that this is a decisive element in polling, how you ask what question you are asking.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think that those of us who have been trained in the law are particularly sensitive to this. I respectfully suggest this to one of the leading Members that has a record of such distinction in the law. There is nothing like getting a lecture from the judge when you are trying to lead a witness into a question and have that gavel come down so you feel it is almost on your head.

We are particularly sensitive to this. I am sure that we all can fall into this polling error as we put questions.

We have included a poll in the record—and again, all sides develop and contract for a poll. We have the poll that the unions engaged, the AFL–CIO. It might be interesting to compare a couple of questions here. One is the poll that was contracted for by the AFL–CIO. The other is the Cambridge poll. Let me just read comparable questions. This might be somewhat redundant. First, I read from one poll. I shall not identify it at the outset:

The question was whether you favor—

A law making it easier for workers in large companies to vote on whether or not they wish to join labor unions.

From the same poll:

A law making it easier for workers in a small company to vote on whether or not they wish to join labor unions.

Both of those questions were answered predominantly yes, 73 percent and 67 percent, the first two questions.

Now, from the other poll:

One possible change in the labor law being considered would make it easier for unions to recruit new members in companies where they are not currently represented. Do you think this change is needed or not?

The answer in the affirmative on that question was 33 percent; not sure, 26 percent; no, 41 percent.

Those are two good polling agencies. They both, I am sure, have the highest competence in accurate sampling for desired results. The questions dealt with the same issue. The responses were diametrically opposite.

The first two questions I read were from the opinion poll contracted for by the American Federation of Labor–Congress of Industrial Organization, that had 73 percent yes to the first question, 67 percent yes to the second question.

The third question I read was from the poll contracted for by the retail federation, the Cambridge poll that I started my discussion of polling about earlier.

It came to the exact opposite result, again suggesting, as the Senator from New York described, and as I have, too, that we have to look at the polling techniques: The question produces and leads to certain answers.

So, when we are considering, when it is important to understand what people are thinking, in order to really know what they are thinking, we had better really know how the question that was put to the public was phrased.

SUPPORT FOR LABOR LAW REFORM IS STRONG, WIDESPREAD, AND WELL INFORMED

● Mrs. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, I believe that the labor-management policy of the United States, as defined in the Wagner Act, is magnificently designed to protect the interests of both management and workers, to encourage mutual respect for each other's rights, and to provide machinery by which, through free discussion and give and take at the bargaining table, they can reach mutual agreements that are fair and just to both sides.

I believe that the institution of collective bargaining, as it has grown and evolved in this country, has done more to secure justice and dignity for working people and their families, and to stabilize industrial relations, and to strengthen social and economic democracy in America, than any other single institution.

I am aware that many workers do not choose to organize and use the collective bargaining machinery that is available to them. I am aware that many employers pay fair wages, remedy grievances promptly and in general follow enlightened labor-relations policies so that their employees see no need to organize.

Such employers are breaking no laws, and the legislation before us has no effect whatever on them except to encourage them to keep on doing what they are doing now. To preserve such situations it is essential that the right and possibility of organizing be available at all times. Company officials and workers alike need to be aware that changes in company policy or ownership can be countered by changes in employee attitudes toward collective action. Such knowledge on both sides helps to insure that good relations remain good.

Only employers who are demonstrably unfair—employers who use their economic power to control their workers and who unlawfully deny workers their right to decide for themselves whether or not to organize—only these employers are the target of this bill, and they deserve to be. Our aim is not to write new laws, but to curb a pattern of open, contemptuous violation of a law that has been on the books for 43 years.

I believe the labor relations policy of the United States is a good policy that provides maximum freedom and maximum protection for workers and employers alike. I am convinced that it is essential to a free economy and a free people to make that policy and its enforcement machinery work fairly, smoothly, quickly, and efficiently so that workers and employers meet their obligations to each other and to the law to the fullest extent possible.

These deep, life-long convictions, which were so fully shared by my husband, are not merely the personal views of Hubert and MURIEL HUMPHREY. In recent months I have seen evidence, in the support given by responsible citizens and leaders from every walk of life to the labor law reform bill, that these views are shared by the overwhelming majority of the American people.

Thousands of endorsements and public statements by leaders in the fields of law, economics, religion, civil rights, public administration, the arts, education, and sports, calling for passage of this bill, make it clear that the issues are understood in every corner of the land.

The President and Vice President of the United States have stated their firm support for passage of the labor law reform bill. Public officials at all levels of Government also have fully endorsed this legislation.

The Secretary of Labor, Ray Marshall, has expressed his firm commitment to this bill. Joining him in this position are seven of his predecessors—all of the living former secretaries of labor who held that post in Democratic and Republican administrations alike; Peter Brennan, John Dunlop, Arthur Goldberg, James Hodgson, George Shultz, W. J. Usery, and Willard Wirtz. These men vary widely in their political philosophy, but on fundamental issues of law and the administration of law, they are united.

State officials from the North, South, East, and West support this bill: The Governors of California, Connecticut, Hawaii, Massachusetts, Montana, New Mexico, New York and Pennsylvania; the Lieutenant Governor of Kentucky, the State treasurer of Oregon, the attorney general of Louisiana, the State labor Commissioners of Hawaii, Iowa, Massachusetts, New Jersey, Tennessee, and Wyoming. More than 300 State legislators in all 50 of our States have joined Americans for justice on the job in urging passage of the labor law reform bill. So have the mayors of more than 75 cities in every part of the country, from North Platte, Nebr., to Bolton, Miss.

John Fanning, chairman of the National Labor Relations Board, which administers the Nation's labor-management relations policies, and former Chairman Frank McCulloch support this bill.

I have had the honor to serve, as my husband did before me, as chairperson of the advisory committee of Americans for Justice on the Job, which is a coalition of citizens representing so broad a cross-section of the American public that it may be unique in history.

Mr. President, I would like to review briefly the names of some of the outstanding citizens and organizations who make up that coalition, who have explored dispassionately the problems that exist in American labor management relations and who have called unequivocally for action to correct the injustices they see.

More than 100 law professors from 52 law schools are members of Americans for Justice on the Job, including such distinguished men as Joseph W. Bishop, Jr., and Eugene V. Rostow of Yale, Stephen B. Goldberg of Northwestern, Howard Lesnick of the University of Pennsylvania, and the past president of the Society of American Law Teachers.

Other academic leaders—more than 200 of them from 153 colleges and universities—include James MacGregor Burns of Williams College, Barry Commoner of Washington University, John Kenneth Galbraith of Harvard, Jeane Kirkpatrick of American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research, Arthur S. Link of Princeton, Seymour Martin Lipset of Stanford, James D. Barber of Duke, Henry R. Glick of Florida State, Daniel Bell of Harvard, the Reverend Andrew Greeley of the University of Chicago, Sidney Hook of the Hoover Institute at Stanford, Clark Kerr, former president of the University of California, Robert Lekachman of Lehman College, Wassily Leontif of New York University, the Reverend Donald W. Shriver, Jr., of Union Theological Seminary.

These are distinguished names, Mr. President, famous scholars in a wide range of disciplines, each of whom has earned a respectful hearing on social and public-policy issues.

There are many, many other Americans of equal stature who are universally recognized as leading figures in social thought and social action; civil rights leaders like Julian Bond; Benjamin Hooks of the NAACP, Vernon Jordan of the National Urban League, Coretta Scott King of the Martin Luther King Center for Social Change, Raul Yzaguirre of La Raza, Eleanor Smeal of the National Organization for Women, Dorothy Height of the National Council of Negro Women, Mildred Jeffrey of the National Women's Political Caucus, LaDonna Harris of Americans for Indian Opportunity, Gloria Steinem of Ms. Magazine.

There is Midge Decter of Basic Books, Ben Wattenberg, Msgr. George Higgins of the U.S. Catholic Conference, Rabbi Joseph B. Glaser of the Central Conference of American Rabbis, Luther Tyson of the United Methodist Church. There is Chesterfield Smith, past president of the American Bar Association, Robert R. Nathan of the National Consumers League, Max Kampelman of the legal firm of Fried, Frank, Harris, Shriver, Kampelman.

To further illustrate the breadth of support for labor law reform, let me point out that the objectives of Americans for Justice on the Job have been endorsed by more than 350 professional athletes and by the national players associations for baseball, basketball, football, hockey and soccer, as well as by the athletic directors or coaches of 80 colleges and universities.

More than 150 personalities of the stage, screen, and television have joined Americans for Justice on the Job, including such well known performers as Theodore Bikel, Lorne Greene, Charlton Heston, E. G. Marshall, Kathleen Nolan, Sylvester Stallone, Jean Stapleton, and Dennis Weaver.

Where, it might be asked, are the business and industrial leaders? That is a question that should be asked and should be answered. Thousands of employers in this country not only obey the law, recognize their employees' unions and negotiate fairly with them, but make speeches in praise of the collective bargaining system and the benefits it brings in terms of industrial harmony and stability to companies and workers alike.

Where are they now? Why are they not speaking up for fair play and justice? Why are they not publicly disassociating themselves from those firms with a history of wholesale violation of workers' rights?

Well, many of them are; not as many of them as should, but there are well over a thousand businesses and business executives who belong to Americans for Justice on the Job and who are publicly advocating passage of the Labor Law Reform Act.

Among them is Herbert Alper, president of the United Knitwear Manufacturers League and head of the Cornish Knitgoods Manufacturing Corp. of Brooklyn, N.Y. Others are Anthony Conticelli, president of the American Cloak and Suit Manufacturers Association; Aaron Feurenstein, president of the Malden Mills, Inc.; Arthur Krim, chairman of the board of United Artists; Bernard Rapoport, president of the American Income Life Insurance Co. of Waco, Tex.; Joseph Robbie, managing general partner of the Miami Dolphins; Carl Rosen, president of the Puritan Fashion Corp.; Adm. Elmo Zumwalt, president of the American Medical Buildings of Milwaukee, and Frank Baum, executive vice president of Wallace Security Agency, Inc., of Portland, Oreg.

I submit that these men and their thousand fellow-businessmen who support labor law reform are not wild-eyed revolutionaries or dreamy idealists. They are sober, fair-minded men of proven judgment who see the plain fact that America's basic labor law is in serious need of improvement—not drastic change, but modifications to make it work more smoothly, more quickly, and more equitably.

I think it is important that all of America's businessmen and businesswomen be aware that not all members of the business community subscribe to the views put forth by some business organizations to the effect that the labor law reform bill is a revolutionary instrument designed to turn the country over to labor bosses, to subject businessmen to harassment and bankruptcy at the hands of union organizers.

These charges are not true, and the business leaders I have named know they are not true. They are aware that the reform bill would not deprive any employer of any lawful right he now holds, that it would not confer any rights on workers that have not been guaranteed for 43 years. They know because they have read the bill and have understood it and are not panicked by phantom provisions that are not there.

Earlier, I named officials of several religious institutions as members of Americans for Justice on the Job, and I should like to emphasize that the governing bodies of their organizations—the Central Conference of American Rabbis, the U.S. Catholic Conference and Union Theological Seminary—have taken action putting the institutions themselves on record in support of labor law reform.

That is true also of the Board of Church and Society of the United Methodist Church, the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice; the National Coalition on Domestic Violence, the North Carolina Council of Churches, the Office for Church in Society of the United Church of Christ, the Religion and Race Council, the Synagogue Council of America and many other national and regional religious bodies.

These organizations and their members know the meaning of the verse from the Book of Micah which President Carter quoted in his Inaugural Address:

> . . . What does the Lord require of you but to do justice, and love kindness, and to walk humbly with your God?

They have brought their religious principles into their daily lives and into their social relationships and business relationships and employer-employee relationships.

In the same way, Americans for Justice on the Job has been joined by a number of organizations whose members are concerned with many aspects of the quality of life in America—conservationists, environmentalists, social action groups of all kinds. Among them are:

Americans for Democratic Action, American Jewish Committee, American Nurses Association, Inc., American Veterans Committee, Center for National Policy Review, Child Welfare League of America, Inc., Clamshell Alliance, Coalition for a Democratic Majority, Congress Watch, Environmentalists for Full Employment, Frontlash, Freedom from Hunger Foundation, Jewish Labor Committee, League for Industrial Democracy, National Association of Social Workers, National Coalition for Economic Justice, National Consumers League, National Council of Senior Citizens, National Education Association, National Farmers Union, New York Metropolitan Allstate Agents Association, SEA Alliance, Social Democrats, USA, Social Systems Intervention, Inc., Southerners for Economic Justice, The Children's Foundation, The Workmen's Circle, Urban Environment Conference, Veterans for Peace, Young Democrats.

Some of these are private-interest groups, some are social-welfare groups, some are "single-issue" advocates primarily interested in rather narrow causes. Why do they take the trouble to work for labor law reform?

They do it because they know that their own interests are intimately involved with the interests of their fellow man. They know that the fight for clean air and clean water loses its point in a poisoned social atmosphere. They do it because they care for human rights in all dimensions, and they know a human rights issue when they see one.

The same is true of the Nation's women's organizations. Women are workers, just as men are. They know that the most vital and most tenaciously defended source of injustice toward women is in our economic structure. They know that women have little chance of progress without written, enforcible guarantee like those in the equal rights amendment and in labor-management agreements that spell out equal pay, equal rights, equal opportunity for all workers of both sexes.

Having thought the matter through and studied the true issues, the following women's organizations have declared themselves unequivocally in support of labor law reform:

Black Women's Association, Inc., Club Unifiques, Coalition of Labor Union Women, Federally Employed Women, Inc., Iota Phi Lambda Sorority, National Association of Colored Women's Clubs, National Association of Media Women, National Council of Jewish Women, National Council of Negro Women, National Federation of Licensed Practical Nurses, Inc., National Organization for Women, National Women's Political Caucus, Women's Equity Action League, Women for Racial and Economic Equality, Women's Institute of International Relations, Women's International League for Peace and Freedom U.S. Section.

Finally, Mr. President, I want to draw your attention to the extraordinary number of civil rights and human rights organizations that have made labor law reform their own cause.

Racism, Mr. President, is a time-honored weapon of unfair employers who have used it in countless cases and in countless ways to divide and conquer working people.

Since 1964 and the passage of the Civil Rights Act, that weapon has lost its potency. And that is because the trade unions of America, led by George Meany, persuaded President Kennedy and the House and the Senate to make sure the bill included title VII, the Fair Employment Practices section, which forbids racial discrimination in hiring, in the workplace and in the union hall. I know of no other institution that has called for legislative sanctions to police itself and has demanded the force of law to undergird its own principles, in its own ranks, among its own members. But that is what the AFL–CIO did.

In testifying in favor of title VII, George Meany pointed out that economic rights are the fundamental rights that give force and meaning to all of our other rights. He said this:

Equal education has meaning only for those Negro youngsters whose parents can afford to keep them in school. Equal access to housing has meaning only for those who can afford to buy. Equality in places of public accommodation is relevant only for those with money to spend. So it seems to us in the AFL–CIO that the vital issue, the chief among equals, is jobs.

I believe that supporting labor law reform, the great minority group organizations are following Mr. Meany's argument exactly and taking it one step further. They are recognizing that civil rights and economic rights and job rights depend on yet another right: the right to join or organize a union, and the right to equal protection of the law.

And I think all of them will agree with me when I say that the Labor Law Reform Act is no less important to minority workers than the Civil Rights Act itself, and the Voting Rights Act and the Fair Housing Act. It guarantees the one right that gives meaning to our other rights.

And so I take great pride in naming the following organizations as members of Americans for Justice on the Job:

Americans for Indian Opportunity, American GI Forum of the United States, A. Philip Randolph Institute, Black Caucus—NEA, Black Illinois Legislative Lobby, Citizens United for Racial Equality, Congress of Italian American Organizations, Indianapolis Urban League, Inc., Italian American Labor Council, Japanese-American Citizens League, Labor Council for Latin American Advancement, Leadership Conference on Civil Rights, Martin Luther King Center for Social Change, National Association for Puerto Rican Civil Rights, National Association for the Advancement of Colored People, National Council of La Raza, National Council of Puerto Rican Volunteers, National Urban League, Southern Christian Leadership Conference.

Mr. President, I would like to present to my colleagues a handful of the comments made in support of labor law reform by some of those I have named.

Willard Wirtz, Secretary of Labor under Presidents Kennedy and Johnson:

The opposition to the Reform Act is being cast in terms of preserving this country's time-tested labor policies which properly seek to achieve a balance in labor-management relations. The organizations making this argument, and referring now in supportive terms to the Wagner Act of 1935, are those which opposed bitterly the establishment by Congress of that balance in labor-management relations. This is only a new verse of the same old song.

John T. Dunlop, Secretary of Labor in the Ford administration:

All seven former Secretaries of Labor support the objective of the reform bill. The objective is fair to managements and labor organizations who comply with the law without seeking to use administrative and judicial procedures against the purposes of the long-established national policy.

Vice President WALTER F. MONDALE:

If we can defend human rights around the world, as we are, we can protect the rights of American workers here at home. Any employer who cares to, and has enough money, can totally frustrate the law of the land. S. 2467 is not changing the law; we are not asking employers to do anything they are not required to do by law.

Eleanor Smeal of NOW, speaking of the thousands of documented cases of employer abuse of workers' rights:

I shudder to think of the thousands of cases that have gone unreported and of all those who wanted so badly to exercise their rights but opted not to out of the fear of coercion and intimidation that pervaded the workplace.

The National Organization of Women strongly believes in the institution of collective bargaining as one of the most effective means of bettering the lives of all American workers. We therefore . . . call upon Congress to examine the consequences of the NLRA and make the necessary changes to provide the currently non-existing equality in opportunity for all workers.

Audrey Rowe Colom of the National Women's Political Caucus:

Women comprise 46 percent of employees in retail trades, 80 percent of hospital workers, 46 percent in textile mills, 81 percent in the apparel trades, but only 28 percent of all manufacturing workers. A union closes the earnings gap between male and female workers. The labor law reform package will affect women in many service fields and industries where a high percentage of female employees correlates with a low incidence of unionization.

Eileen Thornton of Women's Equity Action League:

The reforms that we endorse do not change the "do's" and "don'ts" of established labor-management relationships. They merely insure that unorganized workers can freely exercise their rights and get prompt justice.

Olga Madar of the Coalition of Labor Union Women:

What good is a law if you see for yourself that other workers who exercise their "right" to a union get harassed or fired? We get many calls from women interested in joining a union. . . . And always one thing is very clear: fear; the fear of losing their jobs. They want secrecy. And for this to happen in a free society scares me.

Kermit J. Alexander of the NFL Players Association:

I was cut by Philadelphia after our strike in 1974 because of my position in the union. I watched the NLRB proceedings drag on through a 44-day hearing during the 1975 season. When the decision finally came out on June 30, 1976, it was good that we had finally exposed the illegal practices of the NFL, but the two years it took made it clear the NLRB was not the answer. Maybe I'm naive, but I though the NLRB was designed to promote industrial peace, not to create turmoil by rewarding those who violate the law.

Edward R. Garvey, executive director of the football player's organization:

The Board of Representatives of the NFLPA, comprising team representatives from each of the 28 NFL member clubs, has unanimously endorsed this legislation. The executive director of the Baseball Players Association, Marvin Miller; the executive director of the NBA Players Association, Larry Fleischer, and the executive director of the NHL Players Association have authorized me to state that they are also committed to passage of (S. 2467). The unions of all major sports in this country urge passage of this legislation.

Stephen B. Goldberg, professor of law at Northwestern University:

We support those provisions which would speed up the operations of the Board, particularly with regard to the prompt conduct of elections.

Howard Lesnick, professor of law at the University of Pennsylvania:

It seems a distressing thing in many ways that the climate of militancy in opposition escalates on tepid proposals like these, as if they were momentous reorientations of the law. They are not; they are minor adjustments.

The Journal of the American Bar Association:

If reform is passed and brings about more collective bargaining and less administrative maneuvering, with new penalties for attempted evasion of the law, lawyers for both sides may be expected to spend more time at the bargaining table and less time grinding through NLRB procedures.

Rev. Andrew M. Greeley, professor of sociology at the University of Chicago:

The National Labor Relations Act, designed to protect workers, has weaknesses and imperfections which management lawyers have been clever to exploit. Sometimes it takes five, six and even seven years to get an unfair labor practice charge processed. (The) reform bill before Congress would increase the efficiency of the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. President, I believe I have demonstrated that support for the Labor Law Reform Act is broad, deep, and well informed. and if there is a desire for further evidence I will be more than happy to supply it.

The American people are not misled by false and empty charges that the bill before us is unnecessary or in any sense unfair to either American workers or to law-abiding employers.

Mr. President, as my remarks make clear, I feel very strongly that, for the good of the country and for the future of decent labor-management relations, the Labor Law Reform Act should be enacted.

When he first came to the White House, President Carter studied the problem of labor-management relationships intensively. He found that in the vast majority of cases, they serve the public good. He found that the collective bargaining process has worked for America's benefit. But it was apparent, to him and to others, that our basic labor law is in serious need of improvement. Not drastic change, but modifications so that it will work smoothly, more quickly, more equitably. At present, the labor relations law is not working as well as it could and should.

It is because of the stories of many of our fellow citizens who have suffered injustice under our existing labor law that I agreed to serve as chairperson of Americans for Justice on the Job. For the same reasons, I will vote for passage of the labor law reform bill.

The Senate will have spent many days in full and free debate on this legislation. Obviously, there must be reasonable and searching debate on this issue. Many Members of the Senate, myself included, have never participated in a full-scale examination of how the Nation's labor relations law has deteriorated in the last 42 years.

However, the proponents of delay may want to continue to talk in the hopes of keeping the Senate from ever voting on this matter.

When this time comes, I will support a move for cloture, because I am proud to be a friend of America's workers and a supporter of a President who believes in and who fights for human rights at home as well as abroad.

I believe that we are going to be victorious in this fight for social justice because our cause is good and because the future of so many depend so completely on us. I am confident that the Senate will recognize the case for justice as clearly and decisively as do the vast majority of Americans. And I am convinced that my colleagues will vote overwhelmingly for this vital legislation to provide justice on the job for all Americans.

Mr. President, I ask that a partial list of supporters of this important legislation be printed at this point in the RECORD.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The second assistant legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President I ask unanimous consent that the order for the quorum call be rescinded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, there are several nominations cleared. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate go into executive session to consider the nominations on the Executive Calendar beginning with New Reports on page 2.

I ask the distinguished acting Republican leader if all nominations have been cleared on his side beginning with New Reports.

Mr. STEVENS. The distinguished majority leader is correct, Mr. President. All of the nominations commencing, as I understand it, with Calendar No. 154, have been cleared.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I thank the distinguished Senator.

I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the nominations following New Reports be considered en bloc.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are considered and confirmed en bloc.

The nominations considered and confirmed en bloc are as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE

Gen. David C. Jones, U.S. Air Force, to be Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, serving in the grade of general.

U.S. AIR FORCE

Gen. Lew Allen, Jr., U.S. Air Force, to be Chief of Staff of the U.S. Air Force.

Lt. Gen. Howard M. Fish, [redacted], U.S. Air Force, for appointment as indicated, to be Senior U.S. Air Force member of the Military Staff Committee of the United Nations.

Brig. Gen. Paul R. Day, [redacted], Air National Guard of the United States, to be major general.

Brig. Gen. Richard L. Frymire, Jr., [redacted], Air National Guard of the United States, to be major general.

Brig. Gen. James C. Smith, [redacted], Air National Guard of the United States, to be major general.

Col. LeRoy R. Bartman, [redacted], Air National Guard of the United States, to be brigadier general.

Col. Ronald E. Chytraus, [redacted], Air National Guard of the United States, to be brigadier general.

Col. Bobby W. Hodges, [redacted], Air National Guard of the United States, to be brigadier general.

Col. Leslie D. Kampschror, [redacted], Air National Guard of the United States, to be brigadier general.

Col. Irvin G. Ray, [redacted], Air National Guard of the United States, to be brigadier general.

U.S. ARMY

Col. Kermit Douglas Johnson, [redacted], U.S. Army, to be brigadier general.

Gen. Walter Thomas Kerwin, Jr., [redacted] (age 60), Army of the United States (major general, U.S. Army), to be general.

Lt. Gen. Allen Mitchell Burdett, Jr., [redacted] (age 56), Army of the United States (major general, U.S. Army), to be lieutenant general.

Maj. Gen. William Burns Caldwell III, [redacted], Army of the United States (major general, U.S. Army), to be lieutenant general.

Lt. Gen. CJ Le Van, [redacted] (age 55), Army of the United States (major general, U.S. Army), to be lieutenant general.

U.S. NAVY

Adm. Thomas Bibb Hayward, U.S. Navy, to be Chief of Naval Operations.

Rear Adm. Sylvester R. Foley, Jr., U.S. Navy, to be vice admiral.

U.S. MARINE CORPS

Maj. Gen. Edward J. Miller, [redacted], U.S. Marine Corps, to be lieutenant general.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE

Donald W. Banner, of Illinois, to be Commissioner of Patents and Trademarks.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE

Nancy Ostrander, of Indiana, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of Surinam.

Richard F. Kneip, of South Dakota, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Republic of Singapore.

Richard W. Murphy, of Maryland, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the Philippines.

Terence A. Todman, of the Virgin Islands, to be Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America to Spain.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION, UNITED STATES AND CANADA

Kenneth M. Curtis, of Maine, to be Commissioner on the part of the United States on the International Joint Commission, United States and Canada.

INTER-AMERICAN FOUNDATION

Arnold Nachmanoff, of Virginia, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Inter-American Foundation.

Alberto Ibarguen, of Connecticut, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Inter-American Foundation.

Peter Taylor Jones, of California, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Inter-American Foundation.

Carolyn R. Payton, of the District of Columbia, to be a member of the Board of Directors of the Inter-American Foundation.

Nominations placed on the secretary's desk in the Air Force, Army, Navy and Marine Corps.

● Mr. MUSKIE. Mr. President, I am pleased to support the nomination of Kenneth Curtis to the International Joint Commission, United States and Canada. Governor Curtis began his public career as an aide to former Congressman Jim Oliver. He has since served as Maine's Secretary of State, Governor of Maine and chairman of the Democratic National Committee. Four years after he left the Governor's office, he remains the most popular public figure in Maine.

Governor Curtis is uniquely qualified to serve as a Commissioner on the International Joint Commission. During his 8 years as Governor, he established an excellent relationship between Maine and our neighboring provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick. He created an Office of Canadian Affairs to facilitate communications with the provincial and Federal Governments of Canada. The Governor met regularly with the premiers of the Maritime Provinces to discuss matters of mutual concern. But, perhaps most important, Ken Curtis brings to this office his great ability, his imagination and his compassion.

I might add, Mr. President, that many of us in Maine share not only a border, but a common heritage with our Canadian neighbors. For this reason, I believe it is particularly appropriate that a former Governor of Maine, and a very able one, be appointed to this position. It is an excellent appointment and I commend the committee for voting favorably on it. ●

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that it be in order to move en bloc to reconsider the vote by which the nominees were confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. I so move.

Mr. JAVITS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the President be immediately notified of the confirmation of the nominations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate return to legislative session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ROUTINE MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there now be a period for the transaction of routine morning business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Chirdon, one of his secretaries.

MESSAGES FROM THE HOUSE

At 9:02 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Berry, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has passed the following bills, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 11777. An act to authorize and direct the Secretary of Agriculture to provide cooperative forestry assistance to States and others, and for other purposes;

H.R. 11778. An act to authorize and direct the Secretary of Agriculture to carry out forest and rangeland renewable resources research, to provide cooperative assistance for such research to States and others, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 11779. An act to provide for an expanded and comprehensive extension program for forest and rangeland renewable resources.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

At 10:28 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Berry, announced that the Speaker has signed the following enrolled bills:

S. 2370. An act to remove the limitation on the amount authorized to be appropriated under the Volunteers in the National Forests Act of 1972;

H.R. 9005. An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of said District for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 11662. An act to provide for the establishment of the Lowell National Historical Park in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and for other purposes.

The enrolled bills were subsequently signed by the President pro tempore.

At 11:58 a.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Berry, announced that the House has agreed to the following concurrent resolution, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H. Con. Res. 634. A concurrent resolution providing for an adjournment of the House from May 25 to May 31, 1978, and a recess of the Senate from May 26 to June 5, 1978.

At 4:13 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Berry, announced that the House has passed the following bill, with an amendment in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

S. 2553. An act to authorize appropriations for the fiscal year 1979 for certain maritime programs of the Department of Commerce, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the House has passed the following bills, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate:

H.R. 8535. An act to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to the treatment of amounts paid to relatives for purposes of the credit for expenses for household and dependent care services necessary for gainful employment; and

H.R. 11370. An act to authorize an appropriation to reimburse certain expenditures for social services provided by the States prior to October 1, 1975, under titles I, IV–A, VI, X, XIV, and XVI of the Social Security Act.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED

The following bills were read twice by their titles and referred as indicated:

H.R. 8535. An act to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to the treatment of amounts paid to relatives for purposes of the credit for expenses for household and dependent care services necessary for gainful employment; to the Committee on Finance.

H.R. 11779. An act to provide for an expanded and comprehensive extension program for forest and rangeland renewable resources; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED

The Secretary of the Senate reported that on today, May 24, 1978, he presented to the President of the United States the following enrolled bill:

S. 2370. An act to remove the limitation on the amount authorized to be appropriated under the Volunteers in the National Forests Act of 1972.

INTRODUCTION OF BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

The following bills and joint resolutions were introduced, read the first time and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as indicated:

By Mr. DOLE:

S. 3137. A bill to prohibit public coursing in the United States; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

By Mr. HART:

S. 3138. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide for the indexation of individual income tax brackets, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. JAVITS:

S. 3139. A bill to amend the National Labor Relations Act to give the employers and performers in the performing arts the same rights given by section 8(f) of such act to employers and employees in the construction industry; to the Committee on Human Resources.

By Mr. BENTSEN:

S. 3140. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide for the treatment of defined contribution retirement plans funded exclusively by employer IRA contributions; to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. HATHAWAY:

S. 3141. A bill entitled the "Fair Labor Pension Practices Act of 1978"; to the Committee on Human Resources.

S. 3142. A bill entitled the "Pension Protection Act of 1978"; to the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Human Resources, jointly, by unanimous consent.

STATEMENTS ON INTRODUCED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS

By Mr. DOLE:

S. 3137. A bill to prohibit public coursing in the United States; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

(The remarks of Mr. DOLE when he introduced the bill appear elsewhere in today's proceedings.)

By Mr. HART:

S. 3138. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide for the indexation of individual income tax brackets, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Finance.

INDEXING THE TAX CODE

● Mr. HART. Mr. President, inherent in the present tax code is a hidden inflation tax, a perverse, automatic response to the rising cost of living. In every year that Congress does not legislate a tax reduction, inflation pushes people into higher tax brackets, even though they may have no increase in their real income. As their tax burden grows, they have less to spend, and worse, less to save and invest.

The income tax today does not distinguish between that part of a wage increase which is merely a cost-of-living adjustment and that part which goes beyond the cost-of-living and is a real increase. Accordingly, any increase in wages is taxed at higher and higher rates, whether it reflects a meaningful increase in real income, or only a cost-of-living adjustment. The argument that this automatic response of the tax code to inflation can always be offset by careful discretionary policy is, in the light of recent experience, clearly unpersuasive.

Indexing the tax code represents the most effective way to remedy this situation. Indexing automatically corrects the income tax system to prevent inflation from pushing taxpayers into higher and higher tax brackets. An inflation indexed tax system would prevent inflation from producing an increase in a taxpayer's liability, when the taxpayer has had no increase in real income.

The inflation penalty in the present tax code reaches every segment of our society, but ironically, it is the low income wage earner who is hardest hit. The low income wage earner is most affected in percentage terms because he is a victim of rapid escalation of the tax brackets which are narrow at the low end of the scale. In addition, the hidden inflation tax is one of the basic causes behind inflationary wage demands, since a worker must receive a wage increase in excess of the cost of living increase, simply to maintain the real value of his take-home pay.

Congress should act to prevent inflation from increasing the average American's tax bill when there has been no real increase in his income. It is fundamentally wrong for the U.S. Treasury to be reaping a windfall in increased revenues each year, without ever having to enact a tax bill that the President must sign. The hidden tax increase escapes unnoticed by the public and the press, and is a dramatic example of taxation without legislation. The Federal Government will continue to take advantage of this destructive economic phenomenon unless Congress acts now.

The legislation I am introducing today will index the income tax brackets and the standard deduction, in proportion to the rate of inflation. It is designed to halt the bracket creep which occurs as cost-of-living raises, which are meant to maintain a worker's purchasing power in the face of inflation, push him into a higher tax bracket. The result of this proposal will be a tax system that is more fair and equitable due to the elimination of the tax increases now caused by rising price levels. This proposal constitutes a fair and meaningful tax adjustment for every American.

Unlike most tax reforms, my proposal is much more than an isolated incentive to a particular segment of the economy or special interest group. Indexing will minimize the effects of inflation on the taxes paid by all Americans. It will increase disposable income and encourage both consumption and investment, thereby assuring a healthier economy.

Mr. President, I offer my proposal as a sound beginning toward the principle that our tax system should tax real, not nominal income. This proposal will apply to taxable years 1979 through 1981.

It is, in a sense, an experimental program, one that will offer both Congress and the American people an opportunity to evaluate the merits of the indexing concept. The legislation also directs the Council on Wage and Price Stability to conduct a study of the impact of the proposal and to report to the President and to Congress, not later than July 1, 1982, the results of such study together with its recommendations concerning the continuation of indexing the individual income tax brackets.

Indexing tax brackets may only be the first step toward eliminating the hidden tax burden caused by inflation. Surely, it is a fair and rational place to begin. Once we have established the principle that taxpayers should not be subject to the nonlegislated tax increases that are caused by inflation, we may find merit in indexing other relevant provisions of our tax laws. My proposal will allow us an opportunity to examine and explore the benefits of an indexed tax code. At the same time it will provide a well-deserved break to the American taxpayer who has been the victim of rapidly increasing inflation in recent years.

Mr. President, I would like to take this opportunity to discuss a few of the important questions that have been asked about indexing the tax code.

(1) WHAT IS THE RELATIONSHIP BETWEEN INFLATION, PERSONAL INCOME, AND INCOME TAX RATES?

As inflation increases the cost of living, an individual's income must also increase, if that individual is to continue to buy the same goods and services. As the income level rises, however, the taxpayer must pay a higher tax despite the fact that the increased income was due to a cost-of-living adjustment to compensate for the rate of inflation, rather than a real increase in personal income.

(2) HOW WILL INDEXING MITIGATE THE EFFECT OF INFLATION OF PERSONAL INCOME?

The proposal I am introducing today automatically corrects the income tax system to prevent inflation from pushing taxpayers into higher and higher tax brackets. It establishes a procedure that widens all tax brackets by a proportion equal to the rate of inflation. This has the effect of holding the real value of the tax brackets constant and prevents taxpayers from moving from one bracket to another unless their real incomes have changed.

Indexing does not promise to end or even diminish inflation although it might help. It does promise, however, that no increased tax burden will be placed upon the American taxpayer without legislation enacted by Congress.

(3) HOW DOES THE PROPOSAL WORK?

Immediately following September 30 and prior to December 1 of each year, the Secretary of Labor will report to the Secretary of Treasury the average rate of increase in prices which occurred during the four previous quarters ending on September 30. Each dollar amount in the tax brackets shall be increased by this percentage increase in the price level and this rate structure will apply for the following calendar year. Such a procedure will keep effective tax rates on real taxable income constant. Because the standard deduction is included as a zero bracket amount in the tax rate schedules, this change will automatically index the standard deduction as well.

(4) WHY NOT INDEX OTHER RELEVANT PROVISIONS OF OUR TAX LAWS?

Although the idea of indexing is not a new one, its application in this country has not yet been tried. It has been successfully employed on a limited basis in other nations such as Canada and Brazil, but the dynamics of every country's economy are different. It seems logical, therefore, that we begin by establishing a simple, modest approach which will offer both Congress and the American people an opportunity to evaluate indexing on its merits. It is for this reason that my proposal focuses on taking the first step of indexing the tax brackets.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that both the bill and an analysis prepared by the Library of Congress concerning the estimated tax liability of an average family for the years 1978 to 1985 under current law and my indexing proposal, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and analysis were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3138

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That (a) section 1 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to tax imposed) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) Cost-of-living Adjustment.—

"(1) IN GENERAL.—Immediately following September 30 and prior to December 1 of each year, the Secretary of Labor shall report to the Secretary of the Treasury the ratio which the price index for the 4 consecutive calendar quarters ending September 30 of that year bears to the price index, for the base period. Each dollar amount in the tables under subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) under the heading 'If the taxable income is' shall be increased by an amount equal to such dollar amount multiplied by such ratio and, as so increased, shall be the amount in effect for taxable years beginning in the calendar year following the calendar year in which such report is made.

"(2) AMOUNT OF TAX.—The Secretary shall adjust each dollar amount in the tables under subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) under the heading 'The tax is' to reflect the changes made under paragraph (1).

"(3) DEFINITIONS.—For purposes of paragraph (1)—

"(A) the term 'price index' means the average of the relevant 4 consecutive calendar quarters of the Consumer Price Index (all items—United States city average) published monthly by the Bureau of Labor Statistics; and

"(B) the term 'base period' means the 4 consecutive calendar quarters ending September 30 of the calendar year preceding the Secretary of Labor's report.".

(b)(1) Section 63 of such Code (relating to the definition of taxable income) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(i) ADJUSTMENT FOR CHANGES IN BRACKET AMOUNTS.—Prior to the beginning of each calendar year, the Secretary shall, after adjusting each dollar amount listed in the tables under subsections (a), (b), (c), and (d) of section 1, as provided in section 1(f), adjust each dollar amount in subsection (d) to reflect the adjustments made under section 1(f) which are to be in effect for taxable years beginning in such calendar year.".

(2) Subparagraph (B) of section 3402(m)(1) of such Code (relating to withholding allowances based on itemized deductions) is amended—

(A) by striking out "$3,200" and inserting in lieu thereof "the dollar amount in effect under section 63(d)(1)"; and

(B) by striking out "$2,200" and inserting in lieu thereof "the dollar amount in effect under section 63(d)(2)".

(3) Subparagraph (C) of section 402(e)(1) of such Code (relating to imposition of a separate tax on lump-sum distributions) is amended by striking out "$2,200" and inserting in lieu thereof "the dollar amount in effect under section 63(d)(2)".

(4) Section 6012(a)(1) of such Code (relating to persons required to make returns of income) is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subparagraph:

"(D) Each time an adjustment is made under section 63(i) with respect to any dollar amount under section 63(d), the Secretary shall adjust each dollar amount under subparagraph (A) to correspond to such adjustments and such amount, as adjusted and rounded to the nearest $1, shall be the amount in effect under such subparagraph for taxable years beginning in any calendar year with respect to which such adjustment is in effect under section 63.".

SEC. 2. Section 3402(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 (relating to tax withheld) is amended by adding before the last sentence thereof the following new sentence: "The tables prescribed under this section shall be adjusted in accordance with section 1(f) with respect to the wages paid in the year following the Secretary of Labor's report under such section.".

SEC. 3. The Council on Wage and Price Stability shall conduct a study of the impact of the amendments made by the first section of this Act and shall report to the President and the Congress, not later than July 1, 1982, the results of such study together with its recommendations including recommendations for continuing the indexation of individual income tax brackets.

SEC. 4. The amendments made by the first section of this Act shall apply with respect to taxable years beginning after December 31, 1978, and before January 1, 1982, except that the first report required to be made under section 1(f) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 shall be made in calendar year 1978. The amendment made by section 2 shall apply with respect to wages paid after December 31, 1979, and before January 1, 1982.

By Mr. JAVITS:

S. 3139. A bill to amend the National Labor Relations Act to give the employers and performers in the performing arts the same rights given by section 8(f) of such act to employers and employees in the construction industry; to the Committee on Human Resources.

PERFORMING ARTISTS FAIR REPRESENTATION ACT OF 1978

● Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to amend the National Labor Relations Act to give employers and performers in the live theater rights similar to those given by the act to employers and employees in the construction industry.

Mr. President, in 1959 the Congress recognized—with bipartisan support—that there are some industries in which the labor force is so transient on a particular job that the ordinary delays inherent in collective bargaining might make labor negotiations practically impossible. This was found to be particularly true in the construction industry, characterized by casual employment patterns and the need for a highly skilled work force. Accordingly, the Congress wisely permitted construction unions and construction companies to sign contracts before a particular construction job got underway—thereby permitting the contractor to know his labor costs and availability in advance and allowing the union to negotiate collective-bargaining agreements without engaging in work stoppages that could be disastrous to the construction project. The construction industry proviso to section 8(f) of the act has served that industry well in the years since its enactment as part of the 1959 Landrum-Griffin amendments.

The very same conditions exist in the theater. Live theatrical productions often last no longer than construction jobs. In the theater, as in construction, a 30-day delay in the effectiveness of a union security agreement could completely undermine union security. And a strike on opening night would be a disaster for all concerned. Accordingly, it is my view that the live theater is entitled to the same treatment we have previously given construction unions—at least in the two respects I have just mentioned.

In 1959 the theater was not included with the construction industry because at that time the live theater and its workers were not clearly subject to the coverage of the National Labor Relations Act due to the largely local nature of its activities. When it began to appear that the Labor Relations Board might extend its jurisdiction to performing artists in 1966, I introduced a similar bill to provide equivalent treatment to the performing arts as already provided to the construction industry. That bill, S. 3794, was supported by both representatives of performing artists and by the major theater owners organizations. Both the performing artists and theater management have again joined in support of the bill I introduce today.

The theatrical industry has grown in stature since 1959. Our public support for the arts and a renewed interest among the public all across the country have spawned a great expansion in theater productions. A rigid application of the National Labor Relations Act, as it now exists, to the theater industry would, in a short time, destroy bargaining relationships that have existed for decades and which have served the industry and its performers well. It has therefore become a matter of some urgency that the Congress bring the theater within the mainstream of the nation's labor relations statute so that it may operate in fact and in law within its ambit. All that the bill would accomplish would be to legitimize existing patterns of labor-management relations for performing artists in the live theater.

This bill would permit unions and employers in the performing arts, just as is now the case for construction unions and construction contractors, first, to sign "prehire agreements," which may become effective before a representative number of employees has been hired, and second, to include in such agreements union security provisions effective after 7 days of employment, in contrast to the 30-day period customary in other industries.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the text of this bill, together with the text of letters from both labor and management, supporting its enactment be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and material were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 3139

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Performing Artists Fair Representation Act of 1978."

SEC. 2. Section 8(f) of the National Labor Relations Act is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(f)", and by adding the following subparagraph (2) at the end of subsection (f):

"(2) It shall not be an unfair labor practice under subsections (a) and (b) of this section for an employer (other than an employer in the broadcasting or motion picture industries) engaged primarily in the performing arts to make an agreement covering employees engaged (or who, upon their employment, will be engaged) in the performing arts with a labor organization of which performing artists are members (not established, maintained, or assisted by any action defined in section 8(a) of this Act as an unfair labor practice) because (1) the majority status of such labor organization has not been established under the provisions of section 9 of this Act prior to the making of such agreement, or (2) such agreement requires as a condition of employment membership in such labor organization after the seventh day following the beginning of such employment or the effective date of the agreement, whichever is later: Provided, That nothing in this subsection shall set aside the final proviso of section 8(a)(3) of this Act: Provided further, That any agreement which would be invalid, but for clause (1) of this subsection, shall not be a bar to a petition filed pursuant to section 9(c) or 9(e).".

ACTORS' EQUITY ASSOCIATION,
May 1, 1978.

Hon. JACOB K. JAVITS,
Russell Senate Office Building,
Washington D.C.

DEAR SENATOR JAVITS: As the Senate moves toward consideration of various labor law reform proposals, I hope you will urge upon your colleagues the provisions of a bill you first introduced in 1966 (S. 3794), which amends the NLRA so that appropriate consideration is given the special needs of the arts and entertainment industry.

I regard this matter as unfinished business which the Congress probably should have addressed in 1959. At that time the Congress amended Section 8(f) to acknowledge the casual nature of employment in the construction industry and the need for the stability that pre-hire contracts afford to both management and labor when the life of many projects are short-lived. The same conditions prevail in the live performing arts. Employment is casual and usually of short duration. Thirty day union security provisions are totally inappropriate in such a situation. Because theatrical enterprises are often short-lived there is great need for employing organizations to know—in advance of commencing operations—exactly what their labor costs will be. A dispute on opening night would be a disaster for all concerned—artists, employers and audiences. Hence, the pre-hire contract is not only desirable but a necessity.

When Section 8(f) was amended in 1959 to provide for 7 day union security provisions and pre-hire contracting in the construction industry, the performing arts should have been included because the same conditions as exist in the construction industry also exist in the theatre and other arts and entertainment areas. I believe the main reason they were not then included was because such activities were generally considered to be intra-state rather than interstate and beyond the pale of the NLRA. Since then, the growth of the live performing arts has placed many such activities plainly within the scope of the NLRA. Unfortunately, this law, drafted with more typical labor relations patterns in mind fits employer and employee alike in the unique arts and entertainment industry like a badly tailored suit of clothes. Unless changed, I strongly fear the application of the NLRA to this industry will create great confusion and instability thus undermining the major purpose of the law.

As you know, the need to address the special situation of the live arts and entertainment industry now was expressed by me and by others in statements submitted as part of the hearings on labor law reform conducted by your committee last winter. Support for the legislation I urge you to seek was also stated by the League of New York Theatres and Producers, Inc., and the National Association of the Legitimate Theatre, Inc., the major organizations of employers of theatre performers.

Employer and employee, management and union are united in their desire to see the NLRA amended so that the performing arts can live comfortably and prosper within its ambit.

Needless to say, we all deeply appreciate your concern for the well being of the artist, a concern which you have so consistently demonstrated. We are certain you recognize the urgency prompting our request for this amendment.

Sincerely,

THEODORE BIKEL,
President.

THE LEAGUE OF NEW YORK
THEATRES AND PRODUCERS, INC.,
New York, N.Y., May 19, 1978.

Hon JACOB K. JAVITS,
U.S. Senate, Committee on Human Resources,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR JAVITS: By means of this letter I wish to convey to the subcommittee the views of The League of New York Theatres and Producers, Inc. and the National Association of the Legitimate Theatre, Inc. with respect to H.R. 3383 to amend the National Labor Relations Act to give employers and performers in the performing arts rights similar to those given by Section 8F of the Act to employers and employees in the construction industry.

The League of New York Theatres and Producers, Inc. is the association representing Broadway theatrical producers and theatre owners in New York, and the National Association of the Legitimate Theatre, Inc. is an association of the leading producers and theatre owners throughout the United States. I am the Executive Director of both associations.

The League of New York Theatres and Producers, Inc. has represented theatrical employers in literally hundreds of negotiations with the theatrical unions. It is our firm impression that under the present provisions of the laws, the theatrical employee is well represented in labor negotiations and the unions have found no difficulty in seeking and obtaining representation.

Nonetheless, recognizing the fact that in many instances theatrical employment is of short duration and the existing provisions of the National Labor Relations Act may be considered impractical for such employment, our associations support amending Section 8(f) of the National Labor Relations Act to permit theatrical unions to execute prehire agreements with theatrical employers. Moreover, our associations support permitting the union shop provisions in theatrical contracts to be effective after seven days of employment in contrast to the minimum of 30 days presently provided by law. Both of these amendments to the existing law are incorporated in H.R. 3383, and we therefore support enactment of this bill.

We appreciate this opportunity to express our views on these pending bills. It is requested that these views be considered by the subcommittee and be made a part of the official hearings of the subcommittee.

Sincerely yours,

IRVING W. CHESKIN,
Executive Director.

By Mr. BENTSEN:

S. 3140. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 to provide for the treatment of defined contribution retirement plans funded exclusively by employer IRA contributions; to the Committee on Finance.

SIMPLIFIED PENSION PLAN ACT

● Mr. BENTSEN. Mr. President, I am today introducing the Simplified Pension Plan Act which would give smaller businessmen the option to create a greatly simplified retirement plan with very little paperwork or redtape. My bill would enable employers to establish a pension plan which combines the best features of the so-called Keogh or H.R. 10 plans for the self-employed with the best features of the individual retirement account (IRA). Under the proposal for a simplified pension plan, businessmen would make contributions up to the annual $7,500 Keogh limitation but these contributions would be made directly into separate individual retirement accounts for each employee. The minimum Keogh standards would apply.

This combination Keogh-IRA plan would be advantageous to both employers and employees. The businessman would not have to establish a separate trust fund for the company pension plan since the annual contributions will go directly into individual retirement accounts for the employees. This would substantially reduce paperwork and redtape. Employees would benefit from "portability" under this proposal since the employee could take his individual retirement account with him upon a change of jobs.

Mr. President, there has been a great deal of concern about the excessive paperwork and redtape that has resulted from the Employee Retirement Income Security Act (ERISA). As chairman of the Private Pension Subcommittee, of the Senate Finance Committee, I have been particularly disturbed that many good, smaller pension plans have terminated, because of unnecessarily complex reporting requirements, regulatory delays, and overlapping jurisdiction in the implementation of ERISA. Last year the Senate Finance Committee unanimously approved my Pension Requirements Simplification Act, S. 2352, which would help eliminate overlapping jurisdiction in the administration of ERISA and would insure that pension plans generally only have to file one Federal form each year. The legislation I am introducing today would further simplify ERISA, particularly for smaller businesses.

Prompt enactment of both S. 2352 and the legislation I am introducing today would help relieve businessmen from the regulatory burdens of ERISA. At the same time these two bills would insure that pension plan participants and beneficiaries continue to receive full protection from the minimum standards of ERISA.

Mr. President, I would now like to briefly describe how the optional "Simplified Pension Plan" would work.

Generally, the plan would operate in the same manner as a qualified defined contribution Keogh or H.R. 10 plan except that contributions would be made directly to the separate employee IRA's. The employer would have to provide coverage for all eligible employees. The maximum deductible contribution for the employer or employee would be the lesser of 15 percent of earned income or $7,500.

The existing standards for vesting, participation, nondiscrimination, and social security integration that apply to Keogh plans would also apply to "Simplified Pension Plans." For example, employees with 3 years of service must be allowed to participate in the plan. Immediate vesting would be required. The plan could not discriminate in favor of officers or highly compensated employees.

In addition, under my proposal, if the employer's pension contribution for an employee does not exceed the $1,500 IRA limitation, the employee could make up the difference.

Under the proposal, an employer could adopt an IRS prepared model simplified pension plan, copies of which would be filed with the IRS and distributed to the employees together with a copy of the IRA agreement. Individually designed plans could also obtain IRS approval. Existing reporting and disclosure standards would apply. However, the plan should be sufficiently simple that under existing regulations, a copy of the plan could be used as a summary plan description, bank statements (or similar documents furnished by an insurance company) should satisfy all applicable requirements regarding disclosure to participants of their interests in the plan. The employer would be required to file very simplified reports with IRS to support his deduction for plan contributions and the qualification of the simplified plan and no accounting for plan assets would be required.

Mr. President, the simplified pension plan would give businessmen the option to establish a pension plan with a minimum of paperwork and redtape. Prompt enactment of this legislation would be a constructive step toward reducing the regulatory burdens of ERISA.●

By Mr. HATHAWAY:

S. 3141. A bill entitled the "Fair Labor Pension Practices Act of 1978"; to the Committee on Human Resources.

S. 3142. A bill entitled the "Pension Protection Act of 1978"; to the Committee on Finance and the Committee on Human Resources, jointly, by unanimous consent.

● Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, I am introducing two legislative initiatives today in order to correct a major deficiency in pension guarantee provisions of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974.

ERISA, which was enacted September 2, 1974, provides for a comprehensive revision of pension plans and the rights of employees. For terminated pension plans, ERISA established the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation which provides guaranteed benefits to the plan participants. This guarantee applies with respect to plans which are terminated after September 2, 1974.

The plans which are covered by the PBGC include pension and welfare plans which meet the requirements of the Internal Revenue Code. Among those requirements are the establishment of a formal trust arrangement. The benefits afforded by the enactment of the PBGC is a great step in the protection of employees' hard-earned pension.

Mr. President, it has now come to my attention that there is an omission in the legislation which the Congress enacted in 1974. The issue has been raised in the context of Madison Paper Co., Madison, Maine.

The Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Mill in Madison, Maine, was initially built in 1891. The mill was operated by the Great Northern Paper Co. from the 1890's until 1955. In 1955, the mill was sold to Louis Calder, Sr., head of the Perkins-Goodwin Co. In the early 1960's, Louis Calder died and the mill was left to 11 charities.

Under the ownership of the 11 charities, the mill was renamed the Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Co. (KRPP). The Perkins-Goodwin Co. continued to manage and operate the facility for the charities. In 1971, the mill was sold to the Kennebec Development Corp., and Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Co. retained a lease-buy option on the mill.

In early 1973, the Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Co. was sold to the Southeastern Capital Corp., an investment group based in Atlanta, Ga.

On March 3, 1976, Penntech Papers, Inc., purchased KRPP from Southeastern Capital Corp. under a separate holding company, entitled T. P. Properties, Inc. The purchase entailed the acquisition of all personal property and rolling stock of the mill along with the transfer of a lease giving operating rights to the mill's fixed assets and real property. The title to the mill and associated woodlands remained in the possession of the Kennebec Development Corp. On March 29, 1977, Penntech closed the mill, laying off 330 employees.

The mill has now been reopened as the Madison Paper Co. and operates as a subsidiary of the Myllykoski Co. of Finland.

Mr. President, I have recounted this long and involved series of transactions because, while the companies transferred assets back and forth and reorganized, the ordinary employee was shortchanged.

When Penntech closed the mill in 1977, management had its pension benefits assured by PBGC; the union employees did not. How could this have happened?

The Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Co. had established two pension plans—a trusteed plan for salaried management and a nontrusteed, pay-as-you-go plan for the hourly union employees. In the negotiated labor agreement which was effective January 31, 1976, the following provision was included:

PENSIONS

The Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Company, Inc. Hourly Employees Pension Plan applicable to hourly employees, amended as necessary to comply with applicable ERISA requirements, shall be in effect during the term of this Agreement.

The pension plan was originally adopted and became effective April 15, 1968. The plan was as follows:

KENNEBEC RIVER PULP & PAPER COMPANY, INC., MADISON, MAINE

PENSION PLAN

Effective date:

This plan becomes effective April 15, 1968 and shall apply to all hourly employees on the payroll of the Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Company, Inc. as of October 4, 1961 and thereafter.

This is a non-contributing plan in that the entire expense shall be absorbed by the Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Company, Inc.

Eligibility:

Any employee on the Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Company, Inc. payroll as of October 4, 1961 or thereafter, who attains 15 years or more continuous service with the Great Northern Paper Company, The Economy Corporation and/or the Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Company, Inc. on or before the employees 65th birthday.

Amount of pension:

The Pension shall be computed as follows:

Effective April 15, 1963

A. 15 years of service, $25.00 per month.

B. 16 years but less than 36 years of service, $1.65 per month per year of service.

C. 36 years or more of service, $57.75 per month.

Effective April 15, 1969:

A. 15 years of service, $25,00 per month.

B. 16 years but less than 36 years of service, $1.70 per month per year of service.

C. 36 years or more of service, $59.50 per month.

Effective April 15, 1970:

A. 15 years of service, $25.00 per month..

B. 16 years but less than 36 years of service, $1.75 per month per year of service.

C. 36 years or more of service, $61.25 per month.

Normal retirement date:

Any employee who is eligible for pension in accordance with the provisions outlined above will retire on his 65th birthday and shall be paid on the first of each month following his retirement.

Disability retirement:

Any employee who becomes disabled prior to his 65th birthday and who would be eligible for pension on his 65th birthday under the provisions outlined above may be retired at the Company's option. In the event of such a disability retirement, the pension payable will be equal to the pension he would have been entitled to at the age of 65 times the ratio of the number of years of credited service to the number of years with which he would have been credited had he remained at work until the normal retirement date.

In order to qualify for any disability pension an employee must have had 10 years of continuous service.

A doctor's certificate shall be required to qualify for disability retirement and an annual physical examination may be required to continue receiving disability retirement benefits. Any physical examination required under this paragraph will be at Company expense.

Early retirement:

The requirements for early retirement shall be as follows:

A. An employee must be able to attain 15 years of continuous service at age 65.

B. Minimum retirement age 62.

Benefits to be computed as follows:

(1) Retirement benefits at age 64–93 percent of full earned pension

(2) Retirement benefits at age 63–85 percent of full earned pension

(3) Retirement benefits at age 62–79 percent of full earned pension

In all cases early retirement must be approved by the Company.

Length of service:

Any employee on the Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Company, Inc. payroll as of October 4, 1961 or thereafter, with 15 years or more of continuous service with the Great Northern Paper Company, The Economy Corporation and or the Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Company, Inc.

Insurance:

If an employee retires with at least 15 years of continuous service $1,500 of Group Life Insurance will be continued at no expense to the employee as provided under length of service.

The Company will pay to the employee $4.00 per month towards the Employees monthly premium for the Medical Insurance portion of Medicare.

In determining an employee's length of continuous service for the Insurance coverage, the continuous service with the Great Northern Paper Company, The Economy Corporation and or the Kennebec River Pulp & Paper Company, Inc. as provided under length of service will apply.

In 1975, the management sent the following memo to the hourly employees concerning their pension plan:

NOVEMBER 13, 1975.

To Hourly Employees.
From J. E. McLeod.
Subject: Pension Benefits.

The following Amendments to the Hourly Pension Plan were agreed to and effective on April 15, 1971. Since the current Pension Booklet does not include them, this notice should be inserted and retained in that booklet for your reference.

1. The normal retirement age for employees eligible for Pension will coincide with Social Security.

2. Pensions for employees having more than 15 years of service shall be computed at the rate of $1.75 for each year of eligible and continuous service—no maximum.

3. The Company shall, for the life of the Current Pension Agreement, pay the full cost of the Medical Insurance portion of Medicare.

JOHN E. MCLEOD,
Manager-Industrial Relations.

Management did not further amend the hourly plan and when Penntech closed the mill in 1977, the hourly employees were left without any guaranteed pension benefits. However, the plan covering management employees was covered by PBGC.

I have tried to obtain coverage for these employees through PBGC and the Labor Department. It has not been possible. I ask unanimous consent that correspondence and the answers from the agencies be included in the RECORD.

Mr. President, the bills I am introducing today will assure that this unfair and discriminatory labor practice cannot occur. It will redress the inequities at companies where the management is protected and the laborer left vulnerable. It is important legislation. It is urgently needed and I advise my colleagues that I will raise these issues during the debate on the labor reform bill.

In order that my colleagues may be informed about these bills, I ask unanimous consent that the texts be included in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the letters and bills were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
April 27, 1978.

Hon. WILLIAM D. HATHAWAY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HATHAWAY: This is in response to your letter of March 10, 1978, to Mr. John H. Fanning, Chairman, National Labor Relations Board, concerning the March 1977 closing of Kennebec River Paper and Pulp Mill, Madison, Maine, and the loss of hourly employee pension benefits due to failure of the company to establish a "qualified pension plan" pursuant to provisions of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 (ERISA). In his response to you, Chairman Fanning indicated your letter was being referred to the Secretary of Labor for consideration and further reply.

As you are aware, the Department of Labor shares responsibility with the Internal Revenue Service (IRS) and the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation (PBGC) for administration of ERISA. The purpose of the Act is to protect the interests of participants and their beneficiaries who depend on benefits from employee pension and welfare plans. The law establishes minimum plan participation, vesting, and funding standards for pension plans; requires disclosure of pension and welfare plan provisions and financial information; and, establishes standards of conduct for trustees and other parties serving in a fiduciary capacity with regard to employee pension and welfare plans.

Under the provisions of Title IV, ERISA, the PBGC is responsible for guaranteeing, within certain limits, pension benefits for plan participants who participate in a tax qualified defined benefit pension plan.

Under the provisions of Title I, ERISA, a plan sponsor may establish or continue to maintain a retirement plan, such as a profit sharing plan, which is not a defined benefit plan and thus is not within the jurisdiction of the PBGC. However, all pension plans, including plans not covered by the PBGC, must meet the minimum standards imposed by the Act.

Under the provisions of Section 502, Title I, ERISA, any individual who is a participant in an employee benefit plan subject to the provisions of Title I, ERISA, may bring a private civil action in an appropriate Federal District Court to halt and correct violations of Title I provisions, thus plan participants affected in such matters may obtain private legal counsel and seek recourse in their own behalf.

The Labor-Management Services Administration (LMSA) Boston Area Office is currently conducting a fiduciary investigation of the factual situation surrounding the hourly employees retirement plan maintained by the Kennebec River Pulp and Paper Company. The purpose of the investigation is to determine the current status of the plan and to determine if there are Title I, ERISA violations involving the plan. Contact has been made with PBGC to examine information regarding the plan obtained by that Office. In addition, copies of the attachments to your letter to Chairman Fanning are being provided to the Boston Area Office for review in the course of the investigation. Should your constituents obtain additional information regarding this matter they may wish to contact the LMSA Boston Area Office, located at Room 211, New Studio Building, 110 Tremont Street, Boston, Massachusetts 02108, telephone (617) 223–6736.

Until the LMSA Boston Area Office investigation is completed, the Department of Labor is not in a position to determine what, if any, action should be considered to correct and/or prohibit future occurrences similar to the Kennebec fact situation. You may be assured that upon completion of the investigation, the results will be reviewed in the light of ERISA and other applicable statutes, and that the Department will determine what action is to be taken consistent with is responsibility in administering these statutes.

I trust this information will be of assistance to you in replying to your constituents.

Sincerely,

FRANCIS X. BURKHARDT,
Assistant Secretary of Labor.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
July 27, 1977.

Hon. WILLIAM D. HATHAWAY,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HATHAWAY: This is in response to your letter dated and received on June 23, 1977, and subsequent telephone conversations with Ms. Cherri Sparks of your staff. You wrote on behalf of the terminated hourly employees and the pensioners of the Kennebec River Paper and Pulp Mill in Madison, Maine (Company). You requested that this Corporation keep you apprised of the development in this case.

As you know, Title IV of the Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974 established the Pension Benefit Guaranty Corporation to provide for timely and uninterrupted payment of pension benefits to participants of private pension plans covered under Title IV, and to guarantee certain basic benefits when such plans terminate.

As we understand the facts, the Company established an hourly pension plan in April, 1968. The benefits provided under this plan were paid out of company earnings and were not funded through a pension trust which is a principle requirement for a qualified plan under Section 401(a) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1974. The Company did not apply for a qualification of this plan with the Internal Revenue Service.

The Company also established a Retirement Plan for Salaried Non-Bargaining Employees of Kennebec River Pulp and Paper Company, Incorporated. This plan was qualified by the Internal Revenue Service.

Section 4021 of the Act sets forth the requirements for coverage by Title IV of the Act. Section 4021(a)(1) provides that plans which have in practice met the requirements for tax qualification, as in effect for the preceding five years of the plan, are covered by Title IV. Section 4021(a)(2) provides that a plan which is, or has been determined by the Secretary of the Treasury to be a plan which meets the requirement of Section 401 (a) or section 404(a)(2) of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 is covered by Title IV.

The hourly plan is an unfunded "pay as you go" plan. It has not been determined by the Secretary of Treasury to meet Section 401(a) or Section 404(a)(2) of the Code, nor does it in fact meet the requirements of those sections. In addition, it has not been tax qualified in practice for the five preceding plan years.

Accordingly, the Plan does not meet the requirements of Section 4021(a)(1) or Section 4021(a)(2) of the Act, and is therefore not subject to the guaranteed benefit provisions of Title IV of the Act.

Since the salary Plan was qualified by the Internal Revenue Service, this plan is covered under the provisions of Title IV of the Act. It is the Company's intent to terminate this plan in the very near future.

We hope this information will assist you in responding to your constituents.

Sincerely,

CAROL LERNI,
for JESSE L. PAREDES,
Branch Chief, Division of Plan Review.

REORGANIZATION PLAN NO. 2 OF 1978

Prepared by the President and transmitted to the Senate and the House of Representatives in Congress assembled, May 23, 1978, pursuant to the provisions of chapter 9 of title 5 of the United States Code.

PART I. OFFICE OF PERSONNEL MANAGEMENT

Section 101. Establishment of the Office of Personnel Management and its Director and Other Matters. There is hereby established as an independent establishment in the Executive Branch, the Office of Personnel Management (the "Office"). The head of the Office shall be the Director of the Office of Personnel Management (the "Director"), who "shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter provided for level II of the Executive Schedule. The position referred to in 5 U.S.C. 5109(b) is hereby abolished.

Section 102. Transfer of Functions. Except as otherwise specified in this Plan, all functions vested by statute in the United States Civil Service Commission, or the Chairman of said Commission, or the Boards of Examiners established by 5 U.S.C. 1105 are hereby transferred to the Director of the Office of Personnel Management.

Section 103. Deputy Director and Associate Directors.

(a) There shall be within the Office a Deputy Director who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and who shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter provided for level III of the Executive Schedule. The Deputy Director shall perform such functions as the Director may from time to time prescribe and shall act as Director during the absence or disability of the Director or in the event of a vacancy in the Office of the Director.

(b) There shall be within the Office not more than five Associate Directors, who shall be appointed by the Director in the excepted service, shall have such titles as the Director shall from time to time determine, and shall receive compensation at the rate now or hereafter provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule.

Section 104. Functions of the Director. The functions of the Director shall include, but not be limited to, the following:

(a) Aiding the President, as the President may request, in preparing such rules as the President prescribes, for the administration of civilian employment now within the jurisdiction of the United States Civil Service Commission;

(b) Advising the President, as the President may request, on any matters pertaining to civilian employment now within the jurisdiction of the United States Civil Service Commission;

(c) Executing, administering and enforcing the Civil Service rules and regulations of the President and the Office and the statutes governing the same, and other activities of the Office including retirement and classification activities except to the extent such functions remain vested in the Merit Systems Protection Board pursuant to Section 202 of this Plan, or are transferred to the Special Counsel pursuant to Section 204 of this Plan;

(d) Conducting or otherwise providing for studies and research for the purpose of assuring improvements in personnel management, and recommending to the President actions to promote an efficient Civil Service and a systematic application of the merit system principles, including measures relating to the selection, promotion, transfer, performance, pay, conditions of service, tenure, and separations of employees; and

(e) Performing the training responsibilities now performed by the United States Civil Service Commission as set forth in 5 U.S.C. Chapter 41.

Section 105. Authority to Delegate Functions. The Director may delegate, from time to time, to the head of any agency employing persons in the competitive service, the performance of all or any part of those functions transferred under this Plan to the Director which relate to employees, or applicants for employment, of such agency.

PART II. MERIT SYSTEMS PROTECTION BOARD

Section 201. Merit Systems Protection Board.

(a) The United States Civil Service Commission is hereby redesignated the Merit Systems Protection Board. The Commissioners of the United States Civil Service Commission are hereby redesignated as members of the Merit Systems Protection Board (the "Board").

(b) The Chairman of the Board shall be its chief executive and administrative officer. The position of Executive Director, established by 5 U.S.C. 1103(d), is hereby abolished.

Section 202. Functions of the Merit Systems Protection Board and Related Matters.

(a) There shall remain with the Board the hearing, adjudication, and appeals functions of the United States Civil Service Commission specified in 5 U.S.C. 1104(b)(4) (except hearings, adjudications and appeals with respect to examination ratings), and also found in the following statutes:

(i) 5 U.S.C. 1504–1507, 7325, 5335, 7521, 7701 and 8347(d);

(ii) 38 U.S.C. 2023

(b) There shall remain with the Board the functions vested in the United States Civil Service Commission, or its Chairman, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 1104(a)(5) and (b)(4) to enforce decisions rendered pursuant to the authorities described in Subsection (a) of this Section.

(c) Any member of the Board may request from the Director, in connection with a matter then pending before the Board for adjudication, an advisory opinion concerning interpretation of rules, regulations, or other policy directives promulgated by the Office of Personel Management.

(d) Whenever the interpretation or application of a rule, regulation, or policy directive of the Office of Personnel Management is at issue in any hearing, adjudication, or appeal before the Board, the Board shall promptly notify the Director, and the Director shall have the right to intervene in such proceedings.

(e) The Board shall designate individuals to chair performance rating boards established pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 4305.

(f) The Chairman of the Board shall designate representatives to chair boards of review established pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 3383 (b).

(g) The Board may from time to time conduct special studies relating to the Civil Service, and to other merit systems in the Executive Branch and report to the President and the Congress whether the public interest in a workforce free of personnel practices prohibited by law or regulations is being adequately protected. In carrying out this function the Board shall make such inquiries as may be necessary, and, to the extent permitted by law, shall have access to personnel records or information collected by the Office of Personnel Management and may require additional reports from other agencies as needed. The Board shall make such recommendations to the President and the Congress as it deems appropriate.

(h) The Board may delegate the performance of any of its administrative functions to any officer or employee of the Board.

(i) The Board shall have the authority to prescribe such regulations as may be necessary for the performance of its functions. The Board shall not issue advisory opinions. The Board may issue rules and regulations, consistent with statutory requirements, defining its review procedures, including the time limits within which an appeal must be filed and the rights and responsibilities of the parties to an appeal. All regulations of the Board shall be published in the Federal Register.

Section 203. Savings Provision. The Board shall accept appeals from agency actions effected prior to the effective date of this Plan. On the effective date of Part II of this Plan, proceedings then before the Federal Employee Appeals Authority shall continue before the Board; proceedings then before the Appeals Review Board and proceedings then before the United States Civil Service Commission on appeal from decisions of the Appeals Review Board shall continue before the Board; other employee appeals before boards or other bodies pursuant to law or regulation shall continue to be processed pursuant to those laws or regulations. Nothing in this section shall affect the right of a Federal employee to judicial review under applicable law.

Section 204. The Special Counsel.

(a) There shall be a Special Counsel to the Board appointed for a term of four years by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall be compensated as now or hereafter provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule.

(b) There are hereby transferred to the Special Counsel all functions with respect to investigations relating to violations of 5 U.S.C. Chapter 15; 5 U.S.C. Subchapter III of Chapter 73 (Political Activities); and 5 U.S.C. 552(a)(4)(F) (public information).

(c) The Special Counsel may investigate, pursuant to 5 U.S.C. 1303, allegations of personnel practices which are prohibited by law or regulation.

(d) When in the judgment of the Special Counsel, such personnel practices exist, he shall report his findings and recommendations to the Chairman of the Merit Systems Protection Board, the agency affected, and to the Office of Personnel Management, and may report such findings to the President.

(e) When in the judgment of the Special Counsel, the results of an investigation would warrant the taking of disciplinary action against an employee who is within the jurisdiction of the Board, the Special Counsel shall prepare charges against such employee and present them with supporting documentation to the Board. Evidence supporting the need for disciplinary action against a Presidential appointee shall be submitted by the Special Counsel to the President.

(f) The Special Counsel may appoint personnel necessary to assist in the performance of his functions.

(g) The Special Counsel shall have the authority to prescribe rules and regulations relating to the receipt and investigation of matters under his jurisdiction. Such regulations shall be published in the Federal Register.

(h) The Special Counsel shall not issue advisory opinions.

PART III. FEDERAL LABOR RELATIONS AUTHORITY

Section 301. Establishment of the Federal Labor Relations Authority.

(a) There is hereby established, as an independent establishment in the Executive Branch, the Federal Labor Relations Authority (the "Authority"). The Authority shall be composed of three members, one of whom shall be Chairman, not more than two of whom may be adherents of the same political party, and none of whom may hold another office or position in the Government of the United States except where provided by law or by the President.

(b) Members of the Authority shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The President shall designate one member to serve as Chairman of the Authority, who shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter provided for level III of the Executive Schedule. The other members shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter provided for level IV of the Executive Schedule.

(c) The initial members of the Authority shall be appointed as follows: one member for a term of two years; one member for a term of three years; and the Chairman for a term of four years. Thereafter, each member shall be appointed for a term of four years. An individual chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed for the unexpired term of the member replaced.

(d) The Authority shall make an annual report on its activities to the President for transmittal to Congress.

Section 302. Establishment of the General Counsel of the Authority. There shall be a General Counsel of the Authority, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate for a term of four years, and who shall be compensated at the rate now or hereafter provided for level V of the Executive Schedule. The General Counsel shall perform such duties as the Authority shall from time to time prescribe, including but not limited to the duty of determining and presenting facts required by the Authority in order to decide unfair labor practice complaints.

Section 303. The Federal Service Impasses Panel. The Federal Service Impasses Panel, established under Executive Order 11491, as amended, (the "Panel") shall continue, and shall be a distinct organizational entity within the Authority.

Section 304. Functions. Subject to the provisions of Section 306, the following functions are hereby transferred:

(a) To the Authority—

(1) The functions of the Federal Labor Relations Council pursuant to Executive Order 11491, as amended;

(2) The functions of the Civil Service Commission under Sections 4(a) and 6(e) of Executive Order 11491, as amended;

(3) The functions of the Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations, under Executive Order 11491, as amended, except for those functions related to alleged violations of the standards of conduct for labor organizations pursuant to Section 6(a)(4) of said Executive Order; and,

(b) to the Panel—the functions and authorities of the Federal Service Impasses Panel, pursuant to Executive Order 11491, as amended.

Section 305. Authority Decisions. The decisions of the Authority on any matter within its jurisdiction shall be final and not subject to judicial review.

Section 306. Other Provisions. Unless and until modified, revised, or revoked, all policies, regulations, and procedures established, and decisions issued, under Executive Order 11491, as amended, shall remain in full force and effect. There is hereby expressly reserved to the President the power to modify the functions transferred to the Federal Labor Relations Authority and the Federal Service Impasses Panel pursuant to Section 304 of this Plan.

Section 307. Savings Provision. All matters which relate to the functions transferred by Section 304 of this Plan, and which are pending on the effective date of the establishment of the Authority before the Federal Labor Relations Council, the Vice Chairman of the Civil Service Commission, or the Assistant Secretary of Labor for Labor-Management Relations shall continue before the Authority under such rules and procedures as the Authority shall prescribe. All such matters pending on the effective date of the establishment of the Authority before the Panel, shall continue before the Panel under such rules and procedures as the Panel shall prescribe.

PART IV. GENERAL PROVISIONS

Section 401. Incidental Transfer. So much of the personnel, property, records, and unexpended balances of appropriations, allocations and other funds employed, used, held, available, or to be made available in connection with the functions transferred under this Plan, as the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall determine, shall be transferred to the appropriate agency, or component at such time or times as the Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall provide, except that no such unexpended balances transferred shall be used for purposes other than those for which the appropriation was originally made. The Director of the Office of Management and Budget shall provide for terminating the affairs of any agencies abolished herein and for such further measures and dispositions as such Director deems necessary to effectuate the purposes of this Reorganization Plan.

Section 402. Interim Officers.

(a) The President may authorize any persons who, immediately prior to the effective date of this Plan, held positions in the Executive Branch of the Government, to act as Director of the Office of Personnel Management, the Deputy Director of the Office of Personnel Management, the Special Counsel, the Chairman and other members of the Federal Labor Relations Authority, the Chairman and other members of the Federal Service Impasses Panel, or the General Counsel of the Authority, until those offices are for the first time filled pursuant to the provisions of this Reorganization Plan or by recess appointment, as the case may be.

(b) The President may authorize any such person to receive the compensation attached to the Office in respect of which that person so serves, in lieu of other compensation from the United States.

Section 403. Effective Date. The provisions of this Reorganization Plan shall become effective at such time or times, on or before January 1, 1979, as the President shall specify, but not sooner than the earliest time allowable under Section 906 of Title 5, United States Code.●

SENATE RESOLUTION 465—SUBMISSION OF A RESOLUTION PROPOSING A TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND CANADA TO CONTROL TRANSBOUNDARY AIR POLLUTION

Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD (for himself, Mr. CHURCH, Mr. STEVENS, Mr. YOUNG, Mr. RIEGLE, Mr. STAFFORD, Mr. JACKSON, Mrs. HUMPHREY, Mr. MELCHER, Mr. NELSON, Mr. MOYNIHAN, Mr. GRAVEL, Mr. MAGNUSON, Mr. METZENBAUM, Mr. PROXMIRE, and Mr. ANDERSON) submitted the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

S. RES. 465

Whereas the United States and Canada share a common environment along a 5,500-mile frontier; and

Whereas the United States and Canada are both becoming increasingly concerned about the effects of pollution, particularly that resulting from power generation facilities, as each country's facilities affect the environment of the other; and

Whereas the United States and Canada have both subscribed to international conventions and joined in the environmental work of the United Nations, the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development, and other international environmental forums; and

Whereas the United States and Canada have entered into and implemented effectively the provisions of the historic Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909; and

Whereas the United States and Canada have a tradition of cooperative resolution of issues of mutual concern which is nowhere more evident than in the environmental area: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate that the Secretary of State should make every effort to negotiate a cooperative agreement with the Government of Canada aimed at preserving our mutual airshed so as to protect and enhance air resources and ensure the attainment and maintenance of air quality protective of public health and welfare.

SEC. 2. It is further the sense of the Senate that the Secretary of State, working in concert with other interested Federal agencies, as well as the affected States, should take whatever diplomatic actions appear necessary to reduce or eliminate any undesirable impact upon both countries resulting from air pollution from any source.

● Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I am today submitting a Senate resolution which would call upon the Governments of the United States and Canada to negotiate a treaty to control transboundary air pollution.

I am pleased to have as cosponsors a bipartisan array of Senators from States which border Canada and who share a deep concern about the maintenance of high air quality standards.

Mr. President, this resolution is being offered in the same spirit which has long characterized the cooperation between our two countries. With a border fully 5,500 miles long, we have a record of peaceful settlement of problems which is the envy of the world. Central to our success has been the willingness to spot potential problems in advance and to move forward to meet them in timely fashion.

If I may be permitted a personal note, I feel a special sense of responsibility in that my State of Montana borders on three Canadian Provinces—the only State to do so. We have long maintained cordial relations with British Columbia, Alberta, and Saskatchewan. Our mutual borders residents are good friends and neighbors. What affects the environment of one affects all. The same is true for residents the entire length of the border.

Currently, resolution of United States-Canadian transboundary environmental problems is governed by the Boundary Waters Treaty of 1909. As its name implies, the sole focus of the pact is on water—both quality and quantity. The treaty created the International Joint Commission, a body which has a distinguished history of settling water disputes, particularly with respect to allocation.

When the treaty was signed, no one could envision the future threat of air pollution. In the absence of a mechanism to deal with it, the International Joint Commission later created an International Air Pollution Advisory Board. However, the fact remains that neither the act nor the IJC's own rules of procedure mention air or air quality. Needed is a separate high-level forum for dealing with air problems.

The deficiency is highlighted by the growing nature of the threat. Principal cause for alarm is the return by both nations to coal as a major source of energy. There is considerable concentration of American industry along the border, with attendant problems for Canadian air. On the Canadian side, a string of coal-fired powerplants is either being expanded or constructed, ranging from the 300-megawatt plant to the Poplar River, 5 miles north of the Montana border, to the giant 4,000-megawatt Nanticoke complex under construction in southern Ontario. Additionally, there is the problem of increasing amounts of particulate matter settling in the Great Lakes, adding to pollution of those already troubled bodies of water.

Mr. President, there are a great many barriers—institutional and political—to achieving a binding agreement on air pollution. They include the special relationships between the States and Provinces and their respective central governments, as well as that between Ottawa and Washington. But solutions begin with first steps, and this legislation represents, in our opinion, a significant first step.

The resolution is not only a directive to the Secretary of State to press for a treaty; it is a special plea to all the Provinces and States, and to individual citizens who inhabit our mutual "airshed," to recognize the magnitude of the growing threat and to cooperate in our mutual best interests to meet that threat.●

NOTICES OF HEARINGS

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

● Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to give notice that a public hearing has been scheduled for Tuesday, June 6, 1978, at 9:30 a.m., in room 2228 Dirksen Senate Office Building, on the following nomination:

Shane Devine, of New Hampshire, to be U.S. district judge for the district of New Hampshire vice Hugh H. Bownes, elevated.

Any person desiring to offer testimony in regard to this nomination shall, not later than 24 hours prior to such hearing, file in writing with the committee a request to be heard and a statement of their proposed testimony.

This hearing will be before the full Judiciary Committee.●

SUBCOMMITTEE ON ADMINISTRATIVE PRACTICE AND PROCEDURE

● Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, I wish to announce that the Subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure of the Committee on the Judiciary, will have a meeting to continue markup of pending legislation. The meeting will be on May 24, 1978, at 10 a.m., 155 Russell Building.●

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY

● Mr. EASTLAND. Mr. President, on behalf of the Committee on the Judiciary, I desire to give notice that a public hearing has been scheduled for Wednesday, June 7, 1978, at 9:30 a.m., in room 2228 Dirksen Senate Office Building, on the following nominations:

Mary Johnson Lowe, of New York, to be U.S. district judge for the southern district of New York vice John M. Cannella, retired.

Philip B. Heymann, of Massachusetts, to be an Assistant Attorney General vice Benjamin R. Civiletti, elevated (Criminal Division).

Any persons desiring to offer testimony in regard to these nominations shall, not later than 24 hours prior to such hearing, file in writing with the committee a request to be heard and a statement of their proposed testimony.

This hearing will be before the full Judiciary Committee.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

AN ADVISORY OPINION

● Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, pursuant to title II, section 206, Senate Resolution 110, 95th Congress, the Senate Select Committee on Ethics has given formal approval to the following advisory opinion.

It is the opinion of the select committee that it is improper conduct which reflects upon the Senate for a Senator to authorize or allow a non-Senate individual, group, or organization to use the words "United States Senate" and "Official Business", or any combination thereof, on any letterhead or envelope. The use by a Senator of his or her own name followed by the words "United States Senate" is not hereby deemed improper.

This advisory opinion will become effective on Monday, August 14, 1978.●

WATERWAY USER FEES

● Mr. DANFORTH. Mr. President, I would like to submit for the record editorials which appeared on May 5 in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat and the St. Louis Post-Dispatch. Both editorials urge acceptance by the President of the Senate's recently passed version of the waterway user fee legislation—H.R. 8309. They make an eloquent case for compromise and reason.

The editorials follow:

GET GOING ON ALTON LOCKS

The Senate's 88 to 2 approval of an Alton Locks and Dam compromise supported by Missouri Sens. John C. Danforth and Thomas F. Eagleton should signal President Carter that his threatened veto defies logic.

The compromise worked out with the help of Louisiana's Sen. Russell B. Long appears to be as fair as could be expected. It would impose towboat diesel fuel taxes that eventually would total about $150 million a year in revenue. The administration is demanding still more than this, insisting on $30 million additional tolls to apply to construction costs of other waterway projects.

Sen. Danforth is justified in terming the threatened veto unreasonable. If the president sticks to his stubborn position there ought to be enough votes to override him.

Before a bill reaches the president's desk an agreement will have to be worked out between Senate and House conference committee members. Under the Danforth-Eagleton-Long formula the government would start collecting diesel taxes starting at 4 cents a gallon and rising to 12 cents after nine years. The House already has passed a bill calling for a maximum 6-cent tax. There should be no great obstacle to agreeing in conference to a figure somewhere between 6 and 12 cents.

The President ought to appreciate that the principle of user fees, which he sought, is firmly established in the Senate bill. There is plenty of room down the road for adjustment in the rate of taxation. Barge operators, who oppose user fees, are becoming reconciled to the inevitable. Railroads, desiring stiffer user fees on the waterways, should overcome their disappointment and drop objections to the project.

Replacement of Alton Locks and Dam 26 has been a vital necessity for years. Business groups, farm organizations and construction unions have been strong in support of the project, while environmentalists have opposed it. Even if final approval is forthcoming soon there could be a long delay in getting work under way because of court challenges.

The project is vital to the economic growth of mid-America, up the river and down the river.

Reasonable user fees that make barge operators pay their way are a sound approach toward insuring fair competition with railroads and trucks. Excessive taxes on the barges cannot be justified.

President Carter, presently on a trip to mend his political fences, ought to rethink his stand on the Alton dam proposal which is part of a $2.5 billion public works parcel. He could wind up a big loser if he makes the wrong move.

Get going on new Alton Locks and Dam!

LOCKS AND RIVER FEES

If President Carter is as determined to veto the new Alton dam and lock bill as Secretary of Transportation Adams says he is, the president is inviting unnecessary political trouble for himself and a disservice to river commerce and the Midwestern region it serves.

Mr. Carter may not be getting anything close to what he wants in the bill the House passed last year, which would impose an initial tax on barge line fuel of 4 cents a gallon and raise it to 6 cents in 1981. But on an 88-to-2 vote the Senate offered him a fair compromise between his demand and no riverways taxes at all.

This measure, pushed by Missouri's two senators, would authorize a new lock and dam at Alton and start user fees at 4 cents, raising them to 12 cents by 1985. It was the culmination of several Senate efforts at a compromise with the administration's original, unprecedented and untested idea that user fees ought to return to the government all its riverways' maintenance costs and half its capital expenditures.

On the way to a compromise, the administration also compromised somewhat. It supported a measure by Sens. Stevenson of Illinois and Domenici of New Mexico that was intended to require the barge industry to repay 10 percent of the costs of new construction projects on the river. The Senate rejected it, for good reasons.

The main one was that, since no user fees have ever been charged on America's waterways, no one can know what their effect will be on the barge lines, or on the region they serve and its shippers and consumers. The barge companies had estimated that the original administration concept of fees would amount to one-third of their gross revenues, which could prove ruinous.

The administration-backed compromise called on the Department of Transportation to study the imposed charges and develop a schedule of fees. This was putting the cart before the horse, as a dam proponent said, and so was making the single Alton project a hostage to a new fee system. In contrast, the Senate bill delays the fees until construction of the new lock and dam has begun, and it graduates the fees slowly enough so that the DOT can complete a study of their economic effects in time for Congress to review them.

After all, the administration concedes the need to replace the Mississippi River bottleneck known as Locks and Dam 26 at Alton, and even the barge lines concede the fairness of some user fee system to help pay, in effect, for their subsidized roadbeds. Most modes of transportation are subsidized, of course, but most also pay back some of the federal money. The issue is what is fair for the barge lines, and Congress will need some experience with the initial fee system to discover the answer.

If the administration is interested in establishing the precedent of riverways user fees, and interested at all in a new lock and dam at Alton, it ought to accept something like the Senate bill. That measure faces a conference committee, but it is closer to what Mr. Carter wants than the House bill. If, on the other hand, the administration insists on making the Alton project contingent on high barge line fees, the river system and the Midwest will get nothing, and if it vetoes the final congressional legislation, the administration is likely to get nothing. In an election year, a veto may well be overriden.

Somewhere along the line this administration ought to learn to recognize a rational compromise when it is offered one. Otherwise its programs will continue to face a watery route through in Congress.●

BOEING'S AWKWARD POSITION

● Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, an article by Eric Prokosch and Gordon Foer in the April 25, 1978 edition of the Philadelphia Daily News on the sale of five Boeing Vertol helicopters to Argentina illustrates two possible consequences of our sales of ostensibly nonmilitary equipment to foreign countries. First, American equipment sold for nonmilitary purposes can easily be used by recipient countries to repress their own peoples. Second, American labor which is supportive of their fellow union workers in foreign countries produces the very equipment that is often used to suppress these unions.

I ask that the entire article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

BOEING'S AWKWARD POSITION

(By Eric Prokosch and Gordon Foer)

The proposed sale of five Chinook helicopters to Argentina's military, dictatorship places Boeing Vertol workers in Ridley Township in the awkward position of producing weapons for a country that suppresses organized labor.

The $27-million helicopter sale, announced Feb. 1, would provide Vertol employes with badly needed work at a time when U.S. Army contracts have been cut back.

The dilemma is that those helicopters may be used by the dictatorship to crush strikes and take over strikebound factories. Two of the five are being sold to the Argentine Army, according to Vertol sources. Three will go to the Argentine Antarctic Directorate.

The U.S. State Department, which must approve that sale, needs to ask: What assurance is there the helicopters, even though sold unarmed, won't subsequently have weapons mounted or be diverted from Antarctic duty and used for labor-busting or other human rights violations?

Argentine has traditionally had a strong labor movement, especially in its mining and auto industries. But since the military junta took power in March 1976, trade union activities have been suspended, the right to strike has been revoked, and soldiers have been sent in to run factories where discontent has resulted in slowdowns or work stoppages.

Union leaders have been jailed, have disappeared or been killed by right-wing assassination squads acting with government complicity. Workers who protest reportedly have been arrested or shot on the spot.

Amnesty International estimates that as of January 1977, the military junta held at least 6,000 political prisoners, and that 15,000 people have simply disappeared or been assassinated.

Since the 1976 coup, Argentine workers have been hit hard as the government lifted price controls and froze wages. Real wages had risen to 125 percent of the 1960 level before the coup; afterwards, they dropped to 58 percent of the 1960 level.

Two AFL–CIO officials who visited Argentina last September wrote that "according to Argentine labor sources, economic conditions for workers have never been worse." They cited "rapidly worsening real wages of Argentine workers" and "the appearance for the first time in the last quarter-century in that nation of hunger, real hunger.

"In dollar terms, the wages in Buenos Aires are around $35–$50 per month," they wrote. "A decent meal in an average restaurant in Buenos Aires costs at least $10 today.

The AFL–CIO officials noted that "the right to strike and to bargain collectively has been canceled . . . the destruction of the national and state or provincial levels of the trade union movement will bring nothing but chaos to the already tarnished spectrum of social institutions in Argentina."

The Chinook, described by Boeing as "the world's best medium lift helicopter," could be used to carry troops and supplies to strikebound mines and factories in outlying areas. The junta has used soldiers, guns and tear gas to stifle labor protests by forcing people back to work and arresting those who refuse.

In Vietnam, the Chinook was used extensively for transport and rescue. It also was used for defoliation and as a gunship. Its ability to operate in mountains and jungles makes it suitable for a large country like Argentina, with its diversity of terrain and climate.

Argentina's deplorable human rights record prompted Congress last year to cut off U.S. military aid and training. It would be consistent with that decision if the State Department and Congress also refused to allow the Chinook helicopter sale.

Boeing Vertol is in the difficult position of depending on the deadly arms trade to stay alive as a company. This paradox points to the importance of planning for economic conversion—the transformation of military weapons-producing plants to civilian work that would provide stable employment and products of benefit to everyone.●

TO KEEP THE PRESSURE ON CHILE

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in 1976 Congress voted to terminate U.S. military aid and supply to Chile on the grounds that this South American country was in gross violation of human rights. This was a laudable action—one which helped give us, the Chilean people, and the entire world community a solid base on which to build and establish a fair and humane government in Chile.

But this was only one step in the right direction.

General Pinochet is still in power and continues to rely on his secret police.

We still do not know the whereabouts or condition of 1,500 "disappeared" political prisoners.

Chileans continue to be arrested without warrants.

The people of Chile continue to be denied the right of free speech.

On May 4 I spoke out against backdoor aid to Chile, in the form of military and economic assistance from the private sector. At that time I also voiced my opposition to $38 million in CCC wheat credits for Chile, which will be used to enhance Chilean exports, not to feed the Chilean people.

In a recent editorial, the New York Times warned that these credits could be seen as an "easing of pressure" on General Pinochet and called for the United States to "keep the pressure on Chile." I strongly agree with the Times that "it would be a mistake to ease the pressure just as it begins to have positive effects. Better to use the present opportunity to extend the modest gain into a major one." I request that this editorial be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

TO KEEP THE PRESSURE ON CHILE

Human rights are getting a little more respect from Chile's military Government these days, after more than four years of unmitigated repression. Much of the credit belongs to the United States Congress and the Carter Administration. Washington has applied steady pressure on the Chilean junta by ending military assistance and making economic aid contingent on relaxation of the repression. Unfortunately, an agricultural credit approved last week will be seen as an easing of the pressure, which should be maintained.

The first piece of encouraging news from Chile came in early March, when the state of siege was finally lifted. Since then, most of the acknowledged political prisoners have been granted amnesty, more civilians have been added to the Cabinet and plans for a new constitution have been accelerated. But much of the apparatus of repression remains intact. A state of emergency is still in effect. The amnesty leaves untouched hundreds of "missing" persons. The constitutional preparations are taking place in a political vacuum, with the main parties banned, trade unions restricted and dissent severely punished. Most important, a powerful secret police force continues to operate above the law and outside the formal command structure—a private political army of intimidation, loyal only to President Pinochet.

The firm United States stance, maintained in the current investigation of the 1976 murder in Washington of Orlando Letelier, the Allende-era diplomat, has had its effect. Many of the military and right-wing civilian supporters of the junta want to see Chile break out of its diplomatic isolation; their pressure for less arbitrary rule has evidently contributed to the recent lifting of some of the bars.

The State Department, which praised the improvements, should now focus on the remaining areas of greatest concern. Chile should agree to admit United Nations investigators; it should further relax the state of emergency and restore the rights of political association and free speech; it needs constitutional controls on the domestic security forces.

It would be counterproductive for Washington to rule out an eventual rapprochement with Chile or to demand the re-establishment of pre-coup conditions. But it would also be a mistake to ease the pressure just as it begins to have positive effects. Better to use the present opportunity to extend a modest gain into a major one.●

URUGUAYAN OPPRESSION

● Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, 2 years ago in May of 1976, two Uruguayan democratic leaders were assassinated in Argentina. The victims were Congressman Hector Gutierrez Ruiz—Speaker of the Uruguayan House of Representatives—and Senator Zelmar Michelini. Both had been living in exile in Argentina since the 1973 military coup in Uruguay. When the military took over in Argentina, Uruguayan security forces began to operate freely in that country with no limits to their actions.

Democratic opposition leader, Senator Wilson Ferreira Aldunate, who miraculously escaped with his life when his colleagues were murdered, recently visited the United States and described how Argentina and Uruguayan forces continue to collaborate in repression.

I think, Mr. President, that the best way to honor these prominent leaders who died defending democracy and freedom is to continue the struggle for those principles and ideals.

Uruguayans continue to disappear in their own country and in Argentina. We need some kind of refugee program to deal with this situation. Day after day the repression continues to worsen in Uruguay, the homeland of Gutierrez Ruiz and Michelini. The Government of Uruguay must know that so long as the conditions continue like those which lead to the assassination of these two democratic leaders, relations with the United States will not be entirely normal.

Uruguay today has the highest percentage of political prisoners in the world and a few days ago Amnesty International released a new list of people recently assassinated in Uruguayan jails. But through all of this the Uruguayan love of democracy is still alive among the people and the day is not far away when democracy and the rule of law will be restored in the homeland of Gutierrez Ruiz and Michelini.●

FLOYD HASKELL: KEY CONTRIBUTOR TO ETHICS LEGISLATION

● Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, on the occasion of the first filing of public finance disclosure statements under the new Senate Code of Conduct, I would like to publicly note the enormous contribution to the enactment of the Senate Code of Conduct made by my colleague from Colorado, FLOYD HASKELL.

FLOYD HASKELL had been actively working for full public financial disclosure and a stringent Code of Official Conduct well before the passage of such provisions became popular or inevitable. To a large extent, the ethics rules and regulations passed by the Senate this Congress are based upon legislation FLOYD

HASKELL introduced in the 93d, 94th, and 95th Congresses.

The contributions of Senator HASKELL are most visible in the two so-called ethics packages passed by the Senate last year. Senate Resolution 110 created a Senate Code of Official Conduct. In addition to requiring full public financial disclosure, Senate Resolution 110 restricts outside income and lobbying by former Members, and establishes stronger enforcement procedures for the Code of Conduct. It bans lameduck travel, sets new standards on the use of the frank, bars discrimination in Senate employment and tightly restricts the receipt of gifts.

Senator HASKELL not only contributed legislative ideas which were incorporated into this code, but he also helped create the climate which made such a code possible by his personal voluntary financial disclosure each year well before such disclosure was required by the Senate rules.

The second major piece of ethics legislation passed by the Senate last year is S. 555, the Public Officials Integrity Act of 1977. That legislation incorporates the financial disclosure requirements of the Senate Code of Conduct into statutory law—thereby providing criminal and civil penalties for failure to file the required information—and applies the same financial disclosure requirements now imposed on us to high level officials in the executive and judicial branches. This legislation also draws on a key concept originally proposed in legislation introduced by Senator HASKELL by creating an Office of Government Ethics in the Civil Service Commission. This Office would be responsible for executive branch enforcement of the new financial disclosure and ethics provisions.

FLOYD HASKELL's legislative proposals have been years ahead of the rest of the Congress and have contributed innovative and responsible ideas ultimately adopted as part of the Senate Code of Official Conduct and the Public Officials Integrity Act.

Mr. President, Senator HASKELL has long correctly stated that it would be wrong to enforce higher standards of conduct on executive branch officials than we impose on ourselves. The Senate Code of Conduct and the Public Officials Integrity Act set tough but fair public financial disclosure requirements equally applicable to those in all three branches of the Federal Government in a large part because of the dedicated and effective work of FLOYD HASKELL.●

HEW'S 25TH ANNIVERSARY

● Mr. MAGNUSON. Mr. President, yesterday was the 25th anniversary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare. They held a little "birthday" party and it was a festive occasion, attended by a number of Members from the Senate and the House. I was honored to be included in that ceremony.

From a relatively small beginning, HEW has grown over the past two decades. Much of that growth we required by the enactment of legislation approved by the Congress, by six Presidents and with the overwhelming support of the American people.

HEW has grown in importance to the American people and our economy. It is truly a people's agency of Government. For the young and the elderly, for those of all ages who are handicapped or facing temporary setbacks HEW is the lead agency of the Federal Government in helping to meet the special needs of our fellow citizens.

While HEW is on the firing line in helping to meet those needs, it is equally on the firing line of criticism—some justified, and that we in the Congress, along with the President and all administration officials, constantly address. There is always room for improvement in the effectiveness of Government programs and in their efficiency. No one is more dedicated to bringing that about than the Secretary of HEW, Joseph Califano, and all of his associates.

Secretary Califano reviewed the missions of HEW yesterday. His remarks were most appropriate, to the occasion and to this time when the costs of Government programs are of equal concern to all of us. I wanted to see that his remarks received wider attention and I would like to have them printed in the RECORD.

The remarks follow:

REMARKS BY JOSEPH A. CALIFANO, JR.

"The moral test of government is how that government treats those in the dawn of life, its children; those who are in the twilight of life, the elderly; and those who are in the shadows of life, the sick, the needy, and the handicapped."

In these words, on a day last November when we dedicated this building to him, Hubert Humphrey expressed a part of his philosophy—and he summed up eloquently the mission of this Department. For this Department, through twenty-five turbulent years, has devoted itself to helping the most vulnerable of the nation's people: Those who are very young or very old; those who are sick, or poor, or handicapped. We are the agency through which this government has sought to meet and measure up to that exacting moral test of Hubert Humphrey's: To hold a light aloft for those who live in the twilight or the shadows.

This Department represents the greatest act of compassion of any society in the history of civilization.

What can we learn from its twenty-five years of effort and struggle?

For me, there are three conclusions to be drawn, and the first of them is this: The efforts of government to deal with social problems—to effect social change—can be successful; sometimes spectacularly so.

Consider these bits of evidence:

Between 1965 and 1975, the number of American families living in poverty was reduced by half—from more than 30 million to about 15 million; from 15 percent of our population to about seven percent. That is an achievement every bit as exciting as the landing of a man on the moon. And it happened, in large part, because of this Department.

In only ten years, the proportion of young black Americans entering college has doubled. Today a high school graduate who is black has almost the same chance to go to college as his white classmate. That, too, is a striking social achievement. It happened in large part, because of this Department: Its programs of equal opportunity; programs of educational enrichment; programs of student financial aid.

Life expectancy in America has grown in the past few years, and infant mortality has declined—largely because of programs administered by this Department: Medicaid and Medicare; programs of maternal and child health; programs of scientific and medical research sponsored by the United States Government.

It is a measure of our high standards as a nation that when such things happen, we quickly take them for granted. We Americans accept, as routine, advances that in other ages and other nations would be hailed as revolutionary.

In an age of deep pessimism about the capacity of government to do almost anything right, such achievements come as rays of light. They are not reasons for government to congratulate itself, but for the American people to congratulate themselves. Such achievements are signs of our national health: signs that our nation is not only coping with its problems, but often overcoming them. That in itself is cause for celebration.

The daily work of this Department may seem prosaic: writing regulations, dispensing Federal funds, mailing out forms, gathering statistics.

The results are anything but prosaic; they are of breathtaking diversity and deep impact. We measure them, not just in budgets and organizational charts, but in other ways: in the delight of a child watching Sesame Street; in our pride when a scientist at the National Institutes of Health wins the Nobel Prize; in every hard-won victory of a handicapped person or mentally retarded child against great odds.

I think it is entirely fitting after twenty-five years, for the American people to remind themselves of these successes—and for us to rejoice in them.

The second lesson of these years has to do with the omnipresence of controversy: This Department was born in controversy, has lived amid controversy, and will probably celebrate its fiftieth anniversary in the midst of controversy.

And that is as it should be.

For HEW, after all, pricks our national conscience; it touches our most sensitive national nerves. We are not only the largest government Department; we also deal with the largest issues.

We confront a tangle of social problems which are difficult to define, much less solve: discrimination; poverty; medical ethics. We are charged by law to deal with human difficulties that other institutions—the family, the schools, the national economy—have failed to solve.

And we must deal with these problems in the open. We must accommodate, somehow, all the competing, contending views of this diverse, contrary nation; we extend ourselves to serve the interests of young and old, black and white, Hispanics, Eskimos and Indians; women and handicapped citizens.

But the controversies that are a feature of life in this Department are also a blessing, however mixed. For they are the debates of a lively democracy—the earnest discussions of a people who not only care, but care passionately.

I believe, quite simply, that the crosswinds of opinion and controversy that blow constantly through this Department blow not ill, but good for America. They do not chill our national life. They invigorate and refresh our democracy.

I would draw, finally, a third lesson: A lesson about the virtues of efficiency. This Department has grown tremendously since it was founded. In 1953, its total budget was barely $7 billion; next year it will reach $182 billion, a 26-fold increase in 25 years. In 1954, we were 35,000 employees. Today, we are 145,000 employees and we pay the salaries of another 980,000 state, local and private employees. That growth, thrust upon us by the Congress and the American people, has created a more just and caring society; but that growth has also come, sometimes, at the expense of efficiency.

For years, the foremost challenge that faced us was to tackle the unfinished business of a generation: to launch compassionate new programs; to address problems that the nation had not faced, much less solved.

Today our challenge is no less awesome: not only to meet the needs of our people for social justice and a higher standard of living—but also to answer another demand of the American people: their demand for careful, prudently managed government. Ours is the challenge of expressing compassion—but compassion disciplined by competence; we must be as wise as we are caring.

Nothing less will work, in a time of limited resources. Nothing else will do, if we are to restore people's confidence in their government. That is why HEW has recently embarked on an historic effort to increase the efficiency of its programs; to root out fraud and abuse; to streamline the machinery of Government. Without these efforts, our compassion would be a flabby, sentimental, aimless thing; we would be like a physician overflowing with sympathy for his patients—but lacking the skill or the medicines to treat them.

I believe that I speak for every past Secretary of this Department—and for all the devoted people who serve in this Department—when I say that these three things—the satisfaction of great achievement; the excitement of great controversy; and the unending challenge to do better—are the things that make this Department the most exciting and rewarding of all government departments. We would rather be here at this moment in history than anywhere else in the public service: here in the Department of the People.

Today I bring a pledge, from the people of HEW, to the American people whose stewards we are:

We are determined to build upon these achievements of twenty-five years; determined to emerge from the controversies of today with policies that serve all the people of this varied and vital land; determined to do good, and to do it well.

As we seek to do these things; as we seek to meet the moral test that Hubert Humphrey set forth and that he met so well in his own life, we can profit by the words of two other national leaders.

One is Lyndon Johnson. More than any other President before him, he shaped the mission and the programs of this Department. He once described his vision for America this way:

"The Great Society is not a safe harbor, a resting place, a final objective, a finished work. It is a challenge constantly renewed, beckoning us toward a destiny where the meaning of our lives matches the marvelous products of our labor."

And this week, in a telegram concerning this anniversary, Lady Bird Johnson recalled some other words of his that describe our nation and—I believe—this Department: ". . . always becoming, trying, probing, falling, resting and trying again; but always trying, and always gaining."

The other words are from another President who today challenges us with a simple, insistent question: "Why not the best?"

How well we answer that question will shape the next twenty-five years of this Department—and of this nation. We are looking forward to doing a good job.

Thank you.●

WHERE LAUNDRY IS THE FLAG AND VIOLENCE THE WAY OF LIFE

● Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, Joe Klein, a reporter for Rolling Stone magazine, recently visited Southern Lebanon and Israel. His observations are extremely interesting and I hope will be read by all Members of Congress. I ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

WHERE LAUNDRY IS THE FLAG AND VIOLENCE THE WAY OF LIFE

(By Joe Klein)

I: THE LAUNDRY IS THE PROUD FLAG OF FATAHLAND

It had been so horrible, so difficult to understand, that the woman was still searching for an appropriate response two weeks later and, not finding any, she giggled nervously. "We were eating breakfast when the planes came. I saw them in the window. They threw bombs on the village and all the houses fell upon each other. I was pulled out from under the stones. More than twenty children were killed." The woman smiled. She was small and dark, and had a cast on her left leg. She was Lebanese.

"Ask her if any other members of her family were hurt," I said to the Palestinian doctor, who was translating.

The woman nodded. "Two of my daughters are dead. They are under the stones."

"Ask her why the Israelis dropped the bombs."

"I don't know," she said. "I think there is a quarrel."

"Ask her if there were any Palestinians in her village."

"Only one, an old man."

"Ask her what she will do now."

She giggled, embarrassed this time. "I want to leave the hospital and sleep with my husband."

We were in the Red Crescent hospital—the Palestinian equivalent of the Red Cross—in the port city of Sidon, the first stop for tens of thousands of refugees fleeing the Israeli invasion of southern Lebanon in March. It was a small hospital, and all the serious cases had been moved to better facilities in Beirut. Now the doctors were beginning to think in terms of the larger health problem: how to care for the masses camped out in schools, in vacant apartment buildings, mosques, soggy tents and alleyways. That afternoon, Dr. Mohammed Musa was to make a survey of the refugee sites, and invited me to come along.

Dr. Musa is about thirty years old and prematurely gray. Despite all that he had seen, especially in the last few weeks, he still would wince and shake his head as we moved from school to school, visiting the poor, shattered families jammed together in classrooms. Usually there were two families, an average of twenty-five people, crowded into each small room, their belongings piled high against the walls, the women sitting quietly on the floor, the children running crazily through the halls and the men talking to each other in tight knots outside. In the first place we visited, a classroom had been turned into a bakery—the Palestine Liberation Organization was providing some flour—with large wheels of unleavened bread drying on newspapers on the floor. It was all the food they had, except for a few chickens strutting in the schoolyard. Also in the yard, tied to a pole at the end of the basketball court, was a cow that one family had somehow managed to bring along. Children followed us wherever we went, the crowd of them gradually swelling, competing for Dr. Musa's attention, a quick hug, a pat on the head. There were 200 people in that first school; 150 in the next; 300 in the next; several thousand in the next, a high school, and on and on.

The day turned hot and steamy, the faint odor of garbage became stronger as we moved from school to school. At one refugee site, a UN truck had pulled up and was handing out small quantities of sardines and bread. A crush of women was shouting at the men in the truck, reaching up their hands for more.

The last place we visited was a half-finished hospital construction site. We walked across several planks onto the foundation, then down a flight of stairs and into near-total darkness. As my eyes adjusted, I realized there were people actually living in the basement. There were perhaps 150 people camped out there. They had piled their belongings into feeble barriers that separated family from family on the cold concrete. It was damp, with pools of standing water that congealed into a stagnant lake down toward the open end of the site, where greasy light filtered down through the pilings. The air was thick with the smells of vegetables cooking, of the sickly sweet gas from the cookstove burners, of ——— and ———. It reminded me of one of those medieval woodcuts, a vision of hell.

On our way back to the hospital, we passed the concrete shells of unfinished apartment buildings. There was laundry hanging down from several of the balconies. "Do you see that?" the doctor asked. "Wherever you see the laundry, you find my people. The laundry is our flag."

In Beirut, laundry flew from the most unlikely places; there even were clotheslines on the balconies of luxury buildings, where armed guerrillas had led small bands of refugees into vacant apartments. Most of the others fleeing the South weren't so lucky, of course. They would live in their classrooms and tents until they found a niche in one of the existing refugee camps or decided to risk going back to their villages.

The process was nothing new in Lebanon: refugees had fallen upon the country like layers of sediment since 1948, when Israel became a state. Each new layer packed the camps tighter and made the refugees more militant. The angry Palestinians became a tumor inside the country, gradually building tensions among the Lebanese themselves. Finally, in 1975, a civil war exploded between the Moslems and Christians. It was a brutal, bloody war—thousands had been killed in hand-to-hand fighting. It had raged in the streets of Beirut, and now it was almost impossible to find a building that didn't have at least one bullet hole in it. Many were splattered with holes, exposing the gray cinder block beneath the soft tans and pale oranges of Beirut. In some sectors, the bullets created a vast concrete contagion—a pox—that seemed to leap from one building to the next, reducing some to rubble, leaving others crippled or merely scarred.

Beirut had always been well armed—like most American cities—but the civil war had touched off a mad rush for weaponry. Lebanese shopkeepers quickly added guns and ammo to the pyramids of cigarette cartons and liquor they sold on bridge tables along the roadsides, and now virtually everyone in town had a gun. The casual, almost jaunty, acceptance of violence was rather terrifying to an outsider. The tanks in the streets, the sandbagged machine-gun placements were routine annoyances to the natives; the occasional thin clatter of small-arms fire in the distance often didn't even interrupt conversations. The official cease-fire only had ended the official warfare: there were plenty of horror stories about random violence, about personal arguments resolved by gunplay, about cabdrivers losing their tempers in traffic snarls and coming out firing.

Lebanon once had been known as the Switzerland of the Middle East, and Beirut the most sophisticated city. But "civilization" had proven a flimsy defense against the militant irrationalities of religion and nationalism. Now there was chaos. Dozens of armies roamed the country, alternately blowing up buildings and directing traffic, shooting at each other and keeping the peace. Determining the exact number of armies was something of a sport among the journalists who hung out at the Commodore Hotel bar—a classic neocolonial outpost where events in the war zone were reviewed and drowned each evening: there were the United Nations truce forces (France, Iran, Norway, Sweden), the Arab Defense Force (mostly Syrians, with help from Saudi Arabia, the Sudan and the United Arab Emirates). There were about six right-wing Lebanese Christian factions and about ten left-wing Moslem factions—and no fewer than eight Palestinian groups (affectionately called "the Pals" by the gang at the Commodore). And, of course, there now were Israelis in the South.

In the midst of all this anarchy, remarkably, the Lebanese bureaucracy continued to putter along, presiding over an imaginary country, providing some peripheral services—customs and a press office among others—but not the vaguest promise of safety.

The Palestine Liberation Organization also presided over an imaginary country. It existed, for the time being, within the borders of Lebanon—but geography was not an important consideration. It was a country defined by suffering and anger, and held together by an odd sort of ballistic theology; the central doctrine was salvation via the gun, and the dominant symbol was the Russian semiautomatic assault rifle, the Kalashnikov.

There also was an elaborate martyrology: the annointed were terrorist fallen in the hijacking of airplanes, the raiding of villages, the storming of buses. Those who died at the hands of Israelis were canonized immediately. Their pictures were plastered all over the refugee camps; their life stories became models for the children; their homes often became shrines. In some cases, the elevation of a new martyr was announced officially by WAFA, the Palestine News Agency: "Yasser Arafat proclaimed today . . ."

Rifles were everywhere in the narrow, busy streets near the Arab University in Beirut, where the PLO kept offices. The Kalashnikovs bobbled along on the shoulders of dark-eyed young dudes, casually dressed, who slouched through the area on patrol; the rifles jiggled on the knees of guards sitting mysteriously on bridge chairs in front of random buildings; they were cradled, clutched, leaned on and rested in every possible angle.

My first day in Beirut, I approached two young men standing like hunters in front of the PLO press office with rifles hitched up under their armpits, the snouts resting on their forearms. They smiled, shook my hand, and directed me up to the third floor, where there was a small waiting room for foreign press papered with PLO posters, all of which had one thing in common: guns. The most jarring were pictures of young children carrying rifles and trying to look defiant; also a drawing of a chorus line of Kalashnikovs parading into the Promised Land. Beneath a poster of Fidel Castro cuddling some children—one of the few that didn't include a gun—sat a Palestinian college student who handed me a form to fill out. With a minimum of fuss, I was assigned a PLO guide to take me down to the front lines in South Lebanon. The guide was a calm, soft-spoken young man named Naji, who had curly black hair and gold-rimmed eyeglasses. He was twenty-one years old; his family had fled the West Bank after the Israelis took the area in 1967, and now it was dispersed through Europe and the Middle East. Most of his brothers and sisters were well educated and holding down good jobs—a pretty typical story, since Palestinians have the highest rate of college graduates in the Arab world. When I asked him why, with his family doing so well, he was still intent on regaining Palestine, he said impatiently, "Because it is ours."

We were driven down the Lebanese coast in an old green Plymouth by a hired madman named Fouad, who felt no reluctance about using anything concrete—sidewalks, oncoming lanes—to get us where we were going. Also in the car were an American reporter and photographer, a woman and a man, who identified themselves as "freelancers" and rather pointedly left it at that.

It was a day of fast-moving, intense rainsqualls and pale sunshine. Syrian checkpoints slowed the traffic through the sad, ruined towns that had been classy Mediterranean resorts before the civil war. Just south of Sidon, at an oil refinery, we moved into territory controlled, de facto, by the Palestinians. Fatahland, the journalists called it. Now it was guerrillas—usually members of Fatah, the dominant PLO faction—who guarded the checkpoints. Most wore standard green fatigues, but others had on T-shirts, longish hair, and all sorts of wild paraphernalia. I saw one fedayeen wearing a cowboy hat, Texas Tech T-shirt and platform shoes. The guerrillas managed to affect a tough, street-smart pose and yet seem very friendly (later, I'd come across checkpoints where the Palestinians would stick their rifles into the car, then insist on shaking hands with everyone). In looks and attitude, they reminded me of a Puerto Rican street gang that had managed somehow to rip off a cache of rifles, grenades and grenade launchers. Some were very, very young: the Qasmieh bridge, the crucial north-south link over the Litani River and target of numerous Israeli bombs, was "held" that day, rather nonchalantly, by two apple-cheeked boys just pushing puberty.

"See those hills over there?" Naji asked, pointing to a line of gentle, green slopes running parallel to the road as we crossed the bridge. "The Israelis hold those."

South of the bridge, the Palestinians controlled little more than the coast road and the city of Tyre, a picturesque port with famed Roman ruins. Before the Israeli offensive, Tyre had been run by the PLO and left-wing Lebanese and called itself "The People's Republic of Tyre." Now it was mostly deserted. The Israelis, obviously wanting to clear the place out, had randomly bombed civilian neighborhoods. Naji showed us piles of rubble that once had been houses; bits of domesticity were trapped in the concrete: children's notebooks, men's shoes, splintered chairs.

We stopped at one pile that had been the home of Elias Moayed, a Lebanese fisherman who happened to be Christian. Moayed, his wife and three children had been killed in the attack, three others seriously wounded. The neighbors stood vacantly in the rubble, still stunned. Hasan Akandh, who had owned a grocery store on the first floor of the blasted house and luckily was out on an errand when the planes struck, said, "This house was the strongest in the area. When the Israelis came before, the people in the neighborhood would come here to hide. This time, the planes came too quickly and it was gone."

A woman named Latifa, a young mother who spoke English, said she hadn't heard the planes until they passed, and then, "They made a savage noise, a crying sound and then the explosions. I knew the people in this house. They were good people. Why do the Israelis make war against civilians? If they want to fight, why don't they make war against the commandos?"

I started to say that the commandos made war on civilians too, but realized it would be a difficult point to explain to someone whose next-door neighbors had been blown away.

Lee, the woman "freelance" reporter, approached with a tape recorder and asked, "Is there anything you'd like to say to the working people of America?"

Latifa looked at the machine, a bit nonplused and then exploded, "Why don't you Americans care about us? Aren't we people too? Aren't we human beings?"

We drove several miles south of Tyre, through banana groves, to the Rashidieh refugee camp: a thicket of narrow dirt alleys and cinder-block shacks tucked in behind a citrus orchard. It was deserted now, except for guerrillas who were older and more menacing than the ones we had seen on the road. These were on the order of tough, grizzled Mexican bandits. One of the guards, a vicious-looking man with randomly scattered teeth and a ratty old sweat shirt, briefly disputed Naji's credentials but then allowed us to pass into the camp with a motorcycle escort. At the top of a rise, a man with a telescope was sitting on a bridge chair looking out across a plowed field (studded with cluster bombs, I later learned, a mine field imposed from the sky) at the Israeli position not more than a mile away. When the car stopped, he came over and offered his telescope. "Want to look at some Jews?" he asked.

"Zionists," Naji quickly corrected him. The man shrugged and smiled. I felt nervous.

We walked down a dirt lane, past several shacks blasted by Israeli mortars, around a corner, and into a tiny, dark, damp cinder-block cottage with a rusting tin roof. About six guerrillas sat inside on army blankets, smoking American cigarettes and reading Arabic newspapers. One had a portable tape deck, which he switched on briefly. It was playing a Star Wars cassette. Most of them wore fatigues, although one had on a powder-blue leisure suit. Several Kalashnikovs rested in a corner; the man sitting next to me whittled on a piece of wood with his knife. A young boy entered with glasses of sweet tea on a tray.

The guerrillas decided to let Mohammad Hayaneen do most of the talking for them. He was an exotic-looking man, with high cheekbones, large, fierce brown eyes and dark auburn hair that lightened improbably into a streak of blond at the front. He was twenty-nine years old, had joined Fatah ten years earlier after the Six Day War, dropping out of college to do so. He was wearing camouflage fatigues and a black turtleneck, and sat with his legs crossed. When he spoke, it was quietly and without expression. He never looked at us. He said he'd grown up in a refugee camp in South Lebanon: "We heard our parents talk about the times of prosperity in Palestine, and we decided that our life was not worth living. It wasn't life. We had no rights. Without a homeland, we were worth nothing." He was reciting. I wanted to get in closer, find out more about growing up in a camp, about his parents, about how it actually felt to fight this sort of war—but it was difficult to make human contact across languages and harder still to pierce his discipline. What's more, the "freelancers" had taken over, bringing the greetings of the American working class, and asking questions like: "What is the role of American imperialism in this struggle?" As it happened, the guerrillas were quite well grounded in Marxist rhetoric and seemed to enjoy that sort of discussion. It was very frustrating.

Finally, the guy in the blue leisure suit asked them why, if the American working class was so adamantly anti-imperialistic, he kept hearing about "the workers' aristocracy in the United States and Europe?"

The Marxists (members of an obscure Midwestern splinter group, it turned out) spluttered, and I decided to see what effect the truth would have: "Most American workers have cars, houses and color television sets and they are satisfied with that. They don't feel they need to control the state. It may well be like that here too: many Palestinians may be satisfied with a state on the West Bank and Gaza Strip, and not want to fight to regain all the land."

The Marxists groaned, Naji shook his head and the guerrillas giggled. I tried to make myself small, and the conversation moved on to the need for and glories of armed struggle. The meeting adjourned eventually for the obligatory photos, with Kalashnikovs, on the terrace. The two young boys who'd been serving the tea were summoned, handed rifles and instructed to smile for the American working class.

Back in Beirut several hours later, Naji took us into the Arab University, down several stairways that grew progressively smokier, past groups of Palestinian boy and girl scouts, through a thick crowd of people and into a jammed meeting hall. It was the Day of the Land, an annual commemoration of several Palestinian martyrs who died trying to prevent the Israelis from confiscating their land. Naji led us to the front of the hall and then left, saying he had work to do.

I looked around. It wasn't a huge hall—long and narrow, with maybe a thousand seats. But all the seats were filled, and the aisles were packed as well. Every last person—they were mostly young men—seemed to be smoking a cigarette. The room was lit by strings of bare light bulbs that transformed the cloud of smoke into a yellowish smog. PLO posters were all over the place. And in the front, where I stood, were gathered about a hundred men with guns of all different descriptions.

The weaponry seemed a bit much, even by Palestinian standards, until I glanced to my left and saw the entire leadership of the PLO, including Yasser Arafat, sitting in the front row. Each of them apparently had brought a half-dozen bodyguards. On the podium, making a rare appearance, was George Habash of the ultramilitant Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP). He was saying, I later learned, that it was very sad that the "offensive" against Israel had to be directed from eight separate war rooms. His seven colleagues in the front row sat quietly as the audience cheered.

When Habash finished, he sat down next to Arafat, not more than ten feet away from me. I watched them, the two most powerful Palestinian leaders, as they listened to the other speakers. Habash was strikingly handsome, with steel-gray hair and jet-black eyebrows, eyes, mustache, leather coat. He was an ideologue, not a politician, and felt no need to laugh at the other speakers' jokes, applaud their rhetoric or even acknowledge their existence. His presence at the meeting was for the benefit of the media: a show of unity after the Israeli offensive. Arafat, with his usual three-day stubble, was smaller, mouse-like, a politician. He laughed at the jokes, applauded the rhetoric. A large semi-automatic pistol dangled from his hip.

A strange thing happened just after Arafat began to speak. One of the bodyguards, perched atop a chair and straining to see, toppled over, his rifle clattering to the floor. There was a slight gasp in the hall, and the other guards moved instinctively for their weapons. If the gun had gone off, the place probably would have exploded. It occurred to me that, despite all the weapons, there wasn't much security. No one had been frisked. It wouldn't have been hard for an Israeli hit team to penetrate the room, wipe out the entire PLO leadership and maybe even escape in the confusion.

Arafat turned out to be a great speaker, spellbinding even in Arabic. The last two words of his speech were "until victory . . ." and he repeated them until the crowd picked up the chant: "until victory . . . until victory . . . until victory. . . ."

It was hard to believe that in the late 1950s, Yasser Arafat had been just another refugee, running a construction company in Kuwait. Palestinian nationalism seemed a wild idea back then, the plaything of a handful of Arab intellectuals. But as the refugee camps grew more crowded and conditions worsened, the idea began to take hold. Just as suffering in the Jewish Diaspora created the dream of Israel, suffering in the Arab diaspora had created Palestine. And now, in the dense, squalid anger of the camps, Palestine was the only dream around.

It had been nurtured in places like Sabra and Shattila, which form a vast running sore on the south side of Beirut, home to 210,000 people. Even after the spring rain, a patina of dust hung in the air; the narrow streets were packed with vendors and children; the walls plastered with the pictures of the "martyrs" from the Tel Aviv bus raid. In a winding alley between two of the jumbles of cinder block that pass for housing, I found several families that already had begun to seep into the camp from the South. We were beginning to talk via a PLO interpreter when a massive woman wearing men's pajamas under a housecoat approached and gently began to wring my neck. "Why don't you ask him about the F-15s and the cluster bombs?" She slapped me on the head, playfully, and then rested her arm on my shoulder as she reached down to pick up a pebble. "With this rock, I will liberate Palestine," she said, and the gathering crowd laughed.

I asked her name, and she said, "You can call me . . . Mrs. Sadat."

She began to tell her story: her family had been forced out of Galilee when she was a little girl. They had been tenant farmers, and the rich Arabs had sold the land to the Jews. When her father protested, he was killed by the Israelis. "They killed many of our young men. The rest of us came to this camp in 1948. I have lived here ever since."

"Do you have any children?" I asked.

"Twelve sons, and they are all fighting the Israelis."

"Aren't you afraid they'll be hurt?"

She shrugged, "It would be all right if eleven of them died in the war if the twelfth could die in peace in Palestine."

II: SECURITY IS A PHANTOM

Pa Za'el is a speck of green in the desert, surrounded by a Cyclone fence topped with barbed wire: a metaphor for Israel. It is one of the West Bank settlements, considered by the diplomats to be more a political statement—an Israeli attempt to hold conquered territories—than a community and, in truth, it does seem rather precarious. It is home to forty families who live along tiny avenues of squat, cement "security" houses with adjoining bomb shelters. The avenues are arrayed like spokes off a dusty, crescent-shaped community center. There is an empty swimming pool and a neglected basketball court—one gets the impression that recreation is an afterthought.

The settlement is a moshav, which means that equipment is bought cooperatively, but each family works its own piece of turf. The men are tanned and muscular, and seem to be more concerned with the upcoming melon harvest than the international negotiations that may, eventually, cause them to leave this place. One afternoon, a poised, handsome young farmer named Tuvia sat on the curved steps of the community center and told me about his father: "He spent several years in the Nazi slave labor camps. He had to stay strong. If he collapsed or lost his health, they would have shot him." It was, perhaps, the basic lesson taught to Israeli children through thirty years of statehood: stay strong or die. Tuvia had the simple, cleareyed conservatism of a man whose hands usually were caked with dirt from his fields—politics often seemed a simpler matter than the vagaries of irrigation. His arrogance was at once quietly disarming and remarkably narrow: "I want peace. The Arabs can live here, but we must stay here too. We must stay here for security." It was as simple as that.

The women of Pa Za'el were relentless homemakers and somewhat the worse for wear; invariably, their husbands looked younger than they. But then, the women were faced with the more difficult task of trying to impose permanence on a decidedly makeshift operation. They had created an atmosphere that resembled, when one forgot about the barbed wire, a garden apartment complex for young marrieds in the suburbs. There were no political posters or flags, but pathetic little flower beds and toys strewn about. Despite their best efforts, though, even the simplest ceremonies of domesticity seemed like acts of defiance.

Galia Kaspi had a Van Gogh still life on her living-room wall, a bookcase full of photo albums, and carefully arranged copies of Good Housekeeping and Redbook on the coffee table. She served Cokes and chocolate cookies and said, "We don't get Israeli television. We get television from Jordan. King Hussein is very kind to us: he gives us the news in Hebrew and in English every evening, and it is surprisingly objective."

Galia is an American, a graduate of UCLA who wanted to see what Israel was like and decided to stay. She has short, severely cut black hair and her pallor seems a shock, compared to the ruddiness of the men—her husband is lanky and brown, the picture of health. Galia isn't exactly unhealthy,; she's obviously a very tough woman. She has lived in Pa Za'el from the beginning, about seven years ago, and met her husband there. "I believed in the necessity of settling these territories for security reasons," she said, but there were deeper reasons too. There was the sense—an almost mystical sense that Menachem Begin conveys when he calls the West Bank its Biblical names, Samaria and Judea—that no matter what any politician said, this land was Israel. "We get our water from an ancient well that we found here," Galia said, proudly. "It's likely that the well was built by Jews and 2000 years ago Jewish people were drawing water from it, just as we are.

"This settlement may not seem like much to you, but it was barren when we came here. Now we grow green peppers, eggplant, tomatoes, watermelon and grapes. We sell off-season vegetables to Europe, and so we're able to do quite nicely.

The idea of "making the desert bloom" is at the very heart of Israel. It was the product of simpler times (colonial times, the PLO would say) when bringing civilization to the underdeveloped world—there was no such concept as a "Third World" in those days—seemed quite altruistic. There wasn't much thought given to the Bedouins who roamed the area freely and may have wanted their desert to remain unbloomed. It was perhaps the ultimate black joke that history played on the Jews: they, of all people, would be the last to carry the "white man's burden" of western progress into heathen territory with a clear conscience. Having spent centuries being kicked around by the Europeans for being Semites, they would now be kicked around by the Semites for being Europeans.

"What happens to you if this becomes a Palestinian state?"

It was as though the idea had never entered her mind. She seemed shocked: "It won't happen. It couldn't happen. A West Bank state would put them forty miles from the Mediterranean. It would be too easy for them to cut Israel in half."

"But what if it did happen? What would you do?"

"I wouldn't stay here," she said. "I wouldn't want to have someone stick a gun in my head when I was sleeping."

"But do you feel safe now?" I asked, as we went outside to the backyard. "There are all those militant Arabs who won't be happy until they have a Palestinian state."

"Let them have a state on the other side of the Jordan. It is the Arabs' problem—let them solve it."

"But you know that's no answer," I said, looking at the flimsy barbed-wire fence. "That fence doesn't seem like much security against all the anger."

A Phantom jet streaked across the horizon, then made a sharp, banking turn straight for Pa Za'el. "Oh, you're lucky," she said. "You're going to see a show."

We went around to the front yard. The plane dived down and buzzed the housetops and then pulled up. "He comes by every so often," Galia said. "His sister lives across the street and he comes by to say hello. Last week he was out in the fields with our men; this week he's up there."

The Phantom had turned again and was making another pass over the houses. A crowd had gathered in the street. People were laughing and applauding. Galia's husband, holding their young daughter, started to laugh. "Look, he has his landing wheels down." And he came in again, this time straight down the avenue of cement houses as though he were going to land. Several of the children grew frightened and started to cry. The jet seemed to approach faster and lower now; the ground trembled and the air buzzed with the shreik of the engines. The plane whipped through, up, off into the distant mountains, and the settlement grew quiet and drowsy again under a white-hot sky.

Galia smiled, "You were asking about security. . . ."

"Tons of explosives were hurled into the town that night, the incendiary shells creating frightening silhouettes in the sky . . . It was an awful lot of explosives to dump on a town that was supposed to have a maximum of 100 terrorists in it . . . It worked out to about a dozen 155 mm. artillery shells . . . for every estimated terrorist, not to mention the 20-odd tons of TNT dropped by the air force . . . The Israeli army once renowned for its Davidian finesee, was a huge stomping Goliath, hitting with all its might at places from which the terrorists had already fled.—JERUSALEM POST, March 24th, 1978."

It was in the name of security that the Israelis built and electrified the "good fence" that ran the length of the Lebanese border—but the guerrillas lobbed rockets over the fence and circumvented it by sea.

And it was in the name of security that the Israeli attacked and held South Lebanon—but the guerrillas, expecting the attack, had retreated with few casualties, and the Israelis had bombed civilians. It was a public-relations disaster and now, with guerrilla teams studded through the hills and quite happy to wage a Vietnam-style war of attrition, picking off a jeep here and a lone soldier there, the operation was in danger of becoming a military problem as well.

On a gorgeous day in April, with the exquisite perfume of orange blossom in the air, I entered Lebanon from the south with a dapper Israeli press officer named Uri, who owned a music store in Jerusalem and had six children. "If we come under shelling attack," he said, "leave the car immediately and dive down on the ground. I'm not so frightened of shelling—the shells must land very close to hurt you, and their aim isn't so good."

He had no advice to give, though, about the small-arms fire that began to rattle through a nearby village as soon as we crossed the border. He just said, "Keep moving," and I did, down a road that ran along the crest of a hill, thoroughly pitted by mortar craters. Off to the left, across a beautiful valley and perched on a green cliff, was Beaufort Castle—a ruined fortress built by the crusaders and held now by the Palestinians. It was within firing range of three villages held by the Lebanese Christians, and every so often the Palestinians would lob a rocket across—sometimes they would aim at traffic, like us, proceeding along the road. The Lebanese, for their part, had Russian tanks (gifts from the Israelis, captured in the Sinai from the Egyptians) aimed in the general direction of the guerrillas. It was a situation where Russian armaments fired on Russian armaments.

The dun-colored town of Marj'uyun, once rather prosperous, had been bombed by all sides, and only a few people—most of them selling cheap cigarettes and booze in the town square to the various armies in the neighborhood—remained. Rockets had smashed the sewer lines, and raw sewage flowed in the streets. On a wall in the square, the Lebanese Christians had scrawled in blue paint: "Norwegians Get Out!" It seemed hysterically funny: the Norwegian UN troops had just arrived two days before for their first military operation in many, many years. We drove down a steep hill, past mine fields marked with bright red and yellow signs, to see what was happening over at the Norwegian headquarters in the splattered town of Ibl as-Saqi.

The Norwegians were caught in a ridiculous political tangle. They were stuck in the roughest part of the "truce" zone, and no one wanted them to stay there. They themselves had requested an area where there wouldn't be any shooting, but now they were facing a Palestinian faction—mostly PFLP—that hadn't agreed to the cease-fire. When the Norwegians had stationed themselves in the town of Kawkaba the day before, the Palestinians had come out smiling, to shake hands. Then they returned to their positions and started shelling the place. The Palestinians obviously wanted to prove the UN presence meaningless; they wanted to force the Israelis to stay in the area and fight a guerrilla war. They also wanted to be able to continue calling the Israelis expansionists, who used "security" as an excuse to grab Arab lands.

The Lebanese Christians, meanwhile, wanted the Israelis to stay too. They didn't have much faith that the Norwegians would be able to protect them from a Palestinian massacre once the Israelis left—and they were probably right. The Norwegian commander was explaining the complexities of his situation—the UN wouldn't let him pull back or fire back—when we heard the resonant thunk of mortar fire. Several Norwegian reporters and I ran up to the roof of a building from which we could see the Palestinians shelling Kawkaba. Actually, we could only see wisps of smoke rising from the next hill.

I asked a Norwegian officer with binoculars where the shelling was coming from.

"I don't know."

"But could you give me a general idea of where the lines are?"

"There are no lines," he said, a statement worthy of Vietnam.

It was a wonderful image: the poor, confused, sunburned Aryans—some wearing silly paper cones on their noses to protect them from the sun—in their neatly pressed, rather spiffy uniforms, pinned down in the midst of vast hordes of sloppier but much more efficient Semites. The Norwegians were refreshingly unmilitary, unbloodthirsty, inept—the sort of people Jews once had been, but were no longer.

Israel was, quite obviously, a garrison. Soldiers, both male and female, clogged the roads, hitching rides. My car was always filled with them. At first I figured there were so many soldiers visible because of the Lebanese invasion, but then it dawned on me that this was normal.

Israelis had become inured to violence and, often, insensitive to it. The reports of Israeli terror-bombing in southern Lebanon were all too easily dismissed with shrugs and, "So, they kill our civilians, too." The constant tension, the fear of attack, the sense of impending doom—all of it numbed and debased the Israelis. Uri, the dapper press officer, told me about his youngest son, who recently had become old enough to be curious about his grandfather's death. "How was he killed?" the boy had asked.

Hillel Schenker is thirty-six, a small man with dark, curly hair turning gray, and large, soft brown eyes. He is an intellectual, a writer, a folk singer, an editor of the socialist magazine New Outlook. He is unfailingly rational and so gentle in his ways that he never curses. (In fact, he told me an interesting thing about cursing: Hebrew, which had been dead except for religious purposes before it was resurrected as the national language, had no curses, and so the Israelis borrowed some from Russia, Arabic and Yiddish.) Obviously, he is not a martial sort, but in Israel everyone has a war story, even Hillel Schenker: when he serves in the army, he sets mine fields.

"I realize I may have killed people," he says. "But I look at it this way: mines are defensive weapons. When we lay a mine field, we mark it very clearly—it's required by the Geneva Convention—so the function usually isn't to kill the enemy, but to slow it down. If the Arabs decided to attack us, they would either have to clear the fields or go around them and, theoretically, that would give us more time to prepare our defenses."

Hillel served in the Yom Kippur War in 1973, mining the Golan Heights. One day his unit was at work in a field—they eventually learned that it was safer to put down mines at night—when the Syrians opened fire and he jumped down into a ditch. There were five corpses in the ditch. "It was disgusting, and one of my friends began to vomit. My thoughts were strange: my first thought was, 'Thank God, they're theirs.' But when we looked closer, it turned out that two of them were ours. They had all looked the same. We saw many dead bodies during that operation and—you talk about people being brutalized—some of our men wanted to take their watches and valuables: you know, the spoils of war. We had a big debate about it and finally an officer came up with a compromise: we would be allowed to take their weapons, but no personal belongings.

Hillel told me that story on a bus to Herzliyya, the suburb of Tel Aviv where he lived. It was a warm, pleasant night, and the streets of the town were crowded when we got off the bus. In the first block, I saw about a half-dozen soldiers, several carrying nasty-looking weapons, and two little old men patrolling the street with carbines. "Did you see that?" I asked.

But Hillel hadn't seen the old men, or any of the others. He was used to seeing guns in the street. "I can't get over the fact," I said, "that someone like you knows how to use an M–16 and lay mines."

He laughed. "It would be a lot stranger if I didn't, given our circumstances here."

Actually, the strangest thing about Hillel, given the circumstances, was how hard he fought to remain rational, how devoted he was to solving problems that most likely had no solution. There was no doubt that a special series of events—the centuries of persecution, the Holocaust—had made a Jewish state absolutely necessary; there could also be no doubt that Zionism—the formation of a new country on the basis of race (or religion or whatever it is to be Jewish)—seemed a form of racism to the Arabs, who had the misfortune of being born on the lands the Jews had staked out. It was one of those untidy situations where both sides had a case, and where decisions were made emotionally. Hillel refused to deal with the past altogether: "It's not important now what happened thirty years ago. The important thing is that Israel exists, the Palestinians exist, and how are we going to find a way to live together peacefully?"

"But how do you convince Israelis to trust the Arabs," I asked, "when there's no earthly reason why they should trust the Arabs?"

"You do it slowly," Hillel said, and he spun out an elaborate scenario for a gradual withdrawal from the occupied territories, a gradual establishment of what he called a Palestinian "entity." It was all very complex, with third-party guarantees and clauses and exceptions—and quite probably impossible, since there wasn't exactly a bull market for rational thought in the Middle East. But Hillel was calmly optimistic. There was a growing peace movement in Israel. It wasn't very radical: the leaders made vague statements about peace being more important than occupied territories, but no definite proposals . . . and not a word about Palestinians. Still, it was good to see PEACE Now bumper-stickers on cars, and the crowds gathered around the petition tables in downtown Tel-Aviv. It was, in fact, the first really positive trend Hillel had seen in years.

The grand socialist tradition that he'd been born into—the tradition that had, in large part, built Israel—was clearly on the wane. The kibbutz movement was stagnating. The Mapam party, the bastion of leftist Zionism, seemed archaic and a bit irrelevant. It certainly didn't make much sense to the Oriental Jews, the refugees from Arab countries, who seemed more interested in taking a hard line against their old Moslem oppressors than indulging an old European fantasy. They formed a vast underclass in Israel, the base of Menachem Begin's right-wing coalition. (There were rumors, too, that the Oriental Jews' desire for revenge was responsible for the Israeli army's recent tendency toward brutality in Lebanon and on the West Bank.)

But it was too easy to blame it all on the Oriental Jews. There also was a whole new generation of Israelis who didn't care much for the old socialist establishment. It was softhearted, humanitarian, while they were battle-hardened. There was a tendency toward selfishness and practicality among the young. Several women complained to me that there was a revival of machismo in the country; but then, the women admitted, machismo was probably the easiest way for a young man to deal with the insanity of a situation in which he had to kill or be killed. There wasn't much room for sensitivity in a warrior state. It was odd and rather sad that here, as in Beirut, "civilization" was proving a flimsy defense against the forces of nationalism and religion.

No, it was worse than sad or odd. It was a crushing irony: for centuries, Jews had carried "civilization" through a dark world that saw it (and them) only as a disease to be eradicated. Now, finally, in order to hold onto their dream of nationhood, they had to become less civilized.

III: AN ARAB'S STORY

In 1940, a road gang worked near the town of Nazareth under the direction of a young Arab. Yusuf Khamish was eighteen and very frustrated. He had wanted to go to the university, but his father didn't have the money. So he was stuck with a boring job, supervising Arabs from town and Jews from a nearby kibbutz. He didn't like the Jews; they scared him: in school, the British taught him that kibbutz Jews didn't believe in God and didn't have families.

One day the kibbutz sent, as part of its crew, an old man. "You can't work," Yusuf told him. "It's too hot for an old man."

"Nonsense," said the man. "Of course I can work."

Yusuf hesitated, intrigued. "Well . . . come with me," he said. "You'll work inside today."

It turned out that the man was a professor of economics, a Marxist. They had long discussions together, and the professor began bringing Yusuf pamphlets about the Russian Revolution, then books. He taught Yusuf not to hate his father for being too poor to send him to college: the capitalist system was to blame. He gave Yusuf a beautiful vision of the future, when all people would live and work together in peace. One day the old man came to work and said, "You must come to the kibbutz with me. The leaders want to talk to you about building an access road."

"No," Yusuf blurted, a reflex action.

"Don't be silly," the professor said. "We won't hurt you."

Yusuf stayed at the kibbutz for three weeks, saw socialism in practice and became a true believer. He was arrested twice in the next several years. First by the mufti of Jerusalem, for being a radical. Then by the Israelis, for being an Arab radical. He quickly was sprung by his friends in the Mapam party and decided to stay in Israel even though many other Arabs were leaving. The growing forces of Jewish and Arab nationalism seemed, well . . . irrelevant to the class struggle. And hadn't the Russians aided the Israelis in those first days of independence?

Unfortunately, though, most Jews weren't like the old professors. Yusuf saw there were cases where Arabs were brutalized, their lands confiscated, their civil rights abused. But he was safely in the Mapam cocoon by that time, rising through the party ranks, becoming a public figure, eventually getting elected to the Israeli parliament, the Knesset.

Now, as he sat with me in the cafeteria at Mapam headquarters, a middle-aged man with thinning white hair and cocoa skin, Yusuf Khamis seemed a rather lonely figure, an oddity of history. He was not tremendously popular in Israel because he supported a Palestinian state, "not in place of Israel, but next to it." At the same time, when he went to international meetings, the Arabs would make fun of him, call him a "so-called Arab" bought by the Jews. "How can they do that to me? How can they call me that?" he said. "In Stockholm, I went to a meeting where there were representatives of the PLO. One of them came to me quietly and asked how things were in his hometown of Safad. I described how it was, and he began to cry. I felt bad for him, but then the PLO threatened my life at the meeting."

The Israelis, who'd seemed to wonderfully rational at first, had become extremists. The Palestinians, a political movement that barely existed when Yusuf was making his life decisions, also were extremists. Even the Russians had turned out to be a major disappointment. All that had survived was the dream the professor had given him—and that still burned brightly, against all odds.

"You ask about the future," he said. "Okay. I would like to see a Palestinian state and a Jewish state next to each other. Gradually, I think they would see how much they had in common—both people look so much alike, both so hard-working, so intelligent. Gradually, I think they would come to depend on each other economically. Gradually, I think they would begin to mix and become one. I know, I know—it's ridiculous," he chuckled. "People tell me that all the time. They say that it's just an old man dreaming. Well of course! Of course it's a dream! But what's so bad about dreaming? When you live in this part of the world, dreaming is usually a lot more pleasant than real life."●

SPEEDING ENERGY CONSERVATION IN INDUSTRY

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, for over a year I have been saying that industrial use of energy has been neglected as a potential area of conservation which could save the United States large quantities of imported oil. While industry has made substantial strides I believe that a great deal more can be done.

I will have more to say on this subject in the months ahead but for now I wish to point out that investments in energy conservation equipment are not being made as rapidly as possible. The authority for this statement is an article in the industrial newspaper, Energy User News from May 15. The article surveys the experience of a number of businesses and concludes that companies are applying a more difficult standard for investments in conservation which would yield a return on the dollar from money saved, compared to investments in production. This is the same evidence given before the Subcommittee on Energy of the Joint Economic Committee in hearings last August.

The article quotes from Harvard Business Review, a half dozen company executives and a national accounting firm, all with the same conclusion.

One important message here is that companies are waiting for more clear signals from the Government before making investments. The price of natural gas, the price of oil and tax treatment of conservation investments are all holding up additional conservation in industry.

Because industrial energy conservation is so critical and accounts for so much of our energy, I hope Members of the Senate will continue to look for savings in this area. I ask that the article to which I refer, by Michael Millenson, be printed at this point in the RECORD.

The article follows:

DOUBTS FORCE CONSERVATION OUTLAY DELAYS

(By Michael L. Millenson)

NEW YORK.—When in doubt, don't.

That maxim, applied by corporate policymakers uncertain about energy prices, government actions and the reliability of all manner of devices making energy-saving claims, appears to be resulting in the postponement of capital expenditures of energy conservation by a number of companies. The money goes, instead, to more traditional investments.

There is the example of the project to recover heat from waste water at Caterpillar Tractor Co.'s Mapleton, Ill., plant and use it to heat buildings. Despite the project's 2½-year payback, a staff engineer said, "the money for the installation is not available." Instead, it went for activities directly related to production.

There is the engineer for United States Shoe Corp., Cincinnati, who after saying, "I've met a lot of people who are very frustrated in trying to get (conservation) projects through," acknowledged that he's encountered the same problem with his higher-ups. (The engineer, Steve Leesman, said he could recall no specific examples.)

And there is the tale of a large Michigan meat processor, who preferred to remain anonymous, who was given the chance to use heat from waste water to preheat air in a smokehouse now heated by natural gas. Management looked at current gas prices, looked at the Congressional debate on investment incentives, and, in the words of a source familiar with the decision "decided to bide their time."

In talks with plant and corporate energy managers, consultants, and vendors of conservation equipment, the theme of caution by many (but by no means all) companies emerged.

"About one-half of the companies I visit, usually have a list of (energy conservation) projects with maybe a two- to three-year payback," commented Robert Redd, director of the Grand Rapid, Mich. based energy audit division of Seidman & Seidman, a national accounting firm. "They're waiting because of a fuzzy picture on fuel costs and they're waiting for signals from the government."

The cost of that wait to the nation as a whole could be high, according to a group of consultants writing in a recent issue of the Harvard Business Review. The four, including two from Thermo Election Corp., one M.I.T. professor of engineering, and a former head of the Federal Energy Administration's conservation office, warned that failure to give enough funds for energy conservation "will erode competitive strength."

Contending that both today's technology and economic situation justify more spending, they continue, "Cost-effective investments (in which the total cost of the energy saved is equal to or less than the replacement cost of the fuel or electricity saved) could save about 25 percent . . . the equivalent of 4.5 million barrels of oil per day . . . of the industrial energy that will be in demand by 1985, and thereby do much to offset higher energy costs."

Still, despite these and other proddings to spend for conservation, there is little doubt that there exists a reluctance to immediately do so, even when the energy savings are clearly spelled out by plant engineers. Part of this is due to uncertainty over the problem, part to uncertainty over the proposed solutions.

SOME DOUBTS

Roy Rittenhouse director of engineering for Hatfield (Pa.) Packing Co., with sales of about $50 million, noted that some potential energy conservation projects are being held back because of doubts over which conservation technology works. Money is funneled instead to a building project.

"We wanted to be sure we went with the right thing," Rittenhouse explained. "There are so many gimmicks on the market. It takes evaluation time."

Don Hall, vice president, marketing, of Pacific Technology Inc., a Remton, Wash., manufacturer of demand control systems, acknowledged that skepticism regarding the energy savings claims made by vendors of widely varying types of devices made some companies put their money into more comfortable investments.

"They get into an electronic computer (demand control) system, and their perception of the savings is less because they don't fully comprehend how it works," Hall said. "It gives them many reasons to say, 'let's wait on this one.' "

A Cranford, N.J., manufacturer of heat wheels agreed. Said Lee Johnson, marketing manager for the Wing Co. division of Wing Industries, "A lot of it is just not being sure what will work in that particular application; not being 100 percent sure and not wanting to be the first one to try it."

RATE OF RETURN

Yet, even when top management believes that an energy conservation project will work as planned, the going is not always smooth. Energy conservation must compete for money with other capital projects, and so it must prove an attractive rate of return. But when the beauty contest is with increased production, many engineers have found, the curves of energy conservation produce the less attractive figure.

"Once they (plant engineers) get the technical aspects down, the biggest problem they have is in selling the project (to management)," said Al Thumann, executive director of the Atlanta-based Association of Energy Engineers and a part-time consultant. Thumann estimated that this difficulty afflicted 50 percent of the plant engineers he encountered.

"The economic rate of return is competing against bucks that will be spent for increased production," he said. "Predictably, the return on investment is a lot less."

An example of that problem was provided by Don Nell, a staff engineer for Caterpillar. Caterpillar, whose sales have expanded rapidly in the past two years, has been pushing expansion of its manufacturing facilities in order to keep pace. As a result, said Nell, money for energy conservation has become more difficult to obtain.

MONEY NOT AVAILABLE

"I've had many cases where I felt a heat pump could recover (heat from) waste water going out." The heat, said Nell, could be used to heat buildings, paying back the initial capital cost of $500,000 to $750,000 in less than 2½ years. "Yet the money for the installation is not available."

According to Nell, part of the problem comes from a tendency of managment to count energy costs as overhead costs and energy conservation equipment as non-productive equipment. "You can't count the (hot) air (being recovered) in a building," he noted.

When energy costs are figured in terms of current prices, rather than what they will be when a project is finished, the hurdles are even higher, observers noted.

And the phenomenon of waiting until tomorrow to worry about tomorrow's energy costs—reportedly more prevalent in the lower-cost Sunbelt states than further north—especially worries the group of consultants writing in the Harvard Business Review.

"Energy-efficiency investments are not being undertaken as fast as economic circumstances and anticipated developments warrant, primarily because they are evaluated on an unequal basis in comparison with investments in new energy supplies, they stated. In the foreseeable future, this practice will erode competitive strength."

But next to the warning comes a prediction of abundant reward, in the form of increased sales and profits, for those—and there are many—who heed the warnings to spend now to conserve energy tomorrow.

"Companies recognizing that energy prices will eventually rise to their next replacement-cost plateau can seize the opportunity to use energy efficiency as a means of increasing market share," the consultants predict.●

VETERANS

● Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, on March 23 and March 24, 1978, the Maine House of Representatives and the Senate of Maine passed a joint resolution outlining some of the hardships faced by Maine veterans, especially Vietnam veterans. I inserted the text of this joint resolution in the RECORD on April 16, 1978.

In response to this joint resolution, Max Cleland, Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, in a letter to the secretary of the Maine Senate, detailed some recent efforts by the Veterans' Administration to respond to the problems of Maine veterans.

As a disabled Vietnam veteran, Max Cleland suffers many of the same problems of those people he is trying to serve. As a result, he is acutely aware of the hardships they face. He has done a great deal to improve and expedite veterans services and benefits.

Nonetheless, much remains to be accomplished. We must continue to make every possible effort to ameliorate the problems of veterans. They deserve a government that is responsive to their needs. I ask that Mr. Cleland's letter be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D.C., May 3, 1978.

MS. MAY M. ROSS,
Secretary of the Senate State House,
Augusta, Maine.

DEAR MS. ROSS. Thank you for sending me the Joint Resolution Memorializing the President, the Administrator of Veterans Affairs for the United States, the Maine Congressional Delegation, the Governor, and the Director of the Maine Bureau of Veterans Services Concerning the Current Hardships Faced by Maine Veterans.

I deeply share the concerns expressed by the legislators of Maine on behalf of the resident veterans, their dependents and survivors and I want to assure you that the Veterans Administration will continue to make every possible effort to effectively serve the veterans of Maine. The paragraphs which follow describe some of our more recent efforts in the areas of education benefit payments, home loans, employment assistance, and communications.

In the fall of 1977 three significant revisions in educational assistance payment procedures were implemented by VA as mandated by PL 94–502. These were:

the change in certification of veteran-student enrollment from annual to semester or quarterly certification;

the change in GI bill payments from the beginning of the month of entitlement (prepayment) to the end of the month for which the veteran or eligible person is entitled to receive benefits (postpayment);

the change in advance pay procedures. Advance payment could be made upon the veteran's request, as long as the institution involved agrees and is able to comply with certain requirements of the Veterans Administration relative to delivery and certification of delivery of advance pay checks.

The numerous administrative and operational adjustments associated with implementing the changed payment procedures did not alter the mission and obligation of the VA to ensure that timely payment of financial aid is accomplished. However, for the system to be most efficient the total cooperation of the VA, the student and the school is required. If the VA needs information upon which a claim is to be processed, a failure by the student or school to provide it results in delay. Inevitably, there are individual instances where one part or another of the payment system fails to function properly. But in the vast majority of cases the new payment procedures instituted in 1977 were successful. Indeed, in a letter dated January 5, 1978 to Senator Alan Cranston, Chairman of the U.S. Senate Committee on Veterans Affairs, the Comptroller General of the United States reported that the VA:

"prepared extensively for the implementation of legislative changes from a prepayment to a postpayment system through circulars, media publicity, letters to schools, personal contacts, and task force monitoring of enrollments; placed special emphasis on streamlining applications for loans and work-study agreements so veteran students could avoid 'financial binds'; established and maintained communications with school officials and did not realize appreciable delays due to erroneous data from schools; centrally monitored the regional enrollment processing volume and backlog against desired weekly output levels; experienced no inordinate delays with student fall enrollment workload; incurred no significant increase in pay complaints especially related to the postpayment changes, advance pay changes or the 1977 fall enrollment in particular;

benefited from the personal interest and participation of the Administrator in efforts to get correct checks to veteran students in a timely manner."

Despite these accomplishments VA is continually pursuing new initiatives aimed at improving internal management and operations. We are now in the process of installing an advanced computer processing system throughout the nationwide network of VA Regional Offices and Centers. Known as TAR GET, this system is scheduled for activation at the Togus VA Center in January 1979. Installation of the TARGET system will shorten the VA processing time for many types of financial benefits, thus reducing the time a veteran must wait for a check.

I would like to mention here that there is a relatively new form of financial aid available to veterans. PL 95–202, enacted November 23, 1977, provides that veterans and eligible persons, in resident institutions, with remaining entitlement after they have completed their entire program, may use the remaining entitlement to cancel a portion of their Veterans Administration loan under certain conditions. Before the acceleration program becomes effective, a state (or local governmental unit) must have its own program of funding as a part of this program. Students enrolled in a state that does not participate in the program will not be eligible under the provisions of the law. The law provides that states will have until January 1, 1983 to establish such a program of funding. In those states which do participate, excess entitlement may be used to repay a part of the VA education loan not to exceed the amount which the state or local unit contributes. The amount of accelerated payments paid by the Veterans Administration and the amount of matching payments made by the states will be used to reduce the amount of the Veterans Administration loan owned by the veteran or eligible person to the Veterans Administration. I urge the Maine legislature to enact enabling legislation to permit veterans enrolled in schools in the State of Maine to participate in the acceleration program.

Concerning financial benefits for housing, I am pleased to report that veterans living in Maine, and particularly Vietnam Era veterans, are utilizing the benefits available to them under VA's Loan Guaranty Program. Each of the following items shows a marked increase in activity from the previous year.

Total home and mobile home loans closed to veterans in Maine was 2,237 for calendar year 1977 and 2,227 for calendar year 1976. Of these loans, 1,676 or 75.4% were to Vietnam Era veterans for calendar year 1977 and 1,546 or 69.4% for calendar year 1976.

The total amount of GI loans made to veterans in Maine was $61.9 million in calendar year 1977 as compared to $61.4 million in calendar year 1976, representing a $500 thousand increase.

Direct loans to veterans in Maine also showed an increase from calendar year 1976. In calendar year 1977 there were 134 direct loans made for $3.1 million as compared to calendar year 1976 in which 60 loans were closed in the amount of $1.1 million.

Concerning employment assistance to veterans, it should be noted that even though primary responsibility for providing this effort rests with the Department of Labor (DoL), the Veterans Administration does render assistance to veterans visiting its offices, as well as provide information and guidance to DoL representatives. Early in 1977, the secretary of Labor announced that DoL was establishing a Disabled Veterans Outreach Program (DVOP) to contact disabled veterans and assist them with employment problems. VA volunteered to train DVOP personnel in veterans benefits programs so that they might be of maximum assistance to the disabled veterans they contacted and also made available in each state a list of the names and addresses of Vietnam Era veterans receiving compensation for disabilities. DOL's employment activities operate through providing Federal funds for State Employment Administrations and providing the state organizations with directives as to the actions to be taken and procedures to be followed. Funds were made available to the states to hire about 2,000 disabled veterans for the DVOP and in August 1977, DoL granted funds, sufficient to hire 11 disabled veterans, to the American Legion, Department of Maine.

The Joint Resolution states there is a lack of communication between many Vietnam Era veterans and VA. I agree there may be individual cases where communications have suffered. However, it is my impression that for the most part there has been a healthy rapport between the VA and the Vietnam Era veterans. The VA has taken positive action to enhance communications with these veterans by establishing Vietnam Civic Councils at VA field stations. The Councils were formed in 1975 to assist younger veterans in identifying problems and making recommendations for improvement to appropriate officials. These groups meet on a regular basis (at least quarterly) and are made up of Vietnam Era veterans and other interested parties. The Civic Councils have submitted numerous recommendations to VA and afford the Agency an excellent means for responding to issues considered important by Vietnam Era veterans. Since they have been successful in providing input to the Agency, the Councils have been included in VA's Consumer Representation Plan.

You may wish to note that a very active VVCC has been established at our Togus Center. This group meets regularly and has submitted several proposals to VA Central Office in Washington, D.C. One of those recommendations is aimed at improving communications between Civic Councils. Based on the recommendation of the Maine VVCC and on other suggestions received on this topic, we are currently developing a newsletter which will achieve this goal. I believe that the Togus VVCC has succeeded in improving communications with veterans in Maine and look forward to continued success in this regard.

In summary, I want to reiterate that the Veterans Administration will continually strive to provide the best possible service to the veterans of Maine, not only in the areas discussed in this letter but in all aspects of veterans programs. I am confident that we will be successful.

On behalf of their constituents, I want to thank the legislators of Maine for the interest they have shown in veterans affairs.

Sincerely,

MAX CLELAND, Administrator.●

VOTER INITIATIVE

● Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, the public support for the voter initiative amendment (S.J. Res. 67) that I introduced last July, has been growing at a rapid pace. I have always felt that once the American people heard about my idea of letting them vote on some national issues, they would strongly support it. The amount of press coverage this proposal has received and the number of letters my colleagues and I are receiving seem to confirm my convictions about the innate popularity this proposal has among the American people. Now, two nationally known polling organizations have conducted surveys on the voter initiative amendment. The Gallup organization and the Pat Caddell organization, Cambridge Survey Research, have shown that the American people think that voting on national issues would be a great idea.

Here are some of the questions that Cambridge Survey Research asked in its survey about the voter initiative amendment that it conducted for its clients:

(1) Would you favor a Constitutional Amendment, similar to the laws which 23 states already have, which would permit the citizens of the United States to place a proposed law on a national ballot by collecting a specified number of signatures on a petition and have that law take effect if approved by a majority of the nation's voters at the next general election or not?

	Percent
Yes	57
Not sure	18
No	25

(2) Do you think allowing citizens to vote directly on national issues would give citizens greater control over the government, less control over the government or don't you think it would make much difference?

	Percent
Greater control	45
Less control	8
No difference	42
Don't know	5

(3) Would you be more inclined or less inclined to actually go to vote on issues as well as on candidates?

	Percent
More inclined	74
Less inclined	7
No difference	13
Don't know	5

(4) Do you think allowing citizens to vote directly on issues will make elected officials more responsive or less responsive to the will of the people?

	Percent
More responsive	77
Less responsive	10
No difference	7
Don't know	7

Mr. President, I ask that the following article which appeared in the Washington Post of May 14, 1978, summarizing the Gallup organization poll be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THE GALLUP POLL.—NATIONAL INITIATIVE PROCESS FAVORED BY 57 PERCENT OF VOTERS

(By George Gallup)

PRINCETON, N.J.—Voters of the nation like the idea of being able to pass judgment on proposed national legislation.

A constitutional amendment, described by its sponsors as the Voter Initiative Amendment, would require a national vote on any issue if 3 percent of all voters in the previous presidential election sign petitions asking for such a vote. This percentage, applied to the last presidential election, would mean that a national vote could be held on any issue when approximately 2.5 million people signed petitions.

By a 57-to-21 percent majority, the public in a nationwide Gallup Poll survey expresses approval of this plan. A total of 22 percent were undecided. Significantly, voters who have attended college approve of the initiative amendment by a vote of 59 percent with 11 percent undecided.

The initiative, a time-honored device for direct citizen participation in the legislative process, is currently authorized in 23 states. And, according to the Library of Congress, in the past 80 years approximately 1,200 issues have been decided in this manner.

The constitutional amendment that would make the initiative federal policy is sponsored in the Senate by James Abourezk (D-S.D.) and Mark Hatfield (R-Ore.), and in the House by James Jones (D-Okla.) and Harold Sawyer (R-Mich.).

Support for the federal initiative is found among all major groups of the population.

Interestingly, nearly identical proportions of Republicans, Democrats, and independents agree the initiative is a good idea—an unusual finding on any question of political significance.

Similarly, about equal majorities in the various geographic regions support such an amendment to the Constitution.●

HUMAN RIGHTS AND U.S. POLICY

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I rise today to express my concern about recent reports of serious human rights violations in the People's Republic of Poland. Along with most Americans, I was very hopeful that President Carter's visit to Poland several months ago, in which he conveyed sincere messages of friendship from our Government and people to their Polish counterparts, would evoke a response from the Polish Government indicating a reciprocal desire to establish and enhance relations based on mutual respect and good will. I had hoped that this response would take the form of greater awareness of and sensitivity to the universally recognized human rights of Polish citizens. Apparently, this has not come to pass.

I understand that, in recent months, Polish police have instituted a disturbing crackdown on academic freedom and individual self-expression. Scholars and writers who have attempted to organize a so-called Flying University, in order to pursue studies in the humanities and social sciences not permitted by state educational institutions, have been repeatedly gassed, beaten and arrested. A worker's "Social Self-Defense Committee" was subsequently established, to document cases of harsh repressive tactics used by the police, and members of that committee have since become victims of the same tactics themselves.

I do not intend, Mr. President, to describe in detail every atrocity which these Polish citizens have suffered. I do wish to point out, however, that such brutal treatment, clearly condoned by the Polish Government, calls into question its commitment to protecting the rights and liberties of Polish citizens, and to the provisions of the Helsinki agreement.

Mr. President, we in the Congress have taken many important strides toward improving our political and economic relations with the countries of Eastern Europe. I have supported such moves, and continue to believe that we must do everything possible to ease the tensions which exist between the United States and those nations, and to facilitate contact and cooperation between our two peoples. In the economic sphere, the Senate will shortly be called upon to consider President Carter's recommendation that most-favored-nation treatment be extended to Hungary. I intend to support that recommendation.

Nevertheless, we must be absolutely certain that our expressions of good will are not viewed by the recipient governments as a carte blanche to continue or even intensify repressive activities which we consider to be intolerable. I am a realist, and I am well aware that human rights cannot and should not be the sole consideration upon which our foreign policy is based. But I believe that all nations with whom we deal should be on notice that the moral focus of our relations with other states is to be taken seriously, and that advantageous trade and other agreements are subject to reevaluation at any time, if in our view those agreements are contributing to the continuing deprivation of fundamental rights or liberties. I hope that, if he has not already done so, President Carter will communicate this message to every country seeking improved relations with the United States, so that our policy in this regard may be clear and unquestioned.●

BERT GASTER WINS AWARD FOR ARTICLE

● Mr. RIBICOFF. Mr. President, Bert Gaster, editor and copublisher of the Connecticut Jewish Ledger, has won the Valley Forge Honor Certificate Award for an article he wrote in the Ledger of February 10, 1977. In the article, Mr. Gaster writes eloquently and movingly about leaving Vienna 38 years ago and coming to the United States.

Bert Gaster, who is a longtime personal friend of mine, wrote an excellent, heartfelt article, and I commend him for it and congratulate him for winning this award.

Mr. President, I ask that Mr. Gaster's article, "The American Dream—A Personal Anniversary," be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THE AMERICAN DREAM—A PERSONAL ANNIVERSARY

(NOTE.—The following article is adapted from a radio address delivered recently on WTIC Radio's "Sabbath Message" program by Bethold Gaster, copublisher of the Connecticut Jewish Ledger.)

(By Berthold Gaster)

We recently witnessed the inauguration of a new president of the United States, emphasizing the continuity of our government, moving as it does from one administration to another without missing even a half step.

Over the past year, we also witnessed a signal event in our history—the bicentennial of our existence as a nation. The celebrations, the hoopla and the serious reflections upon the significance of this milestone all served to re-establish for all to know that this republic of ours has a permanence, that what was founded 200 years ago by struggling settlers of a new world has been worked upon over the decades and decades since, as we strive continuously to fashion an ever more perfect union.

The American dream, so much admired in lands less fortunate than ours, has not yet given us the perfect society. But every generation that has passed through the American scene has built upon the foundations of the one that preceded it. And just as Jewish tradition teaches us that we must continue to study, for there is so much more to learn, so has the American tradition been not to accept the status quo as the most perfect product that man can create, but to continue to improve upon what we have.

The continuing strides made in the process of perfecting the American dream have special significance to me personally. Next Thursday, Feb. 17, I shall observe the 38th anniversary of my entry into these United States as a refugee from Nazi dominated Austria, brought here with my family as the fortunate recipient of an American visa backed up by my American relatives' pledge that my family would not be a burden on the society we were privileged to join.

ELEVEN MONTHS UNDER HITLER

We had had nearly 11 months of Hitler rule in Vienna, a period which included for my physician-father seven months' interment in the infamous concentration camps of Dachau and Buchenwald. It is difficult for a native-born American who has always taken his rights and privileges for granted to appreciate fully what it means to live in a police state. It is, therefore, beyond my capacities to produce the right words to describe exactly how we felt as we crossed the border from Austria to Switzerland on a very cold, clear February morning.

It is impossible for me to impart to my readers what it meant to drop a stone from one's heart as we passed from darkness to light and, for the first time in many years, breathed in deeply the free Swiss air on that cold winter day. I emphasize many years, because Austria had had a Fascist dictator for five years before the Nazis took over, a Fascist dictatorship that not only abolished political freedom, but one which seriously cut into civil rights, particularly for the country's more than 200,000 Jews.

It is in this context that I came to these shores. It was difficult for my new American friends to comprehend what we related about Nazi excesses in a land far away. For, while America had broken with its isolationist past to enter World War I and save the western powers from defeat, in 1939 Europe still seemed very far away from many Americans who had come to look upon the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans as bastions that blew away the evil from our land. They felt this way in the mistaken belief that if we buried our heads in the sand, we could not see the monster of world upheaval threatening our way of life and our future.

OFFERED SO MUCH MORE

I came to an America that was still struggling to come out of a catastrophic depression. I came to a land that, nevertheless, compared with what I had seen in Europe, offered so much more to so many people. In the starryeyed bewilderment of a new lease on life, it was difficult to seek out or even admit that faults did exist in the American society.

Of course, as one matures, he judges more objectively. And as one becomes an active citizen, criticism which a grateful immigrant would disdain, becomes part of the every-day scene. But it is the very right and duty to criticize and seek to perfect that is an indispensable facet of every American's make-up.

As the apostles of the democratic way of life, we have sought not only to achieve a more perfect society for ourselves, but we have reached out across the world with the zeal of political missionaries, to bring what we believe is the best form of government to other nations. And sometimes, failing to achieve this goal, we have accepted the lesser plateau of helping them ward off an invasion by forces of tyranny or of providing a buffer between potential adversaries. This has not always brought us the gratitude of those we seek to help. But were this political missionary zeal not part of our make-up—coupled with the recognition that similar conflict is not impossible—I doubt very much that we today would be involved in so wide a gamut of commitment as our leadership in NATO, our position in southeast Asia, our involvement in the volatile southern Africa situation, or our dispatching of observers to the Sinai desert.

Much has happened to America in these past 38 years, and I don't refer only to a world war and lesser conflicts in Korea and Vietnam. The land of opportunity, which drew immigrants to these shores before and since its inception and was swelled by giant waves of newcomers from central, southern and eastern Europe late in the 19th and early in the 20th centuries, has, via the dual path of evolving maturity and necessary legislation, continued the process of achieving the more perfect union, with new doors opened to Catholics, Jews, Blacks, Hispanics and other minorities whose share of the American dream had not been equitably apportioned under a system which, after all, is man-governed and therefore at times man mis-managed.

RESISTANCE TO CHANGE

The road to the more perfect society which we seek is paved with the uneven cobble-stones of resistance to change by some of our citizens. These obstacles are compounded by the need for patience, by the inevitable cost in material sacrifice that we must endure in order to achieve greater equality and justice at home while, at the same time, maintaining a posture of deterrent strength that will make a potential adversary think often and carefully before he strikes.

As I write today about the American dream and my opportunity to share in it, I would be remiss if I did not say a word about those less fortunate than I, who, for the lack of an American visa or the chance to enter some other free land, joined the millions of Jews in eastern Europe who fell under the Nazi yoke in World War II and perished in Hitler's gas chambers.

Most of those who died—and they included one million children—could have been saved, had there been in existence 38 years ago a country whose membership in the family of nations we today take pretty much for granted. I refer to the State of Israel.

Just as it was difficult 38 years ago for my new American friends to accept man's inhumanity to man, so is it most difficult for an American proud of his heritage and proud of his citizenship to place himself in the shoes of a man or woman without a country. But in the late '30s and early '40s, when the gates of the free lands in this world either were shut, or, at best, open but a crack, a European Jew without a country to go to had an almost sure one-way ticket to a death camp.

HAVEN FOR ALL JEWS

The State of Israel represents ancient Israel reborn in its homeland. But it also represents a haven for all Jews who live in oppression, anywhere in the world, so long as they are able to get out. The most striking example of a country with large numbers of Jews who want to leave—and cannot—is the Soviet Union. And it is to the credit of Americans of all creeds and all stations of life—from Senators to ministers to priests to civic and political leaders and just plain citizens across the land—that the American sense of justice and decency has been brought into play. But for this demonstration of solidarity—as also exemplified by the recent observance of Human Rights Month for Soviet Jewry in Connecticut as designated by our governor—and the pressure exerted upon Soviet authorities by Americans and our friends in Europe, it is very doubtful that more than 100,000 Soviet Jewish emigrants just in the last three or four years would have gotten a second lease on life, much as I did some 38 years ago. American involvement in this latest freedom fight is but the latest chapter of a glorious book of American history that has been filled with pages of achievement for our citizens, and protests on behalf of and assistance to, the oppressed in many lands.

At the outset, I alluded to the important event of the past month—the inauguration of a new president. And I reflected upon the significant observance of the past year—that of our bicentennial, I took special pride in this observance because of my membership in the Connecticut Historical Commission and the state's American Revolution Bicentennial Commission.

As we, in the past few minutes, have looked back to the past, so should we now turn to the future.

A RESOLUTION

As we enter our third century as a nation, let us resolve that the good we have been trying—and very often successfully—to achieve, will not elude us as we seek to continue the process that has made us the great nation that we are. And in a world that becomes ever more materialistic and selfish, let us resolve that the mission of America—very often idealistic and at times even naively so—will be undiminished in its zeal. That which three million citizens began, and more than 200 million now enjoy, must serve not as an end initially, but, true to our tradition, as a stepping-stone to an even greater society for all our citizens, so that America's achievements may continue to be a shining beacon for all to see.●

THE EQUAL RIGHTS AMENDMENT

● Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, I am joining Senator BAYH and 23 of my colleagues in cosponsoring Senate Joint Resolution 134 legislation proposing a 7-year extension of the time period for ratification of the equal rights amendment.

The decision to support such a proposal was not made lightly, for those of us serving in the Congress cannot afford to take lightly our responsibility to the orderly process of amending the Constitution of the United States.

My decision is based on two key points.

First, there is no question in my mind that the Constitution allows Congress to set the ground rules for enacting amendments to the Constitution, including the amount of time for ratification.

Given that, it then becomes a question of whether the conditions that prevailed when the equal rights amendment was passed by Congress in 1972 prevail today. If they do—as I believe they do—then it is appropriate for Congress, if it desires, to allow additional time for the States to complete the ratification process.

I would like to refer to the language of article V of the Constitution, which is that document's reference to the amending process:

The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose Amendments to this Constitution, or, on the Application of the Legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a Convention for proposing Amendments, which, in either Case, shall be valid to all Intents and Purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by Conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other Mode of Ratification may be proposed by the Congress; Provided that no Amendment which may be made prior to the Year 1808 shall in any Manner affect the first and fourth Clauses in the Ninth Section of the first Article; and that no State, without its Consent, shall be deprived of its equal Suffrage in the Senate.

That is the sum and substance of the guidance the Founding Fathers gave Congress on the constitutional amending process. There is no mention of a time period for ratification; in fact, there is not even an indication that a time period of any kind is necessary.

Before passage of the 18th amendment in 1917, in fact, Congress had never used the 7-year limit.

It would appear, then, that the Constitution leaves to the discretion of Congress the matter of determining how much time should be allowed for ratification of a constitutional amendment. This is also the conclusion of the courts.

In Dillon against Gloss (1921), the Supreme Court established that ratification of a constitutional amendment must come within a reasonable time after it is proposed and that "keeping within reasonable time limits," Congress has the power to "fix a definite period" for the ratification of amendments. In another pertinent case, Coleman against Miller (1939), the Court said that the question of what constitutes a reasonable limit of time for ratification is a political matter Congress is empowered to determine under article V.

So we are left to determine what constitutes a reasonable time period.

It can be argued, it seems to me, that the present 95th Congress can judge the reasonableness of the time period as well as the 92d Congress which enacted the ERA with the original 7-year period for ratification.

I think we must judge this question on the basis of whether the conditions that existed in 1972 when Congress passed the ERA continue to exist and whether the ERA remains responsive to public needs.

I happen to believe that the equal rights amendment continues to be viable, and that its passage continues to be imperative if we are to guarantee that every person in this country has equality under the law.

The ERA has been approved by two-thirds of the U.S. Congress, by 34 of the 50 States, and is favored by a majority of the American people, according to public opinion polls. In Iowa, where the ERA was ratified in 1972 and where the legislature has just passed a State ERA, the margin is 59 to 34 percent in support of the equal rights amendment.

There is no question that interest in the ERA remains high and that a great deal of support exists for it. As a result, I think it is appropriate that Congress extend the time for ratification of the amendment.●

OPENING OF THE MINNESOTA ZOOLOGICAL GARDEN

● Mrs. HUMPHREY. Mr. President, on May 22, after decades of vision, years of planning, fund raising by dedicated citizens in Minnesota, and actual construction, the dream of so many has become a reality: The Minnesota Zoological Garden was opened to the public.

The opening of the new zoo, incorporating the most modern concepts in zoo facilities that preserve and respect the freedom of animals, is a landmark event. About a month ago, I had the rewarding privilege of participating in a walk through the zoological garden. I was able to witness firsthand the extensive efforts that went into creating open, free roaming areas for an abundant variety of wildlife, and the thoughtful planning to develop the horticultural aspects of the zoo to closely resemble the natural environments of the animals exhibited.

I was particularly pleased with the sensitivity of the Minnesota Zoological Board to the public interest, in designing access to zoo facilities and exhibits to meet the special requirements of the elderly and handicapped. It appears that every effort was made to develop programs and design features to make the zoo an enjoyable and rewarding experience for all, including those with physical limitations and special needs, and parents with tiny infants.

Mr. President, I would like to share with my colleagues excerpts from an article on the Minnesota Zoological Garden's accessibility to the handicapped, which appeared in the Minnesota Zoological Garden's newsletter. I ask unanimous consent that these portions of this article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

ZOO ACCESSIBLE TO HANDICAPPED

In this new era of increasing awareness of the problems of the handicapped, institutions such as MZG are working to realize their responsibilities to lead the way to greater public sensivity.

All of our exhibit areas—Northern Trek, Tropics, Whales/Sealife, Minnesota Wildlife—are fully ramped. All exhibit areas (with the exception of some Sealife aquaria) are visible, no matter what the zoogoer's viewing height, through the use of plate glass or other open barriers extended to floor level.

All interior public areas, including the zoo theater, library, and gift shops, are fully ramped to accommodate wheelchair traffic. Restrooms and drinking fountains meet approved design specifications for use by those with physical limitations. Dairy Queen eating facilities are designed to be as accessible as possible. Cafeteria and checkout aisles are wheelchair width and several tables are available that accept wheelchairs.

The Northern Trek, the largest outdoor exhibit area, as viewed from a blacktop pathway (Phase I about a mile in length) that will be kept clear of debris and snow throughout the year. Alternative access to these exhibits (as well as to new exhibits to be added over the next few years) is provided by ZooRide, a monorail train system (projected completion: Autumn, 1978). Though still in the construction stage, MZG has been assured by the supplying firm that the monorail will accommodate persons in wheelchairs. The MZG Solar Energy exhibit, also projected for completion this autumn, will be fully ramped and will provide indoor access from the main building complex to the monorail loading station.

The Children's Zoo is designed for close animal contact, feeding and handling, as well as intimate views into the lives of smaller animals such as honeybees, hummingbirds and tarantulas. The benefits of this type of open animal area may also cause problems for some zoo visitors. The Children's Zoo outdoor plaza is accessible and easily viewable, though the animal contact space is inaccessible to wheelchairs, due to animal traffic, containment and crushed rock surfaces. Most interior exhibit areas can accommodate wheelchair traffic. There are some access limitations, however, due to stairway needs and certain space limitations.

Programs for the blind, deaf and mentally handicapped are under development by the Interpretive Services/Education Department. Such opportunities are presently extended mainly to school groups, though expansion of these programs to the general public will proceed as time permits. Resource people willing to help with handicapped program development or training of volunteers are invited to call IS/E at the number listed below. We can use your expertise!

MZG Public Safety, First Aid, and Lost and Found areas are accessible by ramps or elevator. First Aid staff includes three full-time Emergency Medical Technicians. In addition, the entire Public Safety staff has been trained in basic first aid and cardiopulmonary resuscitation.

Several other services have been instituted to make visits to the zoo both safer and more convenient. Parking spaces near the zoo entrance gates are reserved for handicapped parking. The lower level entrance has a turnaround drive for dropoffs and all curbs are ramped. Entrance gates, adjacent to general public turnstiles, can be opened by admissions clerks to provide entrance for those in wheelchairs. Limited numbers of wheelchairs and adult-size strollers are available for public use.

To facilitate communications, a public address system is installed throughout most areas at the zoo and can be used for emergency announcements. All directional signage and graphics are designed to be as visually accessible as possible. In most areas, a universally recognized system of symbols (including the symbol of accessibility) has been used. Script for signage is large and easy to read.●

QUIET SHORT-HAUL RESEARCH AIRPLANE—AN EXAMPLE OF GOVERNMENT-INDUSTRY COOPERATION

● Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, the quiet short-haul research airplane recently was "rolled-out" in a ceremony at Boeing Field, Seattle, Wash. This milestone in the development of the QSRA program is part of a 10-year effort to provide the necessary technology for solving two of commercial aviation's most difficult problems—excessive airport noise and congestion.

With present air traffic growth, our existing terminals and ground handling systems wil be overwhelmed unless major new airport facilities are developed. An alternative to this approach is to use existing secondary airports and the shorter, secondary runways at existing major airports. Moreover, airline deregulation is likely to expand the market for commuter-type service at secondary airports feeding major hubs. This type of air service will require a new airplane with short takeoff and landing performance for the short fields and with high maneuverability to fit within existing traffic patterns at very low noise levels. All of these technological capabilities are incorporated in the quiet short-haul research airplane.

The QSRA is a 50,000-pound airplane with four Lycoming YF–102 engines and the fuselage shell of a C–8A Buffalo. In structure, the airplane is newly designed for high speed cruising. The propulsive lift concept of upper surface blowing is used to provide efficient high-lift performance in combination with wing shielding to minimize ground noise.

Wind tunnel model testing of the QSRA's performance has been more successful than the original program requirements. The approach lifting capability is the highest ever demonstrated in flight with commercial operating margins—three times that of the 737, which has the highest capability of present commercial airplanes. Control power will substantially exceed normal operating requirements. The airplane design is highly versatile, making it practical to explore a wide range of operating conditions, including various field lengths for landings and takeoffs. In addition to having the highest lift capability, the QSRA will be the quietest jet airplane ever flown. This is the result of using modern, high bypass ratio engines and placing the engines above the wing. The maneuvering and operating flexibility of the airplane will permit further reduction of noise on the ground.

NASA will determine and document the QSRA's full operating capability for another year. Following that, a flight experiments program is planned to further extend the airplane technology with advances in aerodynamics, guidance, navigation, and control systems, operating procedures, and further reductions in noise. These flight experiments should be most valuable, not only for their application to short takeoff and landing and short-haul operation, but for their use in conventional aircraft as well.

The Boeing Co. conducted the QSRA program for NASA's Ames Research Center. The project was completed on schedule and under budget. In addition, the quiet short-haul research airplane exceeds the technical requirements which were established initially. The program is a good example of positive cooperation between Government and industry. Both Boeing and NASA are to be commended. Dr. Alan M. Lovelace, Deputy Administrator of NASA and Mr. T. A. Wilson, chairman and chief executive officer of the Boeing Co., as well as other officials attended the rollout ceremony for the quiet short-haul research airplane on March 31, 1978.

NEW YORK CITY BAR SUPPORTS ESTABLISHMENT OF AN OFFICE OF CONGRESSIONAL LEGAL COUNSEL

● Mr. ABOUREZK. Mr. President, I am pleased to announce that the prestigious Association of the Bar of the City of New York has just issued a report favoring the establishment of an Office of Congressional Legal Counsel. The Senate has twice adopted legislation to establish such an office and similar legislation is now pending in the House. I ask that the report be printed following my statement.

On June 27, 1977, the Senate adopted legislation to establish an Office of Congressional Legal Counsel as title II of S. 555, the Public Officials Integrity Act. A similar proposal was adopted on July 21, 1976, as title II of S. 495, the Watergate Reform Act. The other titles of these two bills—on appointment of temporary special prosecutors and on Governmentwide financial disclosure—are better known than title II. This fact does not, however, detract from the significance of the congressional counsel proposal.

The Bar Association report concludes that establishing a Congressional Counsel Office "promises more effective representation" for Congress in court and that establishing "a single (House-Senate) office affording consistency, anticipation and coordination is preferable." The report even raises the possibility that the existing arrangement whereby the Justice Department represents Congress may violate "the constitutional requirement of separation of powers." Finally, the report endorses the provisions in title II authorizing Congress to seek civil enforcement of congressional subpenas.

As I said in a January 26, 1978, statement on the need for a Congressional Counsel Office:

It is time for Congress finally to wake up to the fact that litigation affecting Congressional interests will not go away if Congress takes no steps to protect its interests. In fact, the converse is true. The less Congress acts vigorously to protect its constitutional rights in court, the more Congress further encourages litigants to attempt further to erode these rights. These facts are just as true when Congress and the executive branch are controlled by the same party. Congress needs its own counsel irrespective of the attitudes and policies of the executive branch. 124 Cong. Rec. S602.

By endorsing this important proposal I hope the Bar Association report helps to alert other Members to the need for a Congressional Counsel Office.

EXHIBIT 1

THE ESTABLISHMENT OF AN OFFICE OF CONGRESSIONAL LEGAL COUNSEL

In recent years there has been a rise in the numbers of lawsuits involving Congress and its members and in the problems associated with representation by the Department of Justice. Similarly, there has been impetus for expanding the means of recourse available to Congress to obtain subpoenaed information. As a consequence, it has been proposed that an office of congressional legal counsel be established and that, among other things, it be empowered to bring proceedings in federal court to enforce congressional subpoenas and to defend members of Congress when they are sued in their official capacities. This proposal forms the basis of Title II of S. 555, which passed the Senate on June 27, 1977. This report focuses only on the provisions of this bill relating to an office of congressional legal counsel.

Subject to the comments contained in this report, we favor the establishment of an office of congressional legal counsel. We oppose, however, vesting jurisdiction in such an office to intervene as a matter of right in any pending legal proceeding in which the constitutionality of a statute is at issue. We believe that the granting of such jurisdiction would raise serious constitutional problems and be unwise as a matter of policy.

I. SUMMARY OF LEGISLATION

Title II of S. 555 would (1) grant jurisdiction to the federal district court for the District of Columbia to hear civil actions brought to enforce a congressional subpoena and (2) create an office of congressional legal counsel. The office of congressional legal counsel would be headed by a single counsel and staffed by a deputy counsel and such other assistant counsel as would be necessary to perform the duties of the office, subject to available appropriations. A list of candidates for the position of counsel and deputy counsel would be proposed by the majority and minority leaders of the Senate and the House of Representatives, and from this list the counsel and the deputy counsel would be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, subject to approval of both Houses by a concurrent resolution.

The counsel would have the responsibility of appointing assistant congressional legal counsels. Neither the counsel nor his assistants could "engage in any other business, vocation or employment" during their terms of service. The terms of the counsel and his deputy would expire at the end of the Congress following the Congress during which the appointments were made. Congress could remove the counsel or deputy counsel at any time by concurrent resolution and could reappoint the counsel or deputy counsel at the termination of any term of service.

The counsel would be directly accountable to a joint leadership group composed of the Speaker of the House, the President pro tempore of the Senate, the majority and minority leaders of both Houses, the chairman and ranking minority member of the judiciary committees of both Houses, and the chairman and ranking minority member of the committee in each House having jurisdiction "over the contingent fund of that body."

The principal duties of the congressional legal counsel would be (1) to bring civil actions in federal district court to enforce or secure a declaratory judgment concerning the validity of congressional subpoenas; (2) to defend Congress, the House, the Senate, offices and agencies of Congress and their officers and employees, and committees, subcommittees, members, officers, and employees of either House in any civil action in which any of them was named as a defendant and in which the validity of a proceeding or action by them in an official or representative capacity was placed in issue or in any action in which any of the individuals described above had been subpoenaed in his official representative capacity; and (3) to intervene or appear as amicus curiae in any pending legal action in which the powers and responsibilities of Congress under the Constitution of the United States are placed in issue.

In addition to these principal duties, the counsel would be empowered to represent either house of Congress or a committee or subcommittee thereof in immunity proceedings under Section 201(a) of the Organized Crime Control Act of 1970. He would also be empowered and obligated to "advise, consult, and cooperate with" (i) the United States Attorney for the District of Columbia with respect to criminal proceedings for contempt of Congress, (ii) congressional committees that have a responsibility to identify court proceedings of vital importance to Congress or to either house, (iii) numerous offices and agencies of Congress, the House, and the Senate, (iv) any member, officer or employee of Congress, with regard to obtaining private legal counsel for such person in the event that counsel did not provide such representation, (v) specified officers of both houses with regard to any subpoena or other demand or request for the withdrawal of papers presented to either house or which raises an issue of the privileges of either house; and (vi) any committee or subcommittee with regard to rules and procedures "for the use of congressional investigative powers" and with respect to questions that may arise in the course of congressional investigations. Counsel also would maintain legal files[1] and perform other consistent duties as directed by Congress or a house of Congress.

II. ANALYSIS OF REASONS FOR THE LEGISLATION

A. Civil jurisdiction to enforce subpoenas[2]

In pursuing its duty to legislate, Congress conducts investigations, in the course of which Congress often issues subpoenas to obtain necessary information. Presently, when witnesses refuse to comply with subpoenas, Congress has only two means of recourse. It may try the witnesses before the bar of either house,[3] or it may turn the matter over to the United States Attorney for criminal contempt proceedings.[4] Neither of these methods is especially helpful in achieving the primary goal of obtaining the information sought by Congress.[5]

A congressional trial is ineffective both in practice and result.[6] A trial requires the time and efforts of congressional members who more profitably could be involved in their legislative functions. Furthermore, the process of trying a witness often has been delayed because courts frequently have reviewed congressional contempt proceedings. Most important, at least in terms of obtaining the subpoenaed information, is the fact that Congress' ability to sanction the stubborn witness is severely limited, since it can imprison him only until the end of the legislative session. Given these drawbacks, it is not surprising that this procedure has not been used since 1945.

Likewise, a criminal contempt proceeding has proved to be an unsatisfactory method of enforcing congressional subpoenas. Section 192 of Title II of the United States Code provides that any subpoenaed witness who refuses to answer any pertinent question posed by Congress shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor and shall be subject to a fine and imprisonment for not more than one year.[7] A conviction under this statute may satisfy any congressional desire to punish the unresponsive witness, but in fact the very possibility of a conviction often deters Congress from taking action when its subpoena is not complied with. Since a contempt conviction following a criminal proceeding is not purged by a subsequent disclosure of the information sought, a witness literally imperils his freedom in attempting to challenge a congressional subpoena. As a result, Congress is understandably reluctant to initiate criminal proceedings. When a subpoenaed witness resists the demand in good faith, the dilemma is obvious, as one Senator noted in precisely such a circumstance:

"I would like to make it perfectly clear that the subcommittee has no interest in punishing individuals. What we want is the subpoenaed material."[8]

The criminal contempt proceeding is justifiable only when Congress believes that the witness has acted in bad faith in refusing to testify and, under Senate 555, Congress would continue to have flexibility to certify such an action.[9]

Under S. 555 the civil enforcement proceeding becomes the preferred method in the usual situation in which a witness resists a congressional subpoena in the good faith belief that a response is not required or that the subpoena was issued ultra vires. At the conclusion of a civil proceeding to enforce a subpoena a witness who continues to resist may be found in civil contempt of Congress and imprisoned until he agrees to provide the information required. The undesirable element of punishment, inherent in the criminal proceeding, is happily absent in a civil proceeding; and a witness is able to regain his freedom simply by complying with the subpoena.

Historically, efforts to seek civil enforcement proceedings in the absence of a jurisdictional statute have not succeeded. By a standing order issued in 1928,[10] the Senate had authorized its committees to bring civil proceedings to enforce subpoenas. During the Watergate crisis the Senate Select Committee brought such a proceeding against President Nixon, but Judge Sirica held that the standing order did not confer jurisdiction on the courts to hear such proceedings.[11] Congress then passed a statute giving the district court jurisdiction over suits brought by the Select Committee to enforce subpoenas against the executive branch.[12]

Senate 555 is both broader and narrower in scope than that statute. Section 205(f) of the bill would amend Title 28 of the United States Code to grant to the federal district court in the District of Columbia original jurisdiction to hear a civil enforcement proceeding brought on behalf of Congress, either house or any committee of Congress. The jurisdictional grant, however, excludes proceedings to enforce a subpoena directed to an officer or employee of the federal government acting within his official capacity.[13] Apparently, the exclusion is the result of concern over constitutional questions involved in subpoenaing federal officers.[14] However, the language chosen may have failed to avoid this problem while creating others. The Senate report on S. 555 states that the exclusion is to be ". . . construed narrowly. Therefore, a subpoena against federal governmental officers or employees not acting within the scope of their official duties is not excluded from the coverage of this jurisdictional statute." [15]

This standard often will be virtually impossible of application. Under this bill, would the federal court have jurisdiction to hear a civil proceeding against an executive officer or an employee suspected of illegal conduct, as in the Watergate affair, for example, or in a civil rights action? If so, this jurisdictional statute would require the court, in order to determine if it has jurisdiction, to review the actions of the federal officers to determine whether they were acting within the scope of their official duties.

The procedures prescribed in the bill which must be followed by a committee intending to bring a civil enforcement proceeding are stated to be an exercise of the rule-making power of each house, and the question whether a committee followed the required procedures in filing a report is expressly made not reviewable by a court of law. The purpose of this provision is to insure that failure to follow such procedures may not be used by recalcitrant subpoenaed parties as "another technicality" to defeat the enforcement of the subpoena.[16]

In subpoena enforcement proceedings Congress may seek to otbain either an order of the court requiring the witness to comply with the subpoena or a declaratory judgment that the subpoena is valid. In the latter case, the subpoenaed party will have the opportunity to comply before being ordered to do so by the court.[17] In either case if the witness refuses or fails to obey such an order, Congress may initiate a summary contempt proceeding, which is to be considered expeditiously by the court.[18] The sanctions imposed after such a proceeding are intended to compel obedience to the court's order. To insure that such sanctions are effective, however, they are not to abate upon adjournment sine die at the end of a Congress if the party which issued the subpoena certifies to the court that its interest in obtaining the information is a continuing one. This provision, while attempting to insure an effective sanction, also protects the rights of the subpoenaed party; he must be released from confinement upon the adjournment sine die at the end of a Congress unless the Congress affirmatively certifies its continuing interest in the information sought. The provision is, however, harsh on a defendant from whom testimonial evidence is sought who decides to purge himself of contempt during a recess; with Congress not in session, there would be no one before whom to testify.

B. Roles of the congressional legal counsel

Congress requires and receives considerable legal assistance provided on an ad hoc basis primarily by the Department of Justice [19] and to a lesser extent by private counsel. Although standing and special committees and subcommittees normally have staff counsel, the principal role of staff counsel is that of counselor and advisor, and cases in which staff counsel have taken a litigation role [20] are rare. Congress, however, is regularly and frequently involved or interested in pending litigation.

Senate 555 isolates four broad categories of litigation to which the congressional legal counsel could be assigned in appropriate circumstances. The first category is the largest, namely, cases in which Congress, its houses, an office or agency of Congress or the officers or employees of such office or agency, or any committee, subcommittee, member, officer or employee of either of the houses of Congress, had been made defendants on account of their performance of official functions or in which they had been subpoenaed. In such cases, congressional legal counsel would be directed to act as defense counsel. The second category relates to the civil enforcement proceedings described above. Counsel normally would be the attorney for Congress, the house or the committee in whose name the enforcement proceeding was brought.[21] The third category involves cases in which Congress was not a party but in which "the powers and responsibilities of Congress under the Constitution of the United States" were placed in issue. In such cases counsel could be directed to intervene or appear as amicus curiae. The fourth category is representation of either house of Congress or any of its committees in seeking a court order granting immunity to a witness who has refused to testify or to otherwise provide information on the basis of a privilege against self-incrimination.

Supporters of an office of congressional legal counsel say that reliance on private counsel is too expensive and that private attorneys lack the familiarity with the specialized historical material regarding the constitutional status, customs, and procedures of Congress necessary for effective representation.[22] We suspect that the proposal for a congressional counsel is best defended on the latter ground. Creating a legal office to handle a caseload which is only intermittently demanding or important may turn out to be far more expensive than private attorneys hired on an as-needed basis for particular assignments. Furthermore, the bill would not eliminate the power to retain private counsel to represent Congress, and it is not unlikely that when a case of major constitutional importance arose, Congress would hire distinguished outside counsel.

The Department of Justice has regularly provided the legal representation for Congress, its houses, officers, members, committees and subcommittees. As the amount and seriousness of litgiation in which Congress is involved or in which it has an interest has greatly increased during recent years, however, the problems connected with the Department's representation of Congress also have increased. Principal among these problems is the conflict of interests that frequently exist between the legislative body and the executive branch of which the Department is a part.[23]

Indeed, because the Department represents both the executive and the legislative branches it has been required on occasion to argue inconsistent positions with respect to a single issue. For example, in Gravel v. United States,[24] the Solicitor General asserted arguments that, if successful, would have limited the scope of the speech and debate clause that grants members of Congress immunity from prosecution for the performance of official functions. The Senate appeared in the case as amicus curiae and presented arguments in opposition to those of the Solicitor General. In Doe v. McMillan,[25] a suit in which the speech and debate clause was central to the defense, the Department of Justice represented the legislative defendants in the two courts below. When the case reached the Supreme Court it became apparent that the Solicitor General would have been obliged to argue, in defense of his current legislative clients, a position inconsistent with one he had only recently taken on behalf of his executive clients in Gravel. The Department, therefore, ceased its representation of the legislative defendants, who were obliged to seek new counsel at the Supreme Court level.[26] Indeed, although the issue has never been formally raised, it is possible that the Department's representation of Congress violates the constitutional requirement of separation of powers.[27]

The Gravel case highlights another problem caused by the Department's representation of both the executive and legislative branches. Under the constitutional principle of checks and balances the two branches are frequently in an adversarial position.[28] In such situations, even where the Department has already commenced representation of Congress, when the executive branch demands legal assistance the Department will withdraw from the congressional representation and actively represent the executive branch. Although there has never been any question concerning the good faith of the Department, such occurrences place Congress at a severe disadvantage.

Furthermore, although the statements are invariably deferential and correct, there is a strong undercurrent in congressional comments on Justice Department representation that Congress has received less than it is entitled to as a co-equal branch of the government.[29]

Title II of Senate 555 would not establish the office of congressional legal counsel as the single source of legal counsel for Congress. Although it is expected that counsel would advise committees and officers of Congress in the course of their official activities,[30] the office is intended primarily to be the litigation arm of Congress. Counsel would not be a general counsel for Congress and committee staff counsel would continue to function.[31]

When properly directed to do so, congressional legal counsel would assume control over the four categories of litigation described above. Two of the categories—subpoena enforcement proceedings and immunity proceedings—require no detailed discussion. Since Congress in this bill creates jurisdiction in the federal district court to hear civil enforcement proceedings brought on behalf of the proper house or committee of Congress, it follows that Congress should have an attorney to bring such cases. Section 205 gives council the power to bring such proceedings when properly authorized to do so.

Footnotes at end of article.

The fact that Congress here is involved in an "enforcement" function raises no serious constitutional separation of powers problems, since this is a matter of Congress' enforcing its investigative powers rather than a statute or law.[32] Similarly, Congress already has established a mechanism to obtain court orders granting immunity to certain witnesses. Senate 555 will empower the congressional legal counsel to represent Congress in obtaining such orders.

The other two categories require some discussion, the defense function because it represents the most common type of litigation in which Congress is involved and the intervention and amicus curiae function because it raises potentially serious constitutional problems.

Defense of Congress

Section 204 provides that congressional legal counsel, when directed to do so, would defend Congress, a house of Congress, an office or agency of Congress, a committee, subcommittee, member, officer, or employee of a house of Congress when any of such parties are made defendants in a civil action and in which there was placed in issue the validity of any proceeding of, or action taken by, such defendants in an official or representative capacity. Counsel would also represent such parties in any proceeding where such parties are subpoenaed to appear and produce documents.[33]

The language of this section carefully avoids the creation of "a free legal defense fund for personal legal matters of members of Congress or their employees." [34] At the same time, the presumption is established that in any civil suit that raises the question of whether actions of a member, officer or employee of Congress are part of his official duty, congressional legal counsel can be directed to defend him. Thus, it has been argued: "[I]f there is a close question as to whether a particular action is within the official duties of the individual, Congress must have the option of authorizing representation by the Congressional Legal Counsel." [35] Senate 555 preserves this option.

If Title II of S. 555 is enacted, it can be expected that counsel will be directed to defend Congress, or individuals or entities associated with Congress in, inter alia, cases (1) challenging acts of Congress; (2) challenging subpoenas issued by Congress or any of its committees; (3) attempting to compel performance of official functions; (4) attempting to prevent performance of official functions; (5) attempting to recover damages resulting from the performance of official functions by an individual or entity associated with Congress; (6) challenging the status of individuals as members of Congress; or (7) attempting to compel production of congressional documents. However, Senate 555 does not broaden the category of cases in which members, officers or employees of Congress will be entitled to representation. With few exceptions the Department of Justice has previously represented such individuals in these types of cases.

Section 204 does not permit representation by congressional legal counsel when the action involves unofficial activities of the defendant. Thus, for example, counsel would not represent members of employees in suits dealing with campaign practices, in suits alleging individual abuses of certain privileges (such as abuse of the franking privilege [36]), and in private damage suits. Also, criminal proceedings against an individual associated with Congress are beyond the scope of the bill.

Counsel is also empowered to defend Congress or any individuals or entities associated with Congress who have been subpoenaed if the subpoena arises from the performance of official duties. Such representation is authorized regardless of whether the subpoena is issued in a civil or in a criminal proceeding. The controlling criterion is the relationship between the subpoena and the performance of official duties.

Of course, counsel would represent an individual associated with Congress only if the individual consented to the representation.[37] In some cases it is possible that a conflict could arise between counsel's duty to protect the best interests of the individual legislative defendants and his duty under Section 209 of this bill vigorously to defend all of the constitutional powers and responsibilities of Congress. The bill prescribes procedures which are to be used in an attempt to resolve conflicts, and an individual has the right to retain private counsel on account of such conflicts or for any other reason. If the individual so chooses, congressional legal counsel is authorized under Section 208(a)(4) of the bill to advise him with respect to obtaining private counsel. Congress is authorized under Section 210(d) to make reimbursement of expenses for private counsel. Reimbursement is optional, however, and Congress may examine the individual's reasons for choosing private counsel.[38]

Our Committee believes that the present arrangement whereby Congress, and individuals and entities associated with Congress, and represented by the Department of Justice can be improved. Although this Committee does not subscribe to the prediction offered in support of the bill that establishment of an office of congressional legal counsel will not cost more than the present arrangement,[39] we believe that the bill promises more effective representation and is worth the modest additional cost involved.

Intervention or Appearance as Amicus Curiae

Section 206 provides that when directed to by either or both houses of Congress the counsel would intervene or appear as amicus curiae in any pending legal action in which the powers and responsibilities of Congress under the Constitution are placed in issue. Counsel's power to intervene exists "only if standing to intervene exists under Section 2 of Article III of the Constitution of the United States" (§ 206(a)).

While a reading of Section 206(a), which permits participation as intervenor or amicus curiae were the "powers and responsibilities of Congress under the Constitution" are at issue, might suggest that intervention would be limited to cases involving procedural issues, such as separation of powers, other sections make it clear that participation in a much broader class of cases is contemplated. Thus, Section 209(7) provides that in performing any function under the Title, the counsel "shall defend vigorously when placed in issue . . . the constitutionality of Acts of Congress;" and Section 212(b) requires the Attorney General to notify the counsel whenever he or the Solicitor General has decided not to appeal a decision holding an act of Congress unconstitutional.

Hence, it seems clear that participation by congressional counsel could be authorized in every case in which the constitutionality of a statute were attacked.

Intervention, of course, means much greater involvement in a case than does participation as amicus curiae. When one intervenes in an action one becomes a party and is bound by any decision in that action. Any participation as amicus curiae simply enables the participant to inform the court of his views but does not bind him to the results of the action. While this Committee can see no constitutional problem with respect to Congress' participation as amicus curiae in pending legal actions when appropriate, the Committee believes that the issue of intervention by Congress—at least in the ordinary case in which the constitutionality of a statute is at issue—raises serious constitutional problems. The power and duty to enforce the Constitution and laws of the United States is exclusively part of the President's constitutional responsibility to take care that the laws be faithfully executed.[40] The counsel would not be part of the executive branch since he would be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House. Rather, he would represent the interests of Congress, and thereby possibly infringe on the exclusive authority of the executive branch. Furthermore, the government must be able to speak with one voice. Stipulations, settlements, and appeals become complicated if not impossible if two counsels purporting to represent the United States take opposite positions.

A principal motivation for including intervention as an option in addition to amicus curiae participation is that an amicus curiae cannot take an appeal; an amicus is therefore powerless to act unless one of the parties appeals. Concerned about cases in which the Justice Department decides not to appeal rulings holding acts of Congress unconstitutional, the draftsmen of S. 555 wanted Congress to be able to do the job itself. We believe, however, that this is simply not Congress' role under our constitutional scheme. It is the function of the executive to represent the government in court. The question whether the executive must in order to "take care that the laws be faithfully executed" exhaust appellate remedies where an act of Congress has been declared unconstitutional is an interesting one. If Congress believes that the executive branch must do so, Congress might consider seeking a writ in the nature of mandamus to compel the executive to file an appeal the next time an appropriate case arises. In our opinion the provision that "counsel shall be authorized to intervene only if standing to intervene exists" is an unsatisfactory evasion of the responsibility for confronting this problem.[41]

While the case against amicus participation is not as strong as the case against intervention, we believe that Congress should not give counsel power to do either. Our system of separation of powers works best when head-on clashes between branches of the government are avoided. To make the fighting of such battles a part of counsel's job will generate institutional pressure to provoke confrontations.[42] When from time to time a case arises in which the voice of Congress ought to be heard, Congress can make an individual determination to seek to appear as an amicus curiae [43] and can authorize counsel or any other lawyer to represent it.

III. ANALYSIS OF PROCEDURAL AND TECHNICAL ASPECTS OF THE BILL

A. A single office for both Houses of Congress

Senate 555 reflects the strong preference of the sponsors of the bill to have a single office of Congressional legal counsel for both houses of Congress. Although the bill provides in Section 202 that the office would be accountable to a joint leadership group drawn equally from both houses, the authorization procedures are drawn so as to give each house sole control with respect to matters relating only to it.[44] In this way, neither house can dominate the counsel and each has equal access to the counsel's services. Moreover, if there is conflict between demands being made by both houses, S. 555 provides that the joint leadership group must resolve the conflict before counsel can represent either house.

We agree that a single office affording consistency, anticipation and coordination is preferable. In the usual case in which congressional legal counsel would be called upon, the interests involved would be those of Congress as an institution rather than those of a particular house. The development of coherent, long range strategies for protecting the interests of Congress would be helped if the cases were centralized in one office, and the cost of one office would be substantially less than the cost of two. Furthermore, the bill is structured so as to ensure that the congressional legal counsel would be no less effective in representing a particular house than its own counsel would be.

The composition of the joint leadership group would prevent either house from dominating the counsel, and the authorization procedures deny the other house any role where the case involves just one of them.

B. Subpoena enforcement

Section 205 of S. 555 empowers the congressional legal counsel, when so directed by the appropriate unit of Congress, to bring a civil action "to enforce, to secure a declaratory judgment concerning the validity of, or to prevent a threatened failure or refusal to comply with, any subpoena" issued from Congress.*

Counsel can be directed to bring such an action only by a resolution of either or both houses of Congress authorizing a committee or a subcommittee to bring such an action. When a committee or subcommittee seeks enforcement, the resolution must be reported out of the full committee by the majority of members voting, a majority being present. The committee report must state (i) the procedure followed in issuing the subpoena, (ii) the extent to which the subpoenaed party has complied, (iii) any objections or privileges raised by the subpoenaed party, and (iv) "the comparative effectiveness of bringing a civil action under the section, certification of a criminal action for contempt of Congress, and initiating a contempt proceeding before a House of Congress."

In light of the fact that the civil enforcement of subpoenas has been proposed precisely because in most cases it is more efficient and more effective than either of the means presently available to Congress to enforce its subpoenas, the last provision quoted above appears superfluous. It is anomalous that a Congress which has concluded that a criminal proceeding is ordinarily inappropriate and ineffective should require a congressional committee to reassert a justification for preferring a civil proceeding each time it desires to initiate one. It would make more sense to require a reporting committee that intends to use any method other than a civil enforcement proceeding affirmatively to state a justification for doing so.

C. Authorizing counsel to act

Section 203 outlines a remarkably detailed procedure for authorizing congressional legal counsel to act. Basically, the bill provides that counsel may act in a matter involving only one house on a two-thirds vote of the leadership of that house or a resolution of its members and may act in a matter involving both houses on a two-thirds vote of the joint leadership group or on a concurrent resolution. There are, however, a number of exceptions.[46]

Since Congress is a collegial body whose constitutent houses ordinarily act by means of votes of their entire memberships and since intervening in or otherwise participating in litigation may amount to seeking a legislative goal through the judicial process, it seems desirable that such ventures be approved by a vote of the members of the house or houses involved. Except for the special case of subpoena enforcement, the bill would require the house or houses involved to vote approval before the counsel would be permitted affirmatively to involve Congress in a case. Where, however, the Congress or one of its members or employees is named as a defendant in a suit the joint legislative group may authorize the counsel to provide a defense. While it might be argued that delegation to the joint legislative group should not be permitted in these cases as well, the role of the joint legislative group permits action while Congress is not in session and speedy authorization in emergency situations. Given the composition of the joint legislative group and the requirement of a two-thirds vote, it appears most unlikely that a vote of the group would not reflect the will of Congress.

D. Eligibility to serve as congressional counsel

As noted previously, congressional legal counsel must be appointed by the President pro tempore of the Senate and the Speaker of the House from among a list of candidates recommended by the bipartisan leadership of the Senate and the House. The bill expressly prohibits appointment on the basis of political affiliation and thus establishes a type of merit selection system.

In an apparent attempt to insure that the counsel selected will be professional, objective, and not overly involved in the partisan or parochial aspects of congressional activities,[47] the bill prohibits the appointment of any person who within the previous three years (i) was a member of Congress, (ii) was a candidate for congressional office, (iii) actively participated in the management or conduct of a congressional campaign, or (iv) was an officer or an employee of either house of Congress. We believe that these exclusions are ill-conceived. Because one of the goals of the bill is to obtain for Congress a legal representative who has a sophisticated understanding of Congress and its operations, it is counter-productive to exclude any person who has had any official connection with Congress during the three immediately prior years. And whatever limitations are enacted, Congress will employ the counsel it deserves. Exclusion of a group which includes a number of the most qualified potential candidates merely because they might be in a position to exercise political influence will not stop a Congress so motivated from filling the position on a political basis. This being so, there is no reason to prevent a Congress concerned only with the merits from having access to all qualified candidates.

E. Advisory Role

The bill contains a rather odd provision (in Section 203(e)) to the effect that the counsel could make no recommendation in connection with the consideration of a resolution or a concurrent resolution which would authorize the counsel to act. A principal reason for establishing the office of counsel is to develop a repository of knowledge and expertise on the institutional interests of Congress; Congress should not deprive itself of the counsel's judgment as to whether his office should be authorized to proceed in a particular case. Indeed, Section 203(e) seems inconsistent with Section 206 (b), which imposes a duty on the counsel to notify the joint leadership group of any action in which he believes that Congress or a house of Congress should intervene or appear as amicus curiae together with the reasons for his opinion.

CONCLUSION

Subject to the comments noted throughout this report, we favor the establishment of an office of congressional legal counsel and the granting of civil jurisdiction to enforce congressional subpoenas.

Respectfully submitted,

The Committee on Federal Legislation*.

See note 32, supra, and accompanying text.
[41] Congress' standing is problematical at best where all that is at issue is the constitutionality of a statute. Congress as an institution could well be met with the same arguments that have been used to deny individual congressmen standing. Congressmen have been held to have no greater interest than any other citizen in enforcement of laws, see Harrington v. Bush, 553 F.2d 190 (D.C. Cir. 1977); Harrington v. Schlesinger, 528 F.2d 455, 459 (4th Cir. 1975), since the responsibility for enforcing laws is in the executive branch, see, e.g., Holtzman v. Schlesinger, 484 F.2d 1307, 1315 (2d Cir. 1973), cert. denied, 416 U.S. 936 (1974). However, cases may arise in which Congress would appear to have standing to intervene. See note 43, infra.
[42] Cf. remarks of Senator Baker quoted in note 39, supra.
[43] Occasionally, intervention may be appropriate. Cf. United States v. AT&T, 551 F.2d 384 (D.C. Cir. 1976) (Department of Justice sued AT&T to block it from complying with subpoena of congressional subcommittee; Rep. Moss intervened for himself, his committee, and the House).
[44] The joint leadership group, as earlier noted consists of the Speaker of the House, the President or Deputy President pro tempore of the Senate, the majority and minority leaders of both houses, the chairman and ranking minority member of the judiciary committees of both houses, and the chairman and ranking minority member of the committees of each house having "jurisdiction over the contingent fund of that body."
[45] As Senator Abourezk has noted (123 Cong. Rec. S. 10725 (June 27, 1977)), even under the detailed procedures for authorization it sometimes will be unclear what section of the bill is to be applied when directing counsel to act. Both Senator Abourezk and Senator Ribicoff urged a "common-sense approach" to the interpretation of these procedures. Id.

● Mr. HATHAWAY. Mr. President, I wish to express my strong endorsement of Ken Curtis to be a member of the Canada-United States International Joint Commission.

Ken has furnished distinguished public service at many levels of government, and most recently served as Chairman of the Democratic National Committee.

His appointment to the Commission is a fitting one, since one of the many achievements of his administration while Governor of Maine was an increased sensitivity to relations with the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick, who constitute Maine's neighbors for 610 miles of international boundary.

Canadians frequently observe that while they are reasonably conversant with the ways of America, Americans are sadly ignorant of Canada and its workings. Ken Curtis should offer a healthy antidote to that malaise.

His kindness and generosity will continue to earn for him the respect which he and his leadership have long enjoyed throughout the State of Maine and I am in full support of his nomination today.●

IN COMMEMORATION OF HECTOR GUTIERREZ RUIZ AND ZELMAR MICHELINI

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, we commemorate the assassination of two prominent democratic leaders of Uruguay. One of them, Hector Gutierrez Ruiz, was the Speaker of the House of Representatives until it was dissolved in 1973 at the time of the military coup. The other, Zelmar Michelini, was a Senator, a former Cabinet Minister, and a Presidential candidate.

They came from different political parties. One was a "Blanco" and the other a "Colorado"—the two traditional democratic parties in Uruguay. But they were united in their struggle for human rights and a prompt return to democratic rule in their country.

In 1973, after the coup in Uruguay, Michelini, Gutierrez Ruiz and a third prominent Uruguayan, Senator Wilson Ferreira Aldunate, sought refuge in Argentina. But after the March 1976 military coup in Argentina, Uruguayan security forces operated with impunity in Argentine territory, persecuting the Uruguayan exile community.

Two years ago today, in May 1976, both Uruguayan legislators were kidnapped and subsequently brutally murdered. Senator Ferreira Aldunate managed to escape, leaving Argentina under the protection of the Austrian Embassy. Since then, Ferreira has joined in worldwide protests against the brutality of the Uruguayan regime.

Today, I want to honor the memory of these two prominent colleagues from Uruguay, who dedicated their lives to the struggle for democracy and human dignity. It is important for us, when we deal with human rights, to remember that this is not an abstract issue. There are people like us suffering every day in countries like Uruguay, where democratic freedoms have disappeared.

The best commemoration of the deaths of Speaker Gutierrez Ruiz and Senator Michelini will be the continuation of the struggle for the principles and ideals for which they died. The tide of history in Uruguay, and elsewhere in our hemisphere, is against the forces of dictatorship and repression, and toward the forces of democracy and freedom.●

JACK R. JOHNSON

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, I was proud to join with thousands of others in my hometown of Flint, Mich., who yesterday honored a distinguished leader of the labor movement and a close friend—Mr. Jack R. Johnson.

Jack Johnson is one of Flint's most distinguished citizens. He has given freely of his time and talents, and in so doing, has helped to forge a better community. I have known Jack for many years and have great admiration for his many achievements.

Jack Johnson was born and raised in the city of Flint, graduated from Flint's Northern High School, and has since played an important role in Flint's continuing growth. An active member for many years in the American Federation of State, County, and Municipal Employees, Jack rose through the ranks of this organization and now retires from the presidency of the Greater Flint AFL–CIO Council. In the past he has held many important posts, including the office of president of the AFL–CIO Council 29, and AFSCME Local 1600.

Jack Johnson is married and has two daughters. He continues to participate in various nonprofit and humanitarian organizations. Presently he works for the United Way of Genesee County as co-chairman of their government unit. In addition, he serves as board member for both the Urban Coalition and the Economic Development Commission.

On behalf of the city of Flint, his friends, and coworkers, it is with honor that I salute Jack Johnson for his achievements, contributions, and, most of all, for his willingness to help others. He has clearly earned the admiration of his community.●

THE CONSUMER COOPERATIVE BANK ACT—THE VOLUNTARY SELF-HELP CONCEPT

● Mr. HAYAKAWA. Mr. President, the Senate will soon have an opportunity to make a major commitment to the voluntary self-help concept. I am referring to the pending National Consumer Cooperative Bank Act.

Earlier this year I was pleased to testify in behalf of the bill before the Senate Subcommittee on Financial Institutions. In my testimony I stressed the importance of the self-help concept to the consumer cooperative movement. Indeed, the movement is based on this concept and that of local initiative—the very finest traditional Republican values.

The Bank will assist consumers in meeting their own needs and solving their own problems. It provides an exciting alternative to the current trend toward Government hand-out programs.

In my testimony I also responded to the concerns many small businessmen and women have expressed about the Bank. Let me assure my colleagues that those of us who support this bill are aware of both the necessity of fair competition in the marketplace and the role small business plays in the economy. This bill contains specific safeguards against the kind of unfair competition small businesses oppose. The Bank will include an assessment of the impact of any loans on existing area small businesses in its criteria for loans. Furthermore, the Senate Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs has acted to assure that the small business community will have permanent representation on the Bank's Board of Directors.

I hope my colleagues will seize this opportunity to support the self-help idea. Millions of Americans want to solve their own problems. Let us provide them the mechanism to do just that.

Mr. President, I ask that my testimony before the Senate Subcommittee on Financial Institutions be printed in the RECORD.

The testimony follows:

CONSUMER COOPERATIVE BANK BILL TESTIMONY OF SENATOR S. I. HAYAKAWA

Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the opportunity to come before the Senate Subcommittee on Financial Institutions to speak in support of a national consumer cooperative bank. I have been a member of the cooperative movement since I joined my first cooperative in 1937, and would like to share with you some of my thinking on the need for the bank.

It has been my privilege to witness first hand, in the midwest as well as in California, the efforts of consumers to run their own retailing enterprises with their own sources of funding and through their own voluntary efforts and employment of skilled management. I might add that they have done so independent of government.

This has been an enlightening experience and one, unfortunately, that too few Americans have been able to enjoy. The simple fact is that in few instances have organized consumers had the courage and tenacity to undertake their own retail businesses for themselves, or have even had the know-how to do so.

This wide and continuing gap in the fabric of American enterprise is one reason why I support the bill for a national consumer cooperative bank. The bank will provide not only initial funding through a mechanism that consumers eventually can own and control, but also technical assistance to consumers who are willing to take the big step toward becoming business owners.

Retail stores run by consumers are not the single or ultimate goal of this proposal. In fact, it seems to me that the efforts by consumers to set up their own stores may in some respects be one of the least important end results of a co-op bank. A great deal of attention, however, has been focused on this aspect of the bank because in the few instances where co-ops have been successful, they have done especially well in food distribution.

One of the frequent complaints about the bank is that it would help consumers to run stores to the disadvantage of "mom and pop" groceries and other small neighborhood businesses. It is quite obvious to those who understand retailing in America that the primary competition for all small enterprises, especially in the food field, is from large integrated chain operations.

Cooperatives, as well as other retailers, have suffered from this kind of competition. Even with assistance from the proposed bank, it is hardly conceivable that cooperatives in the retailing field will become a dominant force or one seriously threatening other small busnesses in their area.

The fact is that in a great many instances cooperatives in both rural and urban communities have helped other small businesses to grow and prosper. I could cite one example with which I am personally familiar, the Hyde Park Cooperative store in Chicago. It has been the principal magnet drawing trade to other stores in the shopping center it occupies. It has also joined with other businesses in joint operation of another center near its main location. Cooperatives have had this positive, catalytic effect in both urban and smaller rural communities.

Other small businesses really have little, if anything, to fear from cooperatives, either now or after they receive the assistance of the kind of hard-headed business advice which a bank will provide for them.

I feel this will be true also of the special assistance provided for in this bill for cooperatives serving low-income consumers. Their need for such help—both technical and financial—is of course even greater than that of the average consumer group. It should be pointed out, in addition, that it is only the low-income cooperative to which the bill proposes to make available loans and other assistance on a below-market basis. All other prospective borrowers of the bank would pay full market terms for their loans.

It appears that the major uses for this bank will be in the areas where consumers have had the least chance to exercise some kind of control over costs, and where they have been pinched the worst. These areas include health, housing, repair, transportation and other services which often are either non-existent or very difficult for the average family to get and pay for. It is in these areas especially that consumers need a great deal of assistance, both in terms of funding and the technical help a bank staff can provide.

One factor which stands out as critical in this entire matter of bank assistance to consumer cooperatives is the naivete with which consumers approach the matter of going into business. They need all kinds of technical guidance to begin to help themselves.

Finally, one other aspect of the bill I would like to emphasize involves its probable impact in rural areas in particular. Producer cooperatives in many of our farm communities have for years been able to obtain credit through the Banks for Cooperatives. In recent years, more and more nonfarm families have moved into these communities. When a cooperative's members become increasingly non-farm, the cooperative loses its eligibility for this assistance. The proposed National Consumer Cooperative Bank will be able to provide these cooperatives with the necessary assistance for which they are no longer eligible through the Farm Credit System.

Cooperatives provide Americans with a major chance to stand on their own feet and meet their own needs. It is for this reason that cooperatives have won the bipartisan support of our nation's leaders in all walks of life. I urge my colleagues to join me in supporting the national consumer cooperative bank.●

NOTICE OF DETERMINATION BY THE SELECT COMMITTEE ON ETHICS UNDER RULE 43, PARAGRAPH 4, PERMITTING ACCEPTANCE OF A GIFT OF FOREIGN TRAVEL FROM A FOREIGN ORGANIZATION

● Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. President, it is required by paragraph 4 of rule 43 that I place in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this notice of a Senate employee who proposes to participate in a program, the principal objective of which is educational, sponsored by a foreign government or a foreign educational or charitable organization involving travel to a foreign country paid for by that foreign government or organization.

The Select Committe on Ethics has received a request for a determination under rule 43 which would permit Mr. Jeff M. Bingham, administrative assistant to Senator GARN, to participate in a program sponsored by a foreign educational organization, the Atlantic Council of Young Political Leaders in Lisbon, Portugal, from May 24–28, 1978.

It has been determined that participation of Mr. Bingham in the program in Portugal, at the expense of the Atlantic Council to discuss "Eurocommunism" is in the interest of the Senate and the United States.●

THE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar Orders Nos. 759, 785, 802, and 829.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SMALL BUSINESS ENERGY LOAN ACT

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 11713) to create a solar energy and energy conservation loan program within the Small Business Administration, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Select Committee on Small Business with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the "Small Business Energy Loan Act".

SEC. 2. Section 7 of the Small Business Act is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(l)(1) The Administration also is empowered to make loans (either directly or in cooperation with banks or other lending institutions through agreements to participate on an immediate or deferred basis) as the Administrator may determine to be necessary or appropriate to assist any small business concern in financing plant construction, conversion, expansion (including acquisition of land for such a plant), or startup, and the acquisition of equipment, facilities, machinery, supplies, or materials to enable such concern to architecturally design or engineer, manufacture, distribute, market, install, or service any of the following energy measures:

"(A) Solar thermal energy equipment which is either of the active type based upon mechanically forced energy transfer or of the passive type based on convective, conductive, or radiant energy transfer or some combination of these types.

"(B) Photovoltaic cells and related equipment.

"(C) A product or service the primary purpose of which is conservation of energy through devices or techniques which increase the energy efficiency of existing equipment, methods of operation, or systems which use fossil fuels, and which is on the Energy Conservation Measures List of the Secretary of Energy or which the Administrator determines to be consistent with the intent of this subsection.

"(D) Equipment the primary purpose of which is production of energy from wood, biological waste, grain, or other biomass source of energy.

"(E) Equipment the primary purpose of which is industrial cogeneration of energy, district heating, or production of energy from industrial waste.

"(F) Hydroelectric power equipment.

"(G) Wind energy conversion equipment.

"(H) Engineering, architectural, consulting, or other professional services which are necessary or appropriate to aid citizens in using any of the measures described in subparagraphs (A) through (G).

No money shall be provided under this subsection for research and development.

"(2) No loan shall be made under this subsection if the total amount outstanding and committed (by participation or otherwise) to the borrower from the business loan and investment fund established by this Act would exceed $500,000. No loan made or effected under this subsection directly or in cooperation with banks or other lending institutions through agreements to participate on an immediate basis shall exceed $350,000.

"(3) No financial assistance shall be extended pursuant to this subsection unless the financial assistance applied for is not otherwise available on reasonable terms from non-Federal sources.

"(4) No immediate participation may be purchased unless it is shown that a deferred participation is not available; and no loan may be made unless it is shown that a participation is not available.

"(5) In agreements to participate in loans on a deferred basis under this subsection, the Administration's participation shall not be in excess of 90 per centum of the balance of the loan outstanding at the time of disbursement.

"(6) The Administration's share of any loan made under this subsection shall bear interest at the same rate as loans made under subsection (a) of this section. The maximum term of any such loan, including extensions and renewals, may not exceed fifteen years.

"(7) All loans made under this subsection shall be of such sound value as reasonably to assure repayment, recognizing that greater risk may be associated with loans made to business concerns in this field: Provided, That factors in determining 'sound value' shall include, but not be limited to, quality of the product or service; technical qualifications of the applicant or his employees; sales projections; and the financial status of the business concern.

"(8)(A) The Administration, after consultation with the Department of Energy and other Federal departments and agencies as the Administrator deems appropriate, shall publish in the Federal Register for public comment not later than sixty days after the date of enactment of this subsection proposed regulations to carry out the provisions of this subsection. The Administration shall make all reasonable efforts to solicit comments from small businesses and shall take into consideration comments submitted regarding such proposed regulations.

"(B) The Administration shall publish final regulations under this subsection not later than one hundred and eighty days after the date of enactment of this subsection.".

SEC. 3. Section 7(d) of the Small Business Act is amended by inserting "(1)" after "(d)" and by adding at the end of such subsection the following paragraph:

"(2) The Administration is authorized to hold seminars throughout the Nation to make potential applicants aware of the opportunities available under this subsection and related government energy programs, and to make grants to qualified organizations to provide training seminars for small business concerns regarding practical and easily implemented methods for design, manufacture, installation, and servicing of equipment and for providing services listed in paragraph (1) of this subsection, except that recipients of loans made pursuant to this subsection shall not subsequently be eligible for such grants.".

SEC. 4. Section 4(c) of the Small Business Act is amended—

(1) in subparagraph (B) of paragraph (1), by inserting "7(l)," after "7(i),"; and

(2) in subparagraph (B) of paragraph (2), by inserting "7(l)," after "7(i),".

SEC. 5. (a) Section 20(e) of the Small Business Act (15 U.S.C. 649(e)) is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph as follows:

"(10) For the programs authorized by section 7(l) of this Act, the Administration is authorized to make $30,000,000 in direct and immediate participation loans, and $45,000,000 in guaranteed loans.".

SEC. 6. (a) REPORT TO CONGRESS.—The Administration shall annually report to Congress the number and amount of loans, the number of applications, the total amount applied for, and the number and amount of defaults for each type of equipment or service for which loans are authorized by this subsection, and on the projected and actual energy savings and numbers of jobs created by firms through loans made under section 7(l) of the Small Business Act. The Department of Energy shall assist the Administration in obtaining information and compiling this report.

(b) PAPERWORK; MINIMIZING PAPERWORK AND REGULATORY BURDEN.—It is the intent of Congress that the paperwork burden and regulatory impact on applicants under section 7(l) of the Small Business Act shall be minimized, and that to the maximum extent practicable, the Administrator may rely upon consultation with the Department of Energy and other agencies, upon paid consultants, and upon voluntary public submissions of information to obtain market data, industry sales projections, energy savings, and other economic information needed to carry out the provisions of section 7(l)(1) (D) and (E). Nothing in this subsection shall be construed as precluding the Administrator from using any of his lawful powers to obtain information from applicants.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–828), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

Section 1. Title

Sec. 2.—Amends Section 7 of the Small Business Act, creating a new subsection (1) authorizing direct, immediate participation and guaranteed loans to certain small businesses.

Loans are for the purpose of funding plant construction, conversion, expansion (including acquisition of land), or start-ups, acquisition of equipment, facilities, machinery, supplies or materials. Loans are limited to businesses which design, manufacture, distribute, market, or install renewable energy or energy conservation measures described in this section, and to firms which provide professional architectural, engineering, or consulting services which are necessary or appropriate to the use of renewable energy or energy conservation.

Measures which would qualify their purveyors for these loans are: active solar energy systems, passive solar energy equipment of deign, photovoltaic cells and related equipment, energy conservation products or measures, biomass energy equipment (including wood heating devices), industrial cogeneration or district heating equipment, hydroelectric power equipment, wind energy equipment, and architectural, consulting, or engineering services which are necessary or appropriate to the named measures.

Par. (2)—Ceiling for guaranteed loans is $500,000; ceiling for direct loans is $350,000.

Par. (3)—Applicant must seek funding from non-Federal sources first.

Par. (4)—Applicant must seek a guaranteed loan before applying for a direct loan, and must seek a deferred participation loan before an immediate participation loan.

Par. (5)—SBA small not guarantee any more than 90 per cent of a loan under this subsection.

Par. (6)—Interest rate for this program is the same as the interest rate for the 7(a) program of SBA.

Par. (7)—Requires that loans be of sound value but recognizes that risks under this program may be greater than under other business loan programs.

Par. (8)—SBA must issue regulations governing this program within 180 days of enactment.

Sec. 3.—SBA is authorized to hold seminars to inform businesses of this program and to provide grants for seminars by private groups for training small business personnel to install energy conservation and renewable energy measures.

Sec. 4.—Renumbers paragraphs in Small Business Act to conform.

Sec. 5.—Authorizations:

For direct loan program, $30,000,000 is authorized.

For guaranteed loans, $45,000,000 is authorized.

For administrative purposes and seminars, $3 million is authorized for fiscal 1979, $2 million is authorized for fiscal 1980, and $1 million is authorized for fiscal 1981 and 1982.

Sec. 6.—(a) Reports to Congress on number and amount of loans, applications, and defaults, and energy savings achieved under the program.

(b) SBA is required to minimize paperwork and regulatory burden as much as possible.

LEGISLATIVE HISTORY

Following hearings in May, October, and November 1975, on the needs of the nascent solar energy industry, Senator Thomas J. McIntyre introduced S. 807 on February 24, 1977. The bill was referred jointly to the Select Committee on Small Business and to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources. The two major titles of S. 807 would have set up a loan program in the Small Business Administration for qualified companies which have market-ready solar energy/conservation products, and a small grants program in the Department of Energy—then the Energy Research and Development Administration—for energy-related inventions which are in need of further development.

Legislative hearings were held on S. 807 on May 25 and 26, 1977, by the Select Committee on Small Business and a related field hearing was held in Portland, Maine, on May 23, 1977.

While the proposed small grant program was added to the fiscal 1978 budget of the Department of Energy, administration witnesses testified that the proposed loan program was unnecessary.

It was the judgment of the committee at that time to give the SBA an opportunity to take administrative action to remedy the difficulties faced by small solar energy and energy conservation firms, documented at some length in the hearings. These administrative actions which were not effective, will be reviewed below.

Subsequently, S. 807 was redrafted and reintroduced by Senator McIntyre on March 13, 1978, as S. 2733. A third day of legislative hearings was held on April 3, 1978, on both S. 807 and S. 2733. S. 2733 has been subsequently redrafted again to incorporate suggestions made by witnesses, including the Administrator of the SBA, A. Vernon Weaver, and an Assistant Secretary of the Department of Energy, Donald Beattie, made at the April 3 hearing. On May 2, 1978, the House passed a nearly identical companion bill, HR 11713, by a 375 to 17 vote. Because the House bill has been passed, the committee has decided to report the Senate version, as redrafted and amended, under the House bill number.

UP AMENDMENT NO. 1322

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. McINTYRE, I send to the desk an amendment and ask that it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

The Senator from West Virginia (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD), for Mr. McINTYRE, proposes an unprinted amendment numbered 1322.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that further reading of the amendment be dispensed with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The amendment is as follows:

On page 10, delete lines 17 through 20, and substitute the following:

"(10) For the programs authorized by section 7(1) of this Act, the Administration is authorized to make $30,000,000 in direct and immediate participation loans and $45,000,000 in guaranteed loans in fiscal years 1979 through 1982."

(b) Section 20 of the Small Business Act (15 U.S.C. 649) is amended by redesignating subsection "(g)" as subsection "(h)" and inserting the following new subsection "(g)"—

"There are authorized to be appropriated to the Administration for fiscal year 1979 $36,750,000 to carry out the programs referred to in subsection (c), Paragraph (10)."

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

FARM CREDIT SYSTEM LOANS TO PRODUCERS AND HARVESTERS OF AQUATIC PRODUCTS

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2833) to amend, improve, and clarify the Farmer-to-Consumer Direct Marketing Act of 1976, which had been reported from the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry with an amendment to strike all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That section 7(b) of the Farmer-to-Consumer Direct Marketing Act of 1976 (7 U.S.C. 3006(b)) is amended by adding at the end thereof a new sentence as follows: "For each of the fiscal years ending September 30, 1979, September 30, 1980, and September 30, 1981, there is authorized to be appropriated $3,000,000 for purposes of carrying out the provisions of section 5 of this Act.".

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

A bill to extend the Farmer-to-Consumer Direct Marketing Act of 1976.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–854), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHORT EXPLANATION

S. 2833 extends the Farmer-to-Consumer Direct Marketing Act of 1976 for 3 years, and provides annual authorizations for appropriations of $3 million for fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981. The annual authorization under existing law is $1.5 million.

PURPOSE AND NEED FOR LEGISLATION

S. 2833 extends for 3 years the authorization for appropriations under the Farmer-to-Consumer Direct Marketing Act of 1976. That act directed the Secretary of Agriculture to initiate and coordinate a program designed to facilitate direct marketing from farmers to consumers.

I

In recent years, an enhanced interest has developed among farmers and consumers for direct farmer-to-consumer food marketing. In the case of consumers, the interest results from consumer preferences for fresh and unprocessed foods, and increased costs associated with conventional retailing channels. To many small farmers, especially producers of fruits and vegetables, direct marketing can mean increased financial returns and, in some cases, the continued existence of the farm as a viable economic enterprise.

A program of direct marketing contains the promise of substantial economic benefits to the Nation. The program aids smaller farmers, whose farms are in the more populated areas of the country, to stay in business. The program also makes it possible for more consumers to purchase fresh, field-ripened produce, often at lower prices than are otherwise available.

Although the Farmer-to-Consumer Direct Marketing Act places primary reliance upon private individuals and groups to take initiatives toward new methods of direct marketing, on an economically self-sustaining basis, the act encourages flexibility and innovation in those instances where direct marketing appears to be feasible and beneficial. Section 5 of the act provides that appropriated funds may be used within the States for the purpose of conducting or facilitating activities that will initiate, encourage, develop, or coordinate methods of direct marketing. The successful operation of a direct food marketing facility within a town or city can, of course, have many beneficial side effects. They include attracting people into the downtown shopping district, stimulating retail trade, and opening communications and developing understanding between rural and urban people.

II

There are various obstacles to direct marketing arrangements that are built into our economy. The program of technical assistance authorized by the Farmer-to-Consumer Direct Marketing Act helps farmers overcome these obstacles.

The direct marketing effort initiated under the Act is just getting underway. However, successes are already being realized and there is mounting enthusiasm at the local level. Theoretically, the Department of Agriculture could conduct a direct marketing program under other authorities. However, until explicit authority was enacted in 1976, the Department showed little interest in this area. While the Department is now giving direct marketing more appropriate attention, the extension of the 1976 act is necessary to assure the success of the direct-marketing program.

COST ESTIMATE

In accordance with section 252 of the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1970, the committee estimates that the costs that would be incurred by the Federal Government in carrying out the bill would not be in excess of $3 million for each of the fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981.

The committee's estimate is in accord with the cost estimates furnished by the Congressional Budget Office.

FEDERAL AID IN NONGAME FISH AND WILDLIFE CONSERVATION ACT OF 1979

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 1140) to encourage and assist the States to develop improved programs for the conservation of nongame species of native fish and wildlife, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Environment and Public Works with amendments as follows:

On page 1, line 4, strike "1977" and insert "1978";

On page 1, line 8, strike "species of native";

On page 2, line 4, strike "these species" and insert "nongame fish and wildlife";

On page 2, beginning with line 9, strike through and including line 13, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(3) Urban dwellers and other Americans have limited opportunity to participate in interpretative or recreational programs or pursuits that foster understanding of fish and wildlife and, thereby, gain a greater appreciation and awareness of the natural environment.

On page 2, line 20, strike "species have been" and insert "have been limited or nonexistent, and the limited benefits that have accrued to nongame fish and wildlife and nonconsumptive users have been indirectly";

On page 3, line 1, strike "not" and insert "neither";

On page 3, at the beginning of line 2, insert "nor fully appropriate";

On page 3, line 3, strike "species," and insert "fish and wildlife";

On page 3, line 5, strike "The";

On page 3, line 12, strike "species of native";

On page 3, line 15, strike "this" and insert "their";

On page 3, line 16, strike "practicable," and insert "practical, and consistent with each agency's statutory responsibilities";

On page 3, line 18, strike "actively seek";

On page 3, line 19, strike "species of native";

On page 3, line 20, strike "the" and insert "their";

On page 3, line 20, strike "of such species,";

On page 4, line 1, strike "insure" and insert "assure";

On page 4, line 3, strike "species of native";

On page 4, line 8, after "education," insert "propagation, population manipulation,";

On page 4, line 9, strike "transplantations" and insert "transplanting";

On page 4, beginning with line 10, strike through and including line 15, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

(2) The term "nongame fish and wildlife" means (A) all wild, unconfined birds, mammals, fishes, reptiles, and amphibians, and (B) at the dscretion of the State agency any mollusk, crustacean, arthropod, or other invertebrate which are (i) valued for cultural aesthetic, educational, or other nonconsumptive purposes; (ii) may not be legally fished for, hunted, trapped, or otherwise taken for sport, food, or commercial purposes within the period or at the place directly affected by or involved in a nongame program in a State participating in programs authorized under section 4 of this Act; and (iii) are not listed as an endangered species, or threatened species under the Endangered Species Act of 1973.

On page 5, line 7, beginning with "is certified", strike through and including line 9, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

having direct has statutory responsibility for the administration of State laws or programs for the conservation of nongame fish and wildlife occurring in such State."

On page 5, beginning with line 13, strike through and including line 21;

On page 5, line 22, strike "(5)" and insert "(4)";

On page 5, line 22, rtrike "a comprehensive and continuing" and insert "an adequate and active";

On page 5, line 24, strike "and rehabilitation";

On page 5, line 24, strike "species of";

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Federal Aid in Nongame Fish and Wildlife Conservation Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. DECLARATION OF POLICY.

(a) FINDINGS.—The Congress finds and declares the following:

(1) Nongame fish and wildlife are of ecological, economic, educational, esthetic, historical, recreational, and scientific value to the Nation and its people.

(2) The improved conservation of nongame fish and wildlife, including acquisition, retention, maintenance, and improvement of their habitat, would help assure a healthier and more esthetically pleasing environment for all Americans.

(3) Urban dwellers and other Americans have limited opportunity to participate in interpretive or recreational programs or pursuits that foster understanding of fish and wildlife and, thereby, gain a greater appreciation and awareness of the natural environment.

(4) Existing State programs for nongame fish and wildlife have been limited or nonexistent, and the limited benefits that have accrued to nongame fish and wildlife and nonconsumptive users have been indirectly supported largely on the basis of hunting and fishing license revenues and excise taxes on certain hunting and fishing equipment. These traditional financing mechanisms are neither adequate nor fully appropriate to meet the needs of programs for both nongame and game fish and wildlife and they must be supplemented.

(5) States should be encouraged to develop, expand, and maintain, in urban and nonurban areas, programs for the conservation of nongame species of native fish and wildlife.

(b) PURPOSE.—It is the purpose of this Act—

(1) to provide financial and technical assistance to the States for the development, expansion, and maintenance of conservation programs for nongame fish and wildlife; and

(2) to direct that all Federal departments and agencies utilize their statutory and administrative authority, to the maximum extent practical, and consistent with each agency's statutory responsibilities to conserve and to promote conservation of nongame fish and wildlife and their habitats, in furtherance of the policy of this Act.

SEC. 3. DEFINITIONS.

As used in this Act:

(1) The terms "conserve", "conserving", and "conservation" mean to use, and the use of, methods or procedures which are necessary to assure, to the extent practicable and desirable, the continued existence of populations of nongame fish and wildlife. Such methods and procedures may include any activity associated with scientific resources management, such as research, census, law enforcement, habitat acquisition, maintenance and development, information and education, propagation, population manipulation, live trappings, and transplanting.

(2) The term "nongame fish and wildlife" means (A) all wild, unconfined birds, mammals, fishes, reptiles, and amphibians, and (B) at the discretion of the State agency any mollusk, crustacean, arthropod, or other invertebrate which are (i) valued for cultural, aesthetic, educational, or other nonconsumptive purposes; (ii) may not be legally fished for, hunted, trapped, or otherwise taken for sport, food, or commercial purposes within the period or at the place directly affected by or involved in a nongame program in a State participating in programs authorized under section 4 of this Act; and (iii) are not listed as an endangered species or threatened species under the Endangered Species Act of 1973.

(3) The term "designated State agency" means a commission, department, division, or other unit of a State government which having direct has statutory responsibility for the administration of State laws or programs for the conservation of nongame fish and wildlife occurring in such State.

(4) The term "plan" means an adequate and active program for the conservation of nongame fish and wildlife under the jurisdiction of any State. Such plan may include a number of nongame fish and wildlife projects.

(5) The term "project" means an undertaking designed to promote the conservation of nongame fish and wildlife.

(6) The term "Secretary" means the Secretary of the Interior, acting through the United States Fish and Wildlife Service.

(7) The term "State" means any of the several States, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, American Samoa, the Virgin Islands, Guam, the Commonwealth of the Mariana Islands, and the Trust Territories of the Pacific Islands.

SEC. 4. DUTIES OF THE SECRETARY.

(a) PROGRAM.—The Secretary shall cooperate with the States in programs for the conservation of nongame fish and wildlife by providing through designated State agencies, financial assistance to carry out approved plans or projects for the conservation of such fish and wildlife. Such assistance shall be provided pursuant to the formula set forth in section 5(c) and in accordance with the requirements of sections 4(b) and 5 (e) and (f).

(b) PROMULGATION OF PROGRAM STANDARDS.—Not later than six months after the date of enactment of this Act, and after consultation with the States, the Secretary shall develop and publish such guidelines as the Secretary deems necessary and appropriate to provide that management plans and projects developed by States under section 5 of this Act result in the conservation of nongame fish and wildlife. Such guidelines shall include, but need not be limited to, the requirements set forth under sections 4(e) (2) and (3) of this Act.

(c) TRANSFER OF PERSONNEL AND EQUIPMENT.—The Secretary may, in assisting the States in carrying out programs under subsection (a), assign or transfer personnel and equipment and share scientific information, in such manner as the Secretary deems appropriate.

SEC. 5. NONGAME FISH AND WILDLIFE CONSERVATION PLANS AND PROJECTS

(a) UNEXPENDED FUNDS.—Any amount apportioned to a State pursuant to subsection (b) which is unexpended or unobligated at the close of two fiscal years may be used by the Secretary, during the succeeding two fiscal years, to assist other States in carrying out approved nongame conservation plans or projects. Any amount granted to any State under this paragraph shall be supplemental to, and shall not be charged against, any funds apportioned to such State under subsection (c). Any amount which is not expended or obligated by the Secretary pursuant to this paragraph after the close of the second such two-year period shall be made available for expenditure by the Secretary in carrying out any programs administered by the Fish and Wildlife Service which serves the nongame fish and wildlife resource.

(b) ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSE.—The Secretary may use not to exceed 8 percent of funds appropriated pursuant to this Act for the expenses incurred in administering this Act, including the study authorized by section 10. Such sums shall be available until the expiration of the next succeeding fiscal year. If any such amount remains unexpended by the Secretary at the close of such fiscal year, the Secretary shall, within 60 days thereof, apportion such amount to the designated State agencies on the same basis and in the same manner as is provided for other amounts authorized by subsection (c) to be apportioned among the States for such fiscal year.

(c) APPORTIONMENT.—The Secretary, after making deductions under subsection (b), shall, subject to the provisions of section 6, apportion the remaining appropriated funds among the several States for each fiscal year in the following manner:

(1) one-half in the ratio which the area of each State bears to the area of all of the States; and

(2) one-half in the ratio which the population of each State bears to the population of all States; except that no State shall receive less than one-half of 1 percent, nor more than 5 percent, of the total amount apportioned.

(d) CERTIFICATION.—For each fiscal year, the Secretary shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury and to each designated State agency the sum which the Secretary has estimated to be deducted for the administration of this Act under subsection (b) and the sum which the Secretary has apportioned to each State.

(e) SUBMISSIONS AND CONSIDERATION.—(1) If a State wishes to avail itself of the benefits of the Act, it shall (A) certify to the Secretary that it has a designated State agency (which shall be identified) which has adequate statutory and administrative authority and the necessary resources and personnel to conserve nongame fish and wildlife, and (B) it shall make submissions to the Secretary in accordance with paragraph (2) or (3) of this subsection. The Secretary shall consider any such submissions and make determinations thereon pursuant to paragraph (4) of this subsection.

(2) The designated State agency may prepare and submit a plan to the Secretary, with respect to the conservation of the nongame fish and wildlife within such State. Any such plan shall—

(A) include a description of all applicable methods of conservation to be used and projections as to possible future programs;

(B) indicate the general chronological order in which phases of the plan should be carried out over a period years;

(C) be designed to conserve the nongame fish and wildlife covered for the cultural, esthetic, scientific, educational or recreational benefits of the people of the State;

(D) provide for such conservation for a period of 5 or more years, and shall include a provision for review and revision at regular intervals, not to exceed 3 years.

(E) contain such other provisions as the Secretary and the State determine are necessary.

(3) The designated State agency may elect instead to avail itself of the benefits of this section by preparing and submitting proposals to the Secretary for conservation projects with respect to nongame fish and wildlife within such State. Any such proposal shall be submitted in such form and with such content as the Secretary shall prescribe pursuant to section 4(b) of this Act, and shall include a detailed description of the project involved.

(4)(A) Upon a finding that a plan submitted under paragraph (2) of this subsection or a project submitted under paragraph (3) conforms to standards and criteria established by the guidelines, the Secretary shall approve such plan or project.

(B) Upon approval, the Secretary shall notify the designated State agency of such State and shall immediately set aside, from funds apportioned under this Act, up to 75 percent of the cost of implementing segments of any plan or of the total estimated cost of the project involved except that during fiscal years 1979 and 1980, the Secretary shall fund up to 90 percent of such costs.

(5) If any Federal funds provided for an approved plan or project are used or applied for any other purpose, the State involved shall replace or return such funds before it may receive any additional apportionment under this Act.

(f) PROJECT OR PLAN FUNDING.—(1) When the Secretary finds that any approved project or plan has been completed or is being conducted in accordance with such plan or project, the Secretary shall pay the Federal pro rata share of the cost incurred in conducting such project or plan. Such payments shall be made by the Secertary to such official, officials, or depository, as may be designated by the designated State agency in accordance with the laws of such State.

(2) During fiscal year 1981, not more than 5 percent of the State's share of program costs, and beginning in fiscal year 1982 none of the States share of the program costs in any year may be from funds derived from the sale of hunting, fishing, and trapping licenses and permits.

(3) Not more than 25 percent of a State apportionment under this Act may be used for information and education programs, law enforcement, and extension services.

(g) INCREASED FEDERAL SHARE.—Whenever two or more States have a common interest in one or more nongame fish and wildlife and jointly undertake a project agreement with the Secretary for conservation of such fish and wildlife, the Federal share of the cost involved may be up to 90 percent. The Secretary is authorized to coordinate the jointly undertaken programs or project agreements.

SEC. 6. PAYMENT OF FUNDS TO, AND COOPERATION WITH RESPECT TO CERTAIN DESIGNATED AREAS.

The Secretary may cooperate with the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, American Samoa, the District of Columbia, the Trust Territories of the Pacific Islands and Marianas in the conduct of nongame fish and wildlife conservation plans and projects. Any such plan or project shall be conducted pursuant to such terms and conditions as the Secretary deems fair and equitable, and which are likely to be effective for such purpose. The Secretary may apportion to such jurisdictions, out of the money available for apportionment under this Act, such sums as the Secretary shall determine; except that such sums shall not exceed (1) for Puerto Rico, one-half of 1 percent; (2) for Guam, one-sixth of 1 percent; (3) for the Virgin Islands, one-sixth of 1 percent; (4) for American Samoa, one-sixth of 1 percent; (5) for the District of Columbia, one-half of 1 percent; (6) for the Trust Territories of the Pacific Islands, one-sixth of 1 percent; and (7) for Marianas, one-sixth of 1 percent, of the total amount apportioned for one year. The Secretary shall not require any cooperating agency cited in this section to pay an amount which will exceed 10 percent of the cost of the project involved during fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981, or 25 percent of such costs thereafter. Any unexpended or unobligated balance of any such apportionment shall be available for expenditure in any such jurisdiction in the succeeding fiscal year on any approved project and, if unexpended or unobligated at the end of such fiscal year, may be made available for expenditure by the Secretary in carrying out any programs administered by the Fish and Wildlife Service which serves the nongame wildlife resource.

SEC. 7. COOPERATION AND COORDINATION.

(a) IN GENERAL.—All Federal departments and agencies shall, to the maximum extent practical for each agency and consistent with its statutory responsibilities, cooperate and coordinate their programs and activities with the States in establishing and maintaining programs for the conservation of nongame fish and wildlife.

(b) REVIEW OF EXISTING PROGRAMS.—Each Federal department and agency which has management authority over land and water resources or interests therein shall, within one year after the date of enactment of this Act, review each of its existing programs for lands, waters, and interests therein subject to its control or authority to determine which of such programs, if any, can be extended or modified, without jeopardizing the purposes of such programs, to include the conservation of nongame fish and wildlife as authorized by this Act. Upon making an affirmative determination, any such department or agency shall notify the appropriate designated State agency and cooperate with such agency in the establishment of conservation efforts with respect to nongame fish and wildlife.

(c) COOPERATIVE AGREEMENTS.—All Federal departments and agencies are authorized to enter into cooperative agreements with designated State agencies under subsection (b). Each such cooperative agreement shall—

(1) specify those areas in which such programs will be implemented;

(2) provide, where appropriate, for habitat improvements or modifications designed to conserve nongame fish and wildlife;

(3) provide, to the extent practicable, for educational and recreational programs to foster greater appreciation and understanding of such nongame fish and wildlife; and

(4) contain such other terms and conditions as the Federal department or agency, or the State agency, deems necessary and appropriate to carry out the purposes of this Act.

SEC. 8. AUTHORIZATION FOR APPROPRIATIONS.

There are hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary to carry out the purposes of this Act for fiscal year 1979, the sum of $20,000,000, for fiscal year 1980, the sum of $30,000,000, and for fiscal year 1981 the sum of $40,000,000. Funds appropriated shall remain available until expended.

SEC. 9. ADDITIONAL REGULATIONS.

The Secretary is authorized to promulgate any rules and regulations or any amendments to existing rules and regulations which are deemed necessary to carry out the provisions of this Act.

SEC. 10. STUDY.

The Director of the United States Fish and Wildlife Service, in consultation with other Federal departments and agencies and interested persons shall conduct, out of funds available for the administration of this Act, such study or studies as may be necessary to determine (1) the best means of funding projects under this Act, (2) methods of coordinating the program authorized by this Act with existing programs of the Fish and Wildlife Service involving fish and wildlife, and (3) methods of coordinating joint programs of States as authorized in section 5(g). The Director shall report to the Congress the result of such study or studies, together with his recommendations with respect thereto, on or before the expiration of the 24-month period following the date of the enactment of this Act.

● Mr. CHAFEE. Mr. President, S. 1140, the Federal Aid in Nongame Fish and Wildlife Conservation Act of 1978, and the philosophy behind the bill, are welcome additions to the existing body of conservation legislation. Most fundamentally, the bill represents a recognition by the Congress of the importance of ecosystem management rather than just species management. S. 1140 will encourage the development of State and Federal programs which reflect a realization that while some species may be more important than others under certain circumstances, each is an integral part of the wildlife resource for which we are responsible.

The expansion of present wildlife programs envisioned in this bill will facilitate the enjoyment by millions of Americans, particularly those in our urban areas, of a vast and interesting array of wildlife that heretofore has been essentially untended. I am particularly pleased that the bill will yield benefits in environmental quality and environmental educational opportunities for a large number of citizens who, for various reasons, are currently unable to enjoy our Nation's wonderful wildlife resources.

The legislation should result in the development of some very innovative programs for the management of urban wildlife. This is most important because, as our society has grown to be increasingly urbanized, it has been difficult for a large group of Americans to remain in touch with and understand many ecological processes and relationships. By having wildlife in its natural habitat nearby, the public will be better able to understand and appreciate the importance of natural habitats, complex food chains, and other principles upon which our own existence, as well as that of wildlife, depends.

Wildlife habitat in urban areas also has important indirect environmental and economic benefits. It offsets many of the adverse environmental effects of urbanization by improving air quality, slowing storm water discharge rates, and so forth. Economic benefits will undoubtedly include an increase in property values and a reduction in open space management costs.

Mr. President, in short, the bill before us for consideration today provides the public with a means fully recognizing the importance of all our fish and wildlife resources and their contribution to our daily lives. For this reason, I strongly support S. 1140 and urge its adoption by the Senate.●

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, the Federal Aid in Nongame Fish and Wildlife Conservation Act of 1978 represents a new direction in our Nation's conservation efforts. For many years sportsmen have been the principal supporters of nearly all wildlife management programs. In the past what little effort has been made to enhance nongame species either directly or indirectly has been accomplished through revenues received from hunters and fishermen.

While it should be recognized that there will always be some overlap between game and nongame management programs it should be noted that this legislation encourages the States to develop additional sources of funding for the new nongame programs. This approach was adopted by the committee for a number of reasons. First, it seemed unfair that large amounts of money be drawn from already strained game management budgets to finance the new nongame programs. Second, since game management funds by and large come directly from consumptive users unnecessary controversy and competition could develop between the game and nongame programs if no additional source of funding is established for the new programs.

S. 1140 recognizes these problems and addresses them by mandating that in fiscal years 1979 and 1980 the State share of nongame program costs can be drawn from any funding source available to the States share of program costs is to the sale of hunting and fishing licenses. However, beginning in fiscal year 1981 only 50 percent of the State's share can be drawn from such revenues, and in fiscal year 1982 and thereafter none of the States' share of program costs is to come from such sources.

This gradual phaseout of game management funds should insure that the nongame management programs which this bill initiates will have adequate start-up funding but it also puts the States on notice that they must develop new funding sources for their programs. Over time I believe the policy adopted by the committee on this subject will be of benefit to management efforts for all our wildlife resources.

Mr. President, as I am sure you know, most Federal aid to State game management programs has historically been financed through excise taxes on hunting and fishing equipment. In testimony received by the Environment and Public Works Committee all the States and most conservation groups asserted that a similar funding scheme should be used to finance the nongame programs created in this legislation. Such a financing system allows the users of particular resources to pay directly for the management programs which benefit their activities. Excise taxes, in addition, would provide a secure and predictable source of funding for the new nongame programs, an important element in any successful management strategy.

Since the House of Representatives must act first on tax measures our committee was unable to include a provision within this bill to accommodate these requests made for an excise tax. The committee did, however, thoroughly discuss the concept and believed it might be of benefit to incorporate it into the Federal nongame legislation at some time in the future.

Mr. President, I would like to reiterate my support for the concept of nongame management contained in this legislation and hope that the Senate will approve the legislation before us today.●

● Mr. WALLOP. Mr. President, I would like to state my strong support for the Federal Aid in Nongame Fish and Wildlife Conservation Act of 1978.

I am one of many cosponsors of this important legislation, and feel that its enactment will go a long way toward promoting better nongame fish and wildlife management and programs throughout the country than have existed in the past. Traditionally wildlife management has focused on game animals, financed primarily by hunters and fishermen who buy licenses and pay taxes on sporting equipment. These programs have been highly successful and are in no way diminished by this legislation.

Unfortunately, few programs exist for the benefit of nongame species, those fish and wildlife valued for cultural aesthetic, educational, or other purposes which are not fished for, hunted, trapped or otherwise taken for sport, food, or commercial purposes. Public appreciation of all wildlife species, including nongame ones, is growing with outdoor activities like nature photography and hiking, and State game and fish agencies all support the need to broaden wildlife conservation programs for nongame species.

This legislation authorizes and directs the Secretary of Interior to provide financial and technical assistance to States wishing to participate for nongame conservation programs. A State wishing to receive Federal funds under this act would design nongame management plans or submit projects for conserving individual nongame species. Activities which might be eligible for funding include habitat acquisition and modification, census taking and population monitoring, educational and interpretative programs, and improving related law enforcement, as the State so outlines. The bill authorizes $20 million for 1979, $30 million for 1980, and $40 million for 1981. The Federal Government would pay 90 percent of the costs for 2 years, and 75 percent thereafter, while the States would fund the remaining costs. Funding would be distributed to State based equally on population and State area considerations.

In addition, S. 1140 directs all Federal agencies to coordinate their wildlife management programs with the States, and allows them to enter into cooperative agreements. I think this is especially good since States have responsibility for managing wildlife, while Federal agencies manage habitat.

My one disappointment with this legislation is that it does not create an excise tax which would provide a steady, reliable source of funding for nongame programs. Environmental groups and the State game and fish agencies recommended such an excise tax be placed on various kinds of outdoor gear, thereby allowing people enjoying outdoor activities and nongame species to support this program. However, the U.S. Constitution requires that all tax measures originate in the U.S. House of Representatives. I hope the House will enact such a measure, and in the meantime S. 1140 directs the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service to report to Congress in 2 years on alternative methods of funding this program.

A 1975 report prepared by the Wildlife Management Institute on nongame fish and wildlife programs in this country found that 35 States have instituted programs for protecting nongame species. However, less than 2 percent of the wildlife management funds authorized by these States was earmarked for nongame species. The Wyoming Game and Fish Department has developed a proposed nongame conservation program for excellent wildlife management and I think this proposed program can furnish an idea of how some States may hope to manage certain nongame species.

Mr. President, I want to compliment Senator CULVER for his excellent leadership in considering it in committee. I hope the Senate sees fit to pass it by a wide margin. Finally, I ask that the attached letter from Mr. Earl Thomas, director of the Wyoming Game and Fish Department, be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD at this time.

The letter follows:

GAME AND FISH DEPARTMENT,
Cheyenne, Wyo., May 4, 1978.

Hon. MALCOLM WALLOP,
U.S. Senator, Dirksen Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR WALLOP: This letter concerns a matter which we consider of grave importance concerning our wildlife and its environment and Congressional action with reference thereto. In our opinion, programs to enhance the habitat and encourage nongame species production have been needed for some time. Legislation has been introduced which represents an excellent initial effort to fill this need. After several redrafts to improve the legislation, the House Merchant Marine Subcommittee on Fisheries and Wildlife Conservation and the Environment, favorably reported H.R. 10255 on March 15. The full House Committee gave its endorsement to this same bill. The Senate Subcommittee on Resource Protection has favorably reported S. 1140. S. 1140 is a similar piece of nongame legislation sponsored by Senator Hart of Colorado and twenty-three other Senators. It is our hope that this bill can be reported out of the full Senate Committee on Environment and Public Works early in May.

We are told that people in the Office of Management and Budget (OMB) were opposed to legislation of this type since it represents what they call a "categorical grant program." We did not know until recently that OMB would make a special effort to lobby for the defeat of this legislation. Apparently this lobbying effort has the personal backing of President Carter. Reportedly, the main objection of the President and OMB to this legislation is its cost. The authorization ceiling for H.R. 10255 is $100 million and for S. 1140 is $90 million. At first glance, this appears to be a tremendous sum of money; however, this amount is for a three year period and we have learned that Congress rarely appropriates the maximum amount of any authorization. We would expect the actual dollars to be made available to be only $10 million or less.

We sincerely feel that it would be a mistake for the administration to kill a program of such minor financial significance which could have such major importance to general fish and wildlife conservation efforts nationwide. Nongame funding is one federal program where a relatively few dollars could go a long way. We feel that because of the President's stated opposition, many Congressmen may be inclined to vote "NO" on the bills unless they know how we feel about it. We are, therefore, expressing our support for nongame legislation and would ask that you, in your considerations of this legislation, also support its passage.

We appreciate your consideration of this concern.

Very sincerely,
EARL M. THOMAS, Director.●

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read:

A bill to encourage and assist the States to develop improved programs for the conservation of nongame fish and wildlife, and for other purposes.

The following proceedings occurred later:

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I thank the majority leader for withholding the usual motion to reconsider the vote on Calendar No. 802, S. 1140, which was done at my request, solely for the purpose of checking with the Senator from Idaho (Mr. MCCLURE).

Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which S. 1140 was passed.

Mr. HATCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–872), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GENERAL STATEMENT

Conservation of fish and wildlife has been an American tradition, rooted deeply in our Nation's heritage. As early as February 1646, Portsmouth, R.I., proclaimed May through November as closed season on the hunting of deer, and similar actions were taken in most of the Colonies by the mid-1750's. By the time of the Nation's centennial, most coastal States had enacted laws regulating the taking of fish, oysters, and other aquatic creatures from their shores. Nearly all of these and other fish and wildlife conservation actions which developed in this country, however, whether State or Federal in nature, had three features in common. First, they were generally directed toward an individual species or a small group of species such as water fowl or deer. Second, their primary purpose was to restore populations that had already been depleted. Finally, these programs focused mainly on game animals, those species which are hunted, trapped, fished, or otherwise used for consumptive purposes.

Funding for these conservation programs has come primarily from sportsmen who buy licenses and pay excise taxes on hunting and fishing equipment. These efforts have been highly successful in maintaining the populations of species that are so managed. Few programs, however, have been initiated directly for the conservation of nongame wildlife, those species which are not used in a consumptive manner. Programs which do exist for nongame wildlife, such as that which resulted from the Endangered Species Act of 1973, are limited in scope and, for the most part, are also designed to restore populations which have become depleted.

Over the last decade, professional wildlife managers and conservationists have found this "rescue mission" approach to be expensive and often ineffective. At the same time, nonconsumptive uses of wildlife resources by the public have been increasing dramatically as backpacking, wildlife observation and nature photography have become more popular. Accordingly, much attention has been focused recently on the need for programs which conserve nongame resources.

The situation was recently documented in a 1975 report prepared by the Wildlife Management Institute under contract to the Department of the Interior and the Council on Environmental Quality. The study, entitled "Current Investments, Projected Needs, and Potential News Sources, for Nongame Fish and Wildlife Programs in the U.S.", was the first comprehensive review of nongame fish and wildlife programs throughout the country. In its report, the Wildlife Management Institute found that although 35 States have instituted programs for the protection of nongame species, only $3.3 million, or approximately 2 percent of the $176 million authorized in these States for fish and wildlife management, was set aside specifically for the conservation of nongame species. The report concluded that "a nongame fish and wildlife Federal matching grant in aid program should be authorized by Congress." Similarly, in his 1977 Environmental Message, President Carter acknowledged the urgent need for nongame conservation programs.

S. 1140, the Federal Aid in Nongame Fish and Wildlife Conservation Act, is intended to fill the gap which exists in this country's fish and wildlife management programs. The bill authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to cooperate with and provide grants to the States for conserving nongame fish and wildlife. Activities which may be eligible for funding under this program include habitat acquisition and modification, census taking and population monitoring, educational and interpretative programs, and improved wildlife-related law enforcement. The bill authorizes $90 million through fiscal year 1981. The Federal share of project costs would be 90 percent in the first two years and thereafter 75 percent. States become eligible for such funds by submitting proposals for individual nongame conservation projects, or by preparing a long-range, comprehensive plan for the management of nongame conservation.

There is sufficient evidence of activity in this area to be assured that States will use these funds. On August 3, 1977, the Subcommittee on Resource Protection conducted a hearing on S. 1140 and received testimony from administration officials and representatives of State conservation agencies and national conservation groups. The subcommittee learned that the interest in conserving nongame fish and wildlife species is not a new idea at the State level. Indeed, for a number of years, several States have been conducting very active programs in this area. Colorado, for instance, is currently attempting to reintroduce to its biota the river otter, which has not been found in the State for the last 75 years. The white pelican is another nongame animal for which conservation efforts have increased. California's budget for nongame programs totaled approximately $500,000 last year, about 8 percent of the State's total fish and wildlife budget. Approximately 70 rare, endangered, or threatened species benefit from this effort, including the limestone salamander, desert pupfish, and San Joaquin kit fox.

A survey of States conducted in April 1977, by the Fish and Wildlife Service, shows a diversity of potential projects to be considered. Iowa proposes to conduct research on selected songbirds including sandpipers, gold finches, and bobolinks. Massachusetts is considering a 4 year life history and habitat study of shrews, while Delaware anticipates a public education program aimed principally at schoolchildren to convey information about life systems. Finally, Illinois has proposed a study to determine the abundance and distribution of all nongame species found in the State and to develop plans for the conservation of these animals.

While there are many reasons for the recent increased interest in the conservation of such animals, witnesses who appeared before the subcommittee cited two primary reasons. Wildlife is now recognized as an integral part of a complex community with man, rather than being viewed as isolated and separate from him. By focusing conservation efforts on game species, an important segment of our wildlife has been left unattended.

In addition, as Americans have gained more leisure time and begun looking for recreational activities, they have turned to the outdoors. Over the last decade, there has been a dramatic increase in camping, hiking, backpacking, and other nonconsumptive uses of nature.

To respond to this new interest, several States have attempted to devise innovative sources for funding these programs. California, Colorado, Washington, Ohio, Michigan, and New Hampshire have all offered wildlife stamps, decals, or personalized license plates to encourage public support and financing of these efforts. Unfortunately, however, none of these mechanisms has provided sufficient funds to sustain a comprehensive program. Thus, State witnesses unanimously supported the Federal grant-in-aid program established by S. 1140.

DR. ALLAN JOSEPH CAWLEY

The Senate proceeded to consider the bill (S. 2687) for the relief of Dr. Allan Joseph Cawley. which had been reported from the Committee on the Judiciary with an amendment on page 1, beginning with line 3, strike all through and including line 10, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

That, for the purposes of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Doctor Allan Joseph Cawley shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this Act upon payment of the required visa fee. Upon the granting of permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this Act the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper officer to reduce by one number, during the current fiscal year or the fiscal year next following, the total number of immigrant visas and conditional entries which are made available to natives of the country of the alien's birth under paragraph (1) through (8) of section 203(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

So as to make the bill read:

That, for the purposes of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Doctor Allan Joseph Cawley shall be held and considered to have been lawfully admitted to the United States for permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this Act upon payment of the required visa fee. Upon the granting of permanent residence as of the date of the enactment of this Act the Secretary of State shall instruct the proper officer to reduce by one number, during the current fiscal year or the fiscal year next following, the total number of immigrant visas and conditional entries which are made available to natives of the country of the alien's birth under paragraphs (1) through (8) of section 203(a) of the Immigration and Nationality Act.

SEC. 2. Upon compliance with the provisions of section 1 of this Act, Doctor Allan Joseph Cawley shall be held and considered to have satisfied the requirements of section 316 of the Immigration and Nationality Act relating to required periods of residence and physical presence within the United States and may be naturalized at any time thereafter if he is otherwise eligible for naturalization under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE I, 95TH CONGRESS, 2D SESSION—REMOVAL OF INJUNCTION OF SECRECY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, as in executive session, I ask unanimous consent that the injunction of secrecy be removed from the Additional Protocol I to the Treaty for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America—Executive I, 95th Congress, 2d session, transmitted to the Senate today by the President; and ask that the treaty be considered as having been read the first time, that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed, and that the President's message be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the message was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

With a view to receiving the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith Additional Protocol I to the Treaty for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America. The Protocol was signed by me on behalf of the United States on May 26, 1977.

For the information of the Senate, I transmit also the report of the Department of State on the Protocol and a copy of the Treaty to which it pertains.

The Treaty for the Prohibition of Nuclear Weapons in Latin America, done at Mexico City, February 14, 1967, constitutes the first successful attempt to establish a nuclear weapon-free zone in any populated area of the world. The Treaty itself is open only to States located in the zone and has been signed by all of them, with the exception of Cuba and Guyana. It has been ratified by all signatories, except Argentina, which announced in November 1977 its intention to ratify the Treaty. It is not yet in force for Brazil and Chile. At present, it is in force for twenty-two States.

The Treaty is accompanied by two Protocols. Protocol II to the Treaty, intended for signature by nuclear weapon States, was ratified by the United States on May 12, 1971. It calls on the nuclear weapon States to respect the Latin American Nuclear Free Zone, not to contribute to any violation of the Treaty, and not to use or threaten to use nuclear weapons against the Parties to the Treaty. Other nuclear weapon States that have ratified Protocol II are France, the People's Republic of China and the United Kingdom.

Protocol I, transmitted today for your advice and consent to ratification, is open to all States having international responsibility, de jure or de facto, for territories lying within the zone of application defined in the Treaty. It has been ratified by the Netherlands and the United Kingdom and obligates States adhering to it to apply pertinent provisions of the Treaty to such territories lying within the zone. The territories affected by United States adherence include Puerto Rico, the Virgin Islands, the Canal Zone (until entry into force of the Panama Canal Treaties), and our military base at Guantanamo.

I am convinced that it is in the best interest of the United States to ratify Protocol I. Such a step will strengthen our relations with our Latin American neighbors, further our global non-proliferation and arms control objectives and contribute to the full realization of the Latin American Nuclear Free Zone. It is my sincere hope that adherence by the United States to Protocol I will induce other countries, eligible to become Parties to the Treaty or its Protocols, to take the necessary steps so that the Treaty may enter into full force and effect for the entire zone of application.

I recommend that the Senate give early and favorable consideration to Additional Protocol I and give its advice and consent to ratification, with the same understandings and declarations attached to United States ratification of Protocol II, and with the additional understandings and declarations concerning transit and transport privileges, exercise of the freedoms of the seas and passage through territorial waters, which accompany the report of the Department of State.

JIMMY CARTER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, May 24, 1978.

JOINT REFERRAL OF BILL—S. 3142

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a bill introduced by the Senator from Maine (Mr. HATHAWAY), to amend ERISA, be jointly referred to the Committees on Finance and Human Resources.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR TECHNICAL AND CLERICAL CORRECTIONS—H.R. 10569

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary of the Senate be authorized to make technical and clerical corrections in the engrossment of the Senate amendment to H.R. 10569.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SENATE RESOLUTION 466—HEROISM OF TUGBOAT CAPTAIN GLENN E. McDONALD AND CREWMAN BILL KENNEY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, on behalf of Mr. STONE and Mr. CHILES, I send to the desk a Senate resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

A resolution (S. Res. 466) to commend the heroism of tugboat captain Glenn E. McDonald and crewman Bill Kenney.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered and agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

S. RES. 466

Whereas on May 8, 1978, National Airlines Flight 193 carrying 58 passengers and crew members missed the runway at the Pensacola, Florida Airport and crashed into Escambia Bay, thereby endangering the lives of all on board;

Whereas the fast action of Tugboat captain Glenn E. McDonald and his crewman Bill Kenney in bringing their tug "Little Mac" and the attached barge alongside the wreck and helping the stranded and panicked passengers to the safety of the vessel resulted in the rescue of all but three of the passengers and crew: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, that the Senate commends the valor of these two men and recognizes their contribution to saving many of the 55 people who survived the crash.

ORDER FOR H.R. 39 TO BE HELD AT THE DESK

Mr. STEVENS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that H.R. 39, which is being held at the desk, be held at the desk until the close of business on June 6.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, reserving the right to object—and I do not object—I understand that this has been cleared with Mr. JACKSON.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not talk to the Senator personally. That is the understanding his staff has conveyed to mine—that he has no objection to extending this until the close of business on June 6.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

OUR BIG CHALLENGE

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, there is no more grim challenge this country faces than the world arms race. Few of us realize the immense potential for destruction military technology has now given this world.

Richard Strout—writing as TRB—in Saturday's Washington Star spelled it out eloquently.

Strout calls our attention to the U.N. Disarmament Conference that began in New York yesterday, and to the remarkable analysis of World Military and Social Expenditure—1978, by Ruth Leger Sivard, and sponsored by six private foundations that has just been issued.

We all hope and pray the Disarmament Conference makes some headway; but except for some finger pointing and rhetoric it is unfortunately doubtful if anything will be done even to slow up, let alone reverse, the world's race to global suicide.

Mrs. Sivard's study documents how very suicidal the next war will be. Here is why, in the words of Richard Strout:

The munitions trade is changing; it is no longer a kind of used-car market, but often has the latest model state-of-the art technology. In 1975, 95 nations took major weapons systems. Only one country got long-range surface-to-air missiles in 1958; in 1975 it was 27. Last Monday the Senate approved the administration's deal with Saudi Arabia, Israel and Egpyt— $5 billion.

This is all done, of course, to defend the United States. We have got so much nuclear security by now that we are no longer safe. The two great powers, the U.S. and the USSR, representing only 11 percent of the world's population, have shaped the military competition since World War II. A mutual distrust bordering on the pathological drives them on.

The formula is crazy: An adequate defense means an offense sufficient to deter attack; this must be constructed on worst-case assumptions of the opposing threat. As the enemy responds in kind, the reality of the threat automatically grows—the dog comes closer and closer to catching its tail.

It is obvious that it can't last. Only last week the New China News Agency speaking of Russia, declared, "War will inevitably break out someday."

The average person, all over the world, accepts this incredible situation calmly. It is regarded as the normal lot of the earth dweller.

Also, Mr. President, Strout suggests what all this leads to:

The thought of a small dead planet spinning endlessly through space with no people on it after a nuclear war. . . . No passengers, no birds singing, no children playing.

This is the big challenge of our time, and we should never forget it.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article by Richard Strout (TRB) in the Saturday Washington Star be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TRB—ARMS THAT SHORTCHANGE HUMANITY

I've always had an odd partiality for the human race. The thought of a small dead planet spinning endlessly through space with no people on it after a nuclear war, oppresses me. No passengers—no birds singing, no children playing. Ugh!

And yet the nightmare can't be lightly dismissed. The burden of armaments is growing all the time; even now it's questionable, if all the 50,000 nuclear bombs possessed by the United States and the Soviets were detonated at once, whether the earth would be habitable. And we have only just started.

Covering D-Day off the Normandy coast, June 6, 1944, in the U.S. Cruiser Quincy, we were pretty proud of our big bombs, called "block-busters." But the bang that comes from one of our new nuclear bombs is a quarter of a billion times greater. Block-busters: These are city-destroyers! Their aggregate explosive power is now equivalent to several tons of TNT for each person on earth.

These reflections come from reading the fourth annual report on "World Military and Social Expenditures—1978," by Ruth Leger Sivard (32 pages, $2.50; WMSE Publications, Leesburg, Va.). It is an independent analysis sponsored by six private foundations. It is issued just as the largest official gathering on disarmament that has ever assembled meets in New York—the UN's special disarmament session, to run from Tuesday through June 28. Will anything come from it but words? It is not too likely.

Mrs. Sivard was formerly chief of the economics division of the U.S. Arms Control and Disarmament Agency. She started World Military Expenditures while there.

To make a point she published tables of world expenditures for health and education alongside those for arms and bombs. Defense Secretary Laird complained that this made it harder for him to get his budget through Congress, and the Nixon administration ordered the publication stopped. Mrs. Sivard retired and continued the annual report with the aid of supporting groups including the Rockefeller Foundation. It is the equivalent, in some ways, of the annual survey by the International Peace Research Institute at Stockholm.

All right then—ready for some statistics?

The global arms bill is now $400 billion annually in public funds. There are 23 million men actually under arms with a back-up force of perhaps the same number. The arms race is out of control, stimulating price inflation (by using scarce resources for non-commercial goods), contributing to unemployment and poverty.

The world spends almost $1 million a minute on arms—20 times more than the industrialized nations spend in aid to help the poorer countries.

The average family pays more in taxes to support the world arms race than to educate its children.

Nuclear bomb inventories of the two superpowers, already big enough to destroy every city on earth seven times over, are growing. The leaders are not satisfied; they have an unobtainable goal but they want to be able to destroy each city nine or ten times over, and are busily turning out three bombs a day.

Says Mrs. Sivard: "Modern technology has made it possible to deliver a bomb across the world in minutes; women in rural areas in Asia and Africa still walk several hours a day for the family's water supply."

Had enough? It's boring, but it is probably worth spending five minutes a year in contemplating the consequences of armaments on a small, frightened planet where nobody is in charge and where everybody must guard against his neighbor.

Way back in the '20s an isolationist senator named Gerald P. Nye of North Dakota set out to show that the gullible United States had been egged into Woodrow Wilson's war by the munition makers. He held dramatic hearings. The slogan was, "Take the profits out of war," and it was believed that we would have peace, probably forever, if we controlled the "Merchants of Death."

How perplexing it all is. The United States government itself is now the world's chief arms exporter; according to the Pentagon, in 1960 through 1977 we sent arms worth $71 billion to 161 countries. It was good business. Some of the smallest, hungriest countries were most avid for arms; we sent or withheld them according to our favor.

Speakers at the U.N. Disarmament Conference are apt to mention this, and the field will be ripe for propaganda, with Russia prepared to lead the way. The Soviets have been selling arms, too, to their clients. The U.S., Russia, France and Britain account for more than four-fifths of all military sales.

The munitions trade is changing; it is no longer a kind of used-car market, but often has the latest-model state-of-the-art technology. In 1975, 95 nations took major weapons systems. Only one country got long-range surface-to-air missiles in 1958; in 1975 it was 27. Last Monday the Senate approved the administration's deal with Saudi Arabia, Israel and Egypt—$5 billion.

This is all done, of course, to defend the United States. We have got so much nuclear security by now that we are no longer safe. The two great powers, the U.S. and the USSR, representing only 11 percent of the world's population, have shaped the military competition since World War II. A mutual distrust bordering on the pathological drives them on.

The formula is crazy: An adequate defense means an offense sufficient to deter attack; this must be constructed on worst-case assumptions of the opposing threat. As the enemy responds in kind, the reality of the threat automatically grows—the dog comes closer and closer to catching its tail.

It is obvious that it can't last. Only last week the New China News Agency, speaking of Russia, declared, "War will inevitably break out some day."

The average person, all over the world, accepts this incredible situation calmly. It is regarded as the normal lot of the earth dweller.

One billion people—a quarter of the earth's population—go to bed hungry at night. It is in their countries, the report shows, that since 1960 the proportion of military expenditures has risen most.

The report is factual, statistical, rather dull. There is little editorializing.

In it you discover curious facts. Developing countries—the ones with high birth rates, short life expectancy and few doctors—invest more public revenue in arms than in education and health combined.

Another item: For the estimated cost of a new mobile intercontinental missile (the MX, 50 milion malnourished children in developing countries could be adequately fed, 65,000 health centers opened, 340,000 primary schools built.

THE KHMER ROUGE AND THE PRINCIPLES OF THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, during the course of the Nazi rule in Germany, the Nazis went to great length to disguise the genocidal campaign which they were waging against the Jews. They made no mention of mass killings, death camps, and gas chambers. They spoke rather of "resettlement" and "special action" plans. Their attempt to mask the horror of what they were doing, though, was in vain. The extermination of 6 million Jews between 1938 and 1945 stands as the most horrible example of genocide in the history of the world.

Sadly, though, genocide did not disappear with the Nazis and, indeed, a similar attempt is being made today in Cambodia to mask the terrible genocide being waged against the Cambodians by the Khmer Rouge. As Jack Anderson reported in a recent column, the Khmer Rouge has gone to great lengths to seal off the country by patrolling the borders and mining them. Anderson also reports that, just as the Nazis did, the Khmer Rouge uses euphemisms to describe its genocidal ways. Terms which refer to a "sweeping clean" of Cambodia are used in lieu of terms which really convey what is happening there; namely, terms meaning murder and genocide.

For 3 years now, according to numerous press reports, wholesale slaughter has been occurring in Cambodia, and descriptions as to how it has been carried out have shocked the world. The Nazis used bullets and gas; the Khmer Rouge uses garden hoes to bludgeon their victims to death. The goal of the Khmer Rouge is to eliminate all members of the old society in Cambodia, and they have shown no signs of abating their genocidal policy.

The Genocide Convention was written shortly after World War II and marked an effort by civilized nations to unite against governments seeking to institute a policy of genocide. The Jewish holocaust was certainly compelling proof of the need for the Genocide Convention, and the genocide occurring in Cambodia is yet another example of its need today. For 30 years though, the United States has delayed ratifying the convention.

The blame for this outrageous oversight does not lie with the executive branch. President Truman signed the treaty in 1948, and sent the treaty to the Senate for ratification. Since then, every President has urged the Senate to pass the treaty. Truman, Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon, Ford, and most recently President Carter have pressed for its ratification. The blame for the delay lies clearly with the Senate.

Genocide is a crime which knows no concern for ideology. It has been committed by both right wing facists and left wing Communists. The Genocide Convention is an effective measure against this horrible crime, and I urge the Senate to ratify this treaty.

I ask unanimous consent that the Jack Anderson column, entitled, "Cambodia, Obliterating a Culture," be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

IN CAMBODIA, OBLITERATING A CULTURE

(By Jack Anderson)

There is another Holocaust story, every bit as stark as the recent TV saga, which should be rubbed into the world conscience.

Holocaust dramatized the ordeal of the Jews who were brutalized and massacred by the Nazis 40 years ago. We have compiled an equally staggering story of the horrors that are going on inside Cambodia today.

The Nazis began the systematic slaughter of all Jews under their control. The Cambodian Communists are trying to eradicate not a race but a culture. They are engaged in a deliberate, disciplined campaign to remake the society from the ground up. Intelligence reports tell of "completing the execution of all people who are not from the poor farmer-working class."

Six million Jews perished under the Nazi heel; this was more than six percent of occupied Europe. There has been no body count of how many Cambodians have died from mistreatment and execution. Competent sources have offered estimates ranging from 1.8 million to 2.5 million, about one-third of the seven million people who inhabited Cambodia.

The Nazis tried to conceal their monstrous crime from the world. They used such euphemisms as "resettlement," "removal," and "special action" to describe the mass executions. The Cambodian comrades also have their special vocabulary. A former communist official, who has participated in the killings, told U.S. intelligence sources:

"The Khmer word for 'kill, assassinate, execute' was never spoken when the annihilation policy was discussed. The Khmer term used was 'baoh caol,' literally 'sweep, throw out' or 'sweep, discard'; or 'baoh saad," literally 'sweep clean.' "

The Nazis used firing squads and gas chambers to exterminate the Jews. In Cambodia, the communists began with firing squads. But they decided that bullets were too precious to waste on their victims. So hundreds of thousands were simply bludgeoned to death and buried in mass graves.

The favorite weapon of extermination in Cambodia has become the garden hoe. The same grisly report keeps recurring in intelligence dispatches: "Each man was blindfolded, led to the edge of a ditch and beaten to death with a hoe."

The brutality began even before the communists swept to victory in Cambodia. Some of the last classified cables from the U.S. embassy reported that communist guerrillas had turned upon the civilian population with a sudden savagery. "The attacks are seen by the refugees as enemy punishment inflicted upon them for rejecting KCP [Khmer Communist Party] offers to come over to the KCP side," alleged one of the final cables.

The communists swarmed over the capital city of Phnom Penh on April 17, 1975. The wholesale slaughter began on the same day. It was not the ravages of undisciplined troops gone wild. Rather, it was the calculated, cold-blooded policy of the communist conquerors to eradicate all vestiges of the existing social order. "The KCP rationale is to completely rid the society of all elements which are not of the lower social class," according to a former Communist official.

Officers of the former army were the first to die. "The KCP simultaneously began executing all wealthy farmers, prostitutes, high level monks, teachers, fortune tellers, former enlisted men and civil servants."

Nor were their families spared.

The crude bludgeonings continued for more than a year. "Toward the latter part of 1976," the intelligence reports claim, "the search for and execution of old society people slackened off. In April 1977, however . . . it once again became a primary party activity to search out and eliminate the last vestiges of the old society."

The most recent cable we have seen on this subject was dated Feb. 13, 1978. It declares tersely: "A renewed emphasis was placed on completely eliminating all vestiges of the former government and completing the executions of all people who were not from the poor farmer-working class."

This maniacal attempt to establish a new order by mass murder was supposed to be kept secret. The communists sealed off their country tightly. The borders are mined and patrolled.

Yet a few refugees managed to escape, some after harrowing experiences. Less than two months after the communist takeover, we were able to get enough eyewitness accounts to report on June 4, 1975: "It appears that the Khmer Rouge, as the Cambodian communists call themselves, may be guilty of genocide against their own people." Now we have compiled intelligence reports and eyewitness accounts two inches thick. The evidence is overwhelming.

CONCLUSION OF MORNING BUSINESS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, is there further morning business?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further morning business? If not, morning business is closed.

SPECIAL ORDERS FOR TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that on tomorrow after the prayer Mr. JAVITS be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes and that Mr. BENTSEN then be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes. This will eliminate the usual order for the recognition of the two leaders, except that I might provide for 2 minutes each for the two leaders prior to the two orders for the recognition of the aforementioned Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the orders for the recognition of Senators tomorrow, the Senate resume its consideration of the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

RECESS UNTIL 9 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move, in accordance with the previous order, that the Senate stand in recess until 9 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and at 6:39 p.m. the Senate recessed until tomorrow, Thursday, May 25, 1978, at 9 a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES—Wednesday, May 24, 1978

The House met at 10 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Edward G. Latch, D.D., offered the following prayer:

It is good for me to draw near unto God; I have put my trust in Him.—Psalms 73: 28.

Our Father God, far beyond us yet ever near, we bow at the altar of prayer erected by our fathers to remind us of Thy presence and to have us remember that we were born as a nation of free men and women. May we play our full part in keeping this memory alive and in remembering that freedom must be more than a memory. It must be won by us day after day, year after year. So we wait upon Thee praying that Thou wilt guide us in our efforts to keep freedom alive in our world.

Set our feet firmly with steadfast purpose that in our day we may meet our joys with gratitude, face our difficulties with courage, do our duties with faithfulness, and accept our successes with humility. So may we serve our people and our Nation with our very best this day and all days. Amen.

CALL OF THE HOUSE

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, under rule I, clause 1, I move a call of the House.

There was no objection.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Sparrow, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment a bill of the House of the following title:

H.R. 3994. An act for the relief of Charles P. Abbott.

The message also announced that the Senate agrees to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 9005) entitled "An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of said District for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978, and for other purposes," the message also announced that the Senate agreed to House amendments to Senate amendments numbered 20, 26, and 37, of the foregoing bill.

The message also announced that the Senate disagrees to the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 2401) entitled "An act to amend the Consumer Product Safety Act to establish an interim consumer product safety rule relating to the standards for flame resistance and corrosiveness of certain insulation, and for other purposes," requests a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and appoints Mr. FORD, Mr. CANNON, and Mr. PACKWOOD to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills and a joint resolution of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 1826. An act for the relief of Kainoosh-Fard Bullock and her son, Kami Bullock;

S. 2237. An act for the relief of Lee Myong Sook;

S. 2247. An act for the relief of Eugenia Cortes;

S. 2379. An act for the relief of Jesusa Navarro Romero and Antonio Angeles Romero;

S. 2928. An act to amend the International Investment Survey Act of 1976, and for other purposes;

S. 2973. An act authorizing appropriations to the Secretary of the Interior for services necessary to the nonperforming arts functions of the John F. Kennedy Center for the Performing Arts, and for other purposes;

S. 3045. An act to amend the Farm Credit Act of 1971 to extend the term for production credit association loans to producers or harvesters of aquatic products; and

S.J. Res. 137. Joint resolution reaffirming the unity of the North Atlantic Alliance commitment.

REQUEST FOR PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON BANKING, FINANCE AND URBAN AFFAIRS TO SIT DURING 5-MINUTE RULE TODAY

Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs be allowed to sit today during the 5-minute rule for markup.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard. The Chair will state it takes 10 Members to object. The objectors will have to remain standing.

(Messrs. MICHEL, BAUMAN, CUNNINGHAM, DORNAN, ASHBROOK, DEVINE, EDWARDS of Oklahoma, RUDD, HILLIS, HOLLENBECK, WHITEHURST, and HANSEN also objected.)

The SPEAKER. A sufficient number have objected.

Objection is heard.

A PERSONAL EXPLANATION

(Mr. FUQUA asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

● Mr. FUQUA. Mr. Speaker, late last Thursday afternoon I was called out of town to respect longstanding obligations in my home district in Florida. Regretfully, I was not here during the final debate on the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act.

As the RECORD shows, on Thursday I voted to maintain the strongest possible legislation because of my sincere belief that the protection of these lands represents one of the most important environmental issues facing Congress in our lifetimes, Thursday I was unable to be present to vote on the substitute language offered by the gentleman from Washington (Mr. MEEDS). Had I been present to vote on rollcall No. 336, I would have voted "no."

Final passage of this act came on Friday and I would like to indicate that, had I been able to be here. I would have enthusiastically supported passage of this extremely crucial legislation and would have voted "yes" on rollcall No. 340.●

TRIBUTE TO BOB HOPE

(Mr. DORNAN asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow those of us on the congressional SALT II watchdog team leave for Geneva. This will be a critically important factfinding journey. The road to Geneva on this SALT II issue should be much traveled by Senators and Congressmen because the future of Western civilization, as we know it, is at stake in these disarmament talks with the Soviets. It appears that the curse of Munich appeasement is fading from our memory. My only regret in hitting the road to Geneva is that I will miss a once in a lifetime tribute in this Chamber tomorrow to an absolutely one-of-a-kind patriot. This outstanding citizen has traveled more roads for his beloved adopted Nation to serve our fighting men and women than any human being has ever traveled for such selfless purposes in all of recorded history. Lesley Towne came to the great State of Ohio from our mother country of Great Britain as a baby and two decades later under the lights of the "Great White Way" in New York City he exploded as one of the incomparable entertainers of all time. A show business career spanning more than half a century assured this giant of comedy a lasting place in history but this tireless worker for peace well renamed after the virtue of Hope went the extra million miles. Of course I am speaking about a living legend named Bob Hope. The walls of this great Hall will ring with the applause of respect and love tomorrow.

I am heartsick I will not be here to see that jutting chin and Pepsodent smile up there in the gallery. I hope Mr. Hope brings his gallant lady, Dorothy, with him to share his magnificent 75th birthday with Congress in this great Federal City they have served so well. Without the total support of his lovely wife he could not have given so much of his boundless energy to the millions of GI's, sailors, marines, and airmen that they together loved so well.

Bob, I will toast to your fourth quarter-century in Geneva and remind the Russians that the United States has a secret weapon that they had better take into account; namely "Rapid Robert."

Thank you for the memories.

ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE FROM THURSDAY, MAY 25, 1978, TO WEDNESDAY, MAY 31, 1978, AND THE SENATE FROM FRIDAY, MAY 26, 1978, TO MONDAY, JUNE 5, 1978

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Mr. Speaker, I offer a privileged concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 634), and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the concurrent resolution, as follows:

H. CON. RES. 634

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That when the House adjourns on Thursday, May 25, 1978, it stand adjourned until 12 o'clock meridian on Wednesday, May 31, 1978, and that when the Senate recesses on Friday, May 26, 1978, it stand in recess until 12 o'clock meridian on Monday, June 5, 1978.

The concurrent resolution was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

(Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. I yield to the gentleman from Maryland.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the distinguished acting majority leader, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI) would tell us what the program might be for the remainder of the week in view of the fact that we are passing the concurrent resolution providing for a recess?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. In reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Maryland (Mr. BAUMAN) let me say that of course what we intend to do is to conclude the debate on the bill presently under consideration, and then go into the tuition tax credit possibly. Of course, if all the legislation that was arranged for this week is concluded, we will work through until Thursday late in the afternoon but it is very difficult at this point to give any indication of what legislation will be coming up other than the tuition tax credit. This is due to the length of the debate on the present legislation we are considering.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield still further, the only reason I asked the question is I know that a number of the Members are leaving tomorrow for various foreign climes and it appears that this present bill might take all day, so that if we were to take up the tuition tax credit as proposed, have the reception of former Members to dispose of, it might well be 1 o'clock tomorrow before we would really start our legislative business. It would be very helpful to the Members if they might know what legislation will be considered so that they can make their plans accordingly.

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. At the present time the leadership expects to follow the program previously set forth, and that we would try to take up the tuition tax credit and do as much work on that as we could. As the gentleman knows, the time for adjournment on Thursday has been left open so that we could possibly work late or adjourn early.

Mr. BAUMAN. If the gentleman will yield further, does the gentleman expect that we will consider the FEC legislation?

Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI. Under the present scheduling I doubt very much whether we would get to that.

Mr. BAUMAN. I thank the gentleman.

DEPARTMENT OF DEFENSE APPROPRIATION AUTHORIZATION ACT, 1979

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H.R. 10929) to authorize appropriations during the fiscal year 1979, for procurement of aircraft, missiles, naval vessels, tracked combat vehicles, torpedoes, and other weapons, and research, development, test and evaluation for the Armed Forces, and to prescribe the authorized personnel strength for each active duty component and of the Selected Reserve of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces and of civilian personnel of the Department of Defense, to authorize the military training student loads, and to authorize appropriations for civil defense, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE).

The motion was agreed to.

IN THE COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H.R. 10929, with Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. When the Committee rose on Tuesday, May 23, 1978, all time for general debate on the bill had expired. Pursuant to the rule, the Clerk will now read by titles the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Armed Services now printed in the reported bill as an original bill for the purpose of amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act, 1979".

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. ZABLOCKI. Mr. Chairman, in accordance with the rule, House Resolution 1188, I make a point of order that section 805 of the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, if offered as a separate amendment to H.R. 10929 as introduced, would be in violation of clause 7 of House Rule XVI regarding germaneness. This provision which deals with the withdrawal of troops from Korea, and section 805 which deals with the withdrawal of troops from Korea, is not germane to the Department of Defense authorization bill.

Mr. Chairman, a key criterion in determining germaneness is a committee's jurisdiction over a matter. The Korean troop withdrawal issue falls clearly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on International Relations. Both sections 805(a) and 805(b) fall clearly within the jurisdiction of the Committee on International Relations, pursuant to clause 1, subparagraph (k) of House Rule X.

Compelling evidence of the primary jurisdiction of the International Relations Committee over the issue of troop withdrawal from Korea is found in the fact that all legislation, the President's arms transfer request, and related reports have been referred solely to the International Relations Committee.

Thus, there can be no doubt that the issue of the Korean troop withdrawal lies within the jurisdiction of the Committee on International Relations, and accordingly section 805 is not germane to this bill.

In addition, the issue of U.S. troop withdrawal from Korea is not relevant to either the subject matter or to the purpose of H.R. 10929, as introduced. As introduced, H.R. 10929 consists entirely of provisions relating to the annual authorizations for the Department of Defense. It contains no general policy provisions for the Department of Defense. It contains no general policy provisions of any type, let alone any policy provisions relevant to the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Korea. It is well established that an amendment of a general and permanent nature is not germane to a bill containing only temporary authorizations.

Thus, by what ever test of germaneness one examines, section 805 is not germane to H.R. 10929.

Mr. Chairman, without regard to the merits of the issue, H.R. 10929 is not the proper vehicle for House consideration of the issue of U.S. troop withdrawal from Korea. Accordingly, I must insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be heard on the point of order.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ZABLOCKI), makes the point of order that section 805 is not germane on the ground that it deals with a matter that is related to something that has been before his committee. As he indicated before the Committee on Rules, if this had been introduced as an original bill, it would have been referred sequentially to the Committee on International Relations as well as to the Committee on Armed Services.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that, first of all, the question of germaneness does not depend on what committee it might be referred to sequentially. In fact, the whole idea of sequential referral is a relatively new concept. I believe, in fact, that it has only been practiced in this House during this present Congress, and perhaps a few times previously.

H.R. 10929, is the annual authorization bill for the Department of Defense. It traditionally covers a wide variety of topics relating to defense. I would point out that the title of the bill after it lists the various items that the gentleman from Wisconsin has already referred to concludes, "and for other purposes."

Traditionally, matters related to the defense of our country which the Committee on Armed Services has regarded as being of importance have been included in this annual legislation year after year. Section 805 is no different from any of the other matters we have traditionally handled under "general provisions."

It is true that the gentleman's committee has had legislation before it regarding the transfer of American equipment to Korean forces; but section 805 refers to the stationing and positioning of U.S. ground forces; "no ground combat units of the 2d Infantry Division," and so on and so forth. It makes no reference to any transfer of equipment to Korean forces. We are providing here for the stationing of troops in an area that is of great importance to our national sceurity. If that is not something which is within the concern of the Committee on Armed Services, then I do not know what our proper area of responsibility is.

Subsection (b) of section 805 spells out the recommendations of the committee as to what the minimum ground combat strength of our Armed Forces stationed in the Republic of Korea should be based on information we gleaned in an on-the-spot visit to Korea in January; so it is clearly within the province of the Committee on Armed Services. The gentleman from Wisconsin does not dispute that. The gentleman could not dispute it; but to suggest that because if it were introduced as a bill under today's procedures it might have been referred sequentially to the gentleman's committee or to some other committee, completely misses the point. If the size and location of Armed Forces of the United States are not a responsibility of the Committee on Armed Services, and are instead the responsibility of the Committee on International Relations, then something is very drastically wrong in this House.

Further, Mr. Chairman, the authority to determine where American Forces shall be stationed is clearly within the province of the Congress. The Constitution provides that Congress shall not only "raise and support armies," but that we shall provide for the "regulation and governing of the land and naval forces," in section 8 of article I.

Congress has previously enacted the war powers bill, which limits the authority of the President as far as the stationing of troops abroad is concerned. The Constitution does not give a broad grant of power to the Commander in Chief alone in stationing troops abroad. He has no constitutional power to put troops wherever he wants to, because Congress has determined that he cannot put troops abroad under certain conditions without the expressed approval of the Congress of the United States.

Well, if we can limit the President's ability to send troops overseas, it follows that we can also limit his ability to bring those troops back home, if in the opinion of the Congress, we determine that that withdrawal action, which certainly is the case of Korea, would increase the risks of war.

So, Mr. Chairman, I urge that the point of order be overruled. Section 805 is clearly within the authority of the committee. It is clearly germane to the broad purposes of the bill and the House should have the right to vote on this important question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Wisconsin makes a point of order against section 805 of the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute recommended by the Committee on Armed Services, on the grounds that section 805 of said amendment would not have been germane if offered to the bill H.R. 10929, as introduced.

As indicated by the gentleman from Wisconsin, the special order providing for consideration of this measure, House Resolution 1188, allows the Chair to entertain a point of order on the basis stated by the gentleman, that section 805 of the committee amendment would not have been germane as a separate amendment to H.R. 10929 in its introduced form.

The bill as introduced and referred to the Committee on Armed Services contains authorizations of appropriations and personnel strengths of the Armed Services for fiscal year 1979. It contains no permanent changes in law or statements of policy except for minor conforming changes to existing law relating to troop and personnel strengths.

Section 805 of the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute prohibits: First the withdrawal of ground combat units from the Republic of Korea until the enactment of legislation allowing the retention in Korea of the equipment of such units, and second, the reduction of combat units below a certain level in the Republic of Korea until a peace settlement is reached between said Republic and the Democratic People's Republic of Korea ending the state of war on the Korean peninsula.

The subject matter of section 805 of the committee amendment is unrelated to H.R. 10929 as introduced. The strength levels prescribed in the bill are for 1 fiscal year only and deal with the overall strength of the Armed Forces, not with the location of Armed Forces personnel. As indicated in the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin, the withdrawal of American Forces stationed abroad pursuant to an international agreement, and the relationship of that withdrawal to peace agreements between foreign nations and to the transfer of American military equipment to foreign powers, are issues not only beyond the scope of the bill but also within the jurisdiction of the Committee on International Relations. Although committee jurisdiction over an amendment is not the sole test of germaneness, the Chair feels that it is a convincing argument in a case such as the present one where the test of germaneness is between a limited 1-year authorization bill and a permanent statement of policy contingent upon the administration of laws within the jurisdiction of another committee.

For the reasons stated, the Chair sustains the point of order.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRIES

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, the Chair may have just stated a novel concept which has never before been heard in a ruling. That is that the sequential referral rule somehow serves as the basis for jurisdiction, and thus can support a point of order dealing with a section in a bill such as the one before us.

The parliamentary inquiry I have is this: Simply because under the new procedure adopted for the first time in this Congress the rules allow sequential referral at the discretion of the Speaker, does that mean that a committee that has primary jurisdiction, such as the Committee on Armed Services, may be challenged on the floor and have a point of order sustained removing a provision that might be partially under the jurisdiction of another committee on a sequential referral?

The CHAIRMAN. The ruling of the Chair does not stand for that proposition.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maryland understood the Chair to say that the argument of the gentleman from Wisconsin was persuasive to the Chair regarding jurisdiction. If that is the case, it seems to me every committee of this House is somehow going to be challenged on the floor henceforth if its jurisdiction is shared to the slightest degree by another committee.

The CHAIRMAN. All the Chair has stated is that section 805 is not germane to the introduced bill, and the rule provides that the point of order would lie on that ground.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have this further parliamentary inquiry:

Then the ruling of the Chair is based on germaneness of this amendment to this bill and does not go to any effect the sequential jurisdiction would have on the provision?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, did I understand the Chair correctly to infer that since this is a 1-year authorization and the prohibition in the paragraph or the section in question was permanent, perhaps the Chair might have ruled differently had it not been a 1-year restriction?

The CHAIRMAN. The introduced bill is a 1-year authorization; the provision against which the point of order was raised is not.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I thought I understood the Chair to put some emphasis on the fact that there was a different period of time in the authorization bill as opposed to the restriction that is in question.

The CHAIRMAN. The test of germaneness as stated in the rule is the relationship between section 805 and the introduced bill, and the Committee on Rules provided for this. The introduced bill is a 1-year bill.

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Chairman, I thought I heard the Chair infer in its ruling that the ruling would have been different had the two times coincided.

The CHAIRMAN. I think that the Chair would have taken that into consideration had that been the fact.

Mr. SNYDER. I thank the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Pursuant to the rule, the Clerk will read by titles the committee amendment recommended by the Committee on Armed Services now printed in the bill, without section 805 included therein, as an original bill for the purpose of amendment under the 5-minute rule.

AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. CARR

Mr. CARR. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. CARR: Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

TITLE I—PROCUREMENT

SEC. 101. Funds are hereby authorized to be appropriated during the fiscal year 1979 for the use of the Armed Forces of the United States for procurement of aircraft, missiles, naval vessels, tracked combat vehicles, torpedoes, and other weapons, as authorized by law, in amounts as follows:

Aircraft

For aircraft: for the Army, $1,017,800,000; for the Navy and Marine Corps, $4,078,800,000; for the Air Force, $6,897,700,000.

Missiles

For missiles: for the Army, $773,200,000; for the Navy, $1,553,600,000; for the Marine Corps, $23,100,000; for the Air Force, $1,676,800,000.

Naval vessels

For naval vessels: for the Navy, $3,712,400,000.

TRACKED COMBAT VEHICLES

For tracked combat vehicles: for the Army, $1,532,500,000; for the Marine Corps, $21,700,000.

TORPEDOES

For torpedoes and related support equipment: for the Navy, $364,100,000.

OTHER WEAPONS

For other weapons: for the Army, $104,100,000; for the Navy, $129,800,000; for the Marine Corps, $28,000,000; for the Air Force, $300,000.

TITLE II—RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, TEST, AND EVALUATION

SEC. 201. Funds are hereby authorized to be appropriated during the fiscal year 1979 for the use of the Armed Forces of the United States for research, development, test, and evaluation, as authorized by law, in amounts as follows:

For the Army, $2,721,400,000;

For the Navy (including the Marine Corps), $4,495,912,000;

For the Air Force, $4,339,100,000; and

For the Defense Agencies, $917,000,000, of which $27,600,000 is authorized for the activities of the Director of Test and Evaluation, Defense.

TITLE III—ACTIVE FORCES

SEC. 301. For the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1979, each component of the Armed Forces is authorized an end strength for active duty personnel as follows:

(1) The Army 771,700;
(2) The Navy, 521,700;
(3) The Marine Corps, 190,000;
(4) The Air Force, 565,600.

SEC. 302. (a) The computation of the annually authorized end strength for the active military personnel of any component of the Armed Forces for any fiscal year shall include all personnel of that Armed Forces component on active duty who are paid by or through that component's active military personnel appropriation, subject to the exclusions contained in subsection (b).

(b) In computing the authorized end strength for the active duty personnel of any component of the Armed Forces for any fiscal year, there shall not be included—

(1) civil works officers;
(2) members paid from appropriations for the Reserve Components;
(3) Reserves ordered to active duty in time of war, or national emergency declared by Congress or the President after January 1, 1978;
(4) units and members of the Selected Reserve ordered to active duty (other than for training) under section 673b of title 10, United States Code;
(5) members of the Army National Guard or members of the Air National Guard called into Federal service under sections 3500 or 8500 of title 10, United States Code;
(6) members of the militia of any State called into Federal service under chapter 15 of title 10, United States Code;
(7) Reserves ordered to temporary active duty for administration of the Reserves who are covered by section 678 of title 10, United States Code;
(8) Reserves on active duty filling positions in accordance with the provisions of section 265 of title 10, United States Code; and
(9) Reserves on active duty for training.

(c) Title 10, United States Code, is amended—

(1) by striking out ", but shall not be counted against any prescribed military strengths" in section 2114(b);

(2) by striking out clauses (1) and (5) in subsection (a) and clauses (1) and (4) in subsection (b) of section 3201;

(3) by repealing section 3230 and by striking out the corresponding item for that section in the chapter analysis of chapter 331;

(4) by repealing sections 5415 and 5416 and by striking out the corresponding items for those sections from the chapter analysis of chapter 531;

(5) by striking out clauses (1), (2), and (6) in subsection (a) and clauses (1) and (4) in subsection (b) of section 8201; and

(6) by repealing section 8230 and by striking out the corresponding item for that section in the chapter analysis of chapter 831.

(d) Section 625(b) of the Department of Energy Organization Act (91 Stat. 598) is amended by striking out the second sentence.

TITLE IV—RESERVE FORCES

SEC. 401. (a) For the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1979, the Selected Reserve of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces shall be programed to attain an average strength of not less than the following:

(1) The Army National Guard of the United States, 363,000;
(2) The Army Reserve, 196,700;
(3) The Naval Reserve, 51,400;
(4) The Marine Corps Reserve, 33,000;
(5) The Air National Guard of the United States, 92,400;
(6) The Air Force Reserve, 53,200;
(7) The Coast Guard Reserve, 11,700.

(b) The average strength prescribed by subsection (a) of this section for the Selected Reserve of any Reserve component shall be proportionately reduced by (1) the total authorized strength of units organized to serve as units of the Selected Reserve of such component which are on active duty (other than for training) at any time during the fiscal year; and (2) the total number of individual members not in units organized to serve as units of the Selected Reserve of such component who are on active duty (other than for training or for unsatisfactory participation in training) without their consent at any time during the fiscal year. Whenever such units or such individual members are released from active duty during any fiscal year, the average strength prescribed for such fiscal year for the Selected Reserve of such Reserve component shall be proportionately increased by the total authorized strength of such units and by the total number of such individual members.

TITLE V—CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

SEC. 501. (a) For the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1979, the Department of Defense is authorized an end strength for civilian personnel of 1,007,531.

(b) The end strength for civilian personnel prescribed in subsection (a) of this section shall be apportioned among the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy, including the Marine Corps, the Department of the Air Force, and the agencies of the Department of Defense (other than the military departments) in such numbers as the Secretary of Defense shall prescribe. The Secretary of Defense shall report to the Congress within sixty days after the date of enactment of this Act on the manner in which the initial allocation of civilian personnel is made among the military departments and agencies of the Department of Defense (other than the military departments) and shall include the rationale for each allocation.

(c) In computing the authorized end strength for civilian personnel there shall be included all direct-hire and indirect-hire civilian personnel employed to perform military functions administered by the Department of Defense (other than those performed by the National Security Agency) whether employed on a full-time, part-time, or intermittent basis, but excluding special employment categories for students and disadvantaged youth such as the stay-in-school campaign, the temporary summer aid program and the Federal junior fellowship program and personnel participating in the worker-trainee opportunity program. Whenever a function, power, or duty, or activity is transferred or assigned to a department or agency of the Department of Defense from a department or agency outside of the Department of Defense, or from another department or agency within the Department of Defense, the civilian personnel end strength authorized for such departments or agencies of the Department of Defense affected shall be adjusted to reflect any increases or decreases in civilian personnel required as a result of such transfer or assignment.

(d) When the Secretary of Defense determines that such action is necessary in the national interest, he may authorize the employment of civilian personnel in excess of the number authorized in subsection (a) of this section but such additional number may not exceed 1¼ per centum of the total number of civilian personnel authorized for the Department of Defense by subsection (a) of this section. The Secretary of Defense shall promptly notify the Congress of any authorization to increase civilian personnel strength under the authority of this subsection.

TITLE VI—MILITARY TRAINING STUDENT LOADS

SEC. 601. For the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1979, each component of the Armed Forces is authorized an average military training student load as follows:

(1) The Army, 67,843;
(2) The Navy, 58,086;
(3) The Marine Corps, 21,324;
(4) The Air Force, 44,917;
(5) The Army National Guard of the United States, 11,793;
(6) The Army Reserve, 5,959;
(7) The Naval Reserve, 991;
(8) The Marine Corps Reserve, 3,074;
(9) The Air National Guard of the United States, 2,471; and
(10) The Air Force Reserve, 1,184.

TITLE VII—DEFENSE CIVIL PREPAREDNESS AGENCY

SEC. 701. Funds are hereby authorized to be appropriated during the fiscal year 1979 for carrying out the purposes of the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950, as amended, for the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency, in the amount of $96,500,000.

This Act may be cited as the "Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act, 1979".

Mr. CARR (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment in the nature of a substitute be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

Mr. CARR. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I have just introduced is the amendment in the nature of a substitute. First, permit me to explain the substitute. The substitute is nothing more than the original bill proposed by the President and introduced by the chairman and the ranking minority member of the committee, at the request of the administration, minus $1 billion in the Navy shipbuilding account, to reflect what the House action on May 3 during its consideration of the budget resolution. During that consideration the House adopted the Budget Committee recommendation that the figure for military expenditures exclude $1 billion for the Trident submarine, which because of log jams and backups at Groton, Conn., cannot be built or obligated in 1979.

The bill retained long lead items for that submarine, and the committee, on its work on the committee bill, the committee version, agreed with that principle. So the Trident submarine is not at issue here.

Now, why a substitute to the entire work of the Committee on Armed Services? That is a legitimate question—in the House, which reveres its committee tradition to allow the primacy of committee work to be the vehicle on the House floor for the deliberation in the House working its will.

It is not a step that I took lightly, but I did it primarily for two reasons:

First and foremost, on May 3, an amendment was offered to the budget resolution, an amendment offered by my colleague on the Committee on Armed Services, the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON), to increase the target $2.5 billion.

The reason this amendment was added, as discussed among members of the Committee on Armed Services during its secret markup session, was to provide enough money into the budget resolution for the bill which they knew they were going to be reporting out in a few hours.

In other words, the Committee on Armed Services itself recognized that the budget target did not include enough money for the bill they were about to bring to the Members today.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) offered an amendment increasing that budget target by $2.5 billion. The House voted overwhelmingly to reject—to reject—the committee position as expressed in the Stratton amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the vote was 262 to 142. When we get back into the House, as opposed to the Committee of the Whole, I will be asking unanimous consent to insert extraneous matter; and I will include once again that vote in which 262 people went on record as holding the line on military expenditures.

I would point out that the bill before us today brought by the House Committee on Armed Services is almost $1 billion over the Stratton amendment of 3 weeks ago. It seems to me that the House has expressed its will in this regard and that the committee has a responsibility to bring to us a bill that is in closer conformity with the expressed wishes of the House. In addition, the House Committee on Armed Services session which marked up this bill was conducted in secret. In a Christmas-like attitude, a lot of amendments were added, which were opposed by the leadership of the committee; and many of us voted against them. However, we never could manage a majority. Many of these items had never had a hearing. They add up to a lot of money.

Additionally, it is pointed out to all of us through the flood of "Dear Colleague" letters we have been receiving that one of the majority monetary differences is the nuclear cruiser and the nuclear aircraft carrier.

In 1975 this House expressed its will quite clearly. The House-expressed will in this Congress in 1975 was against the nuclear carrier.

Once again, Mr. Chairman, the House Committee on Armed Services has brought us a bill which it believes, in all sincerity, is the best for the Nation's defense; but it is not in step and in tune with the House as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. CARR was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. CARR. To continue, Mr. Chairman, some of the items which the Committee on Armed Services added included A–7D's for the Air National Guard, a $141 million item; A–7E's for Navy at $200 million; C–12's for the Army at $19 million; and a Grumman Gulfstream II, so that the Commandant of the Marine Corps will have an executive jet to fly around in when even the Secretary of the Navy has to take an old Convair.

Mr. Chairman, it also includes title VIII, which includes the provision that was just ruled out of order by the Chairman, section 805. It includes an amendment offered by the gentleman from New York to allow—I underline "allow," with a lot of moral suasion—the Secretary of Defense to use assets of the Nation's military in furtherance of the Olympic winter games at Lake Placid.

Mr. Chairman, I am told that when this was done by a separate bill, with separate hearings, several years ago, when the Olympic Winter Games were at Squaw Valley, that item cost the U.S. Government, the military budget, $150 million. We did not even have hearings on that item, but we were bending over backward on this secret markup to accommodate the members of the committee and their needs back home.

Mr. Chairman, is this an attack on the committee system? Absolutely not. Indeed, by disregarding the will of the House, I think the Committee on Armed Services, in trespassing on the International Relations Committee's territory and in its disregard for those here in the whole House, has attacked the committee system.

I might point out that many of the members of the Committee on Armed Services were making these same statements. Many of the Members who are making arguments to us today against the substitute, in that secret committee markup were saying that the Committee on Armed Services was turning itself into a Pentagon wish-list turning itself into a eunuch among congressional committees.

Is that an attack on the committee chairman? No, it is not; emphatically, it is not. I have the utmost respect for our colleague, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE), the chairman, as well as for the other members of the committee. The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE) and other leaders of the committee attempted to hold down the add-ons. They were just unsuccessful.

Now what the chairman is doing is simply supporting the committee's position. I think we can all commend him for that.

Mr. Chairman, some of the things the committee did were good. The R. & D. Committee specifically should be singled out along with its chairman. The gentleman from Missouri (Mr. ICHORD) did an admirable job on the research and development title, and there will be an amendment to reinstate that title in the substitute amendment.

I want to say that while the R. & D. subcommittee did not do everything I wished it would do, I think it represented some of the best work product of the Armed Services Committee, and we want to get it restored.

This is not a cut. It has been portrayed as a cut. We are starting from the President's figure. It includes 2 percent real growth for military spending, and there is enough in there for 3 percent commitment to NATO, which the President has signed on to.

It has been claimed that the committee is now only $300 million above the President, but the real difference is still $3.4 billion. The committee claim ignores the fact that the President's budget contains $1 billion added for the Trident, which we have all decided is going to be excluded.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CARR. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's complimentary remark concerning the work of the R. & D. subcommittee, but I would state frankly to the gentleman that, for the life of me, I just cannot understand why he is proceeding as he is. Instead of introducing his own views, he is going back to the original bill and asking this House to mark up a bill on the floor of the House. Since I abhor the procedure he is following so much, I have refused, at his request, to introduce as an amendment to his substitute what he has described as very admirable work of the R. & D. subcommittee. Unfortunately I am placed in the position of opposing the work of my own subcommittee because of the manner in which the gentleman is proceeding. I will elaborate on my own time.

Mr. CARR. I thank the gentleman. He accurately states his particular predicament, and I respect his judgment.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I do not argue with the right of my good friend, Congressman CARR, to proceed as he is proceeding. As was brought out in the discussion on the rule, Mr. CARR would have the right to introduce as a substitute the original bill with or without the rule.

But I say again, to the gentleman from Michigan, for the life of me I cannot understand why you are choosing to proceed as you are. In fact, I would state to the gentleman from Michigan that during the 18 years that I have served in this House, I have seen the legislative process completely break down on a few occasions. I have seen the House unintentionally mark up a bill on the floor of the House. But, this is the first time, ladies and gentlemen of the Committee, that I have seen a Member consciously and deliberately ask the House to mark up a bill on the floor of the House.

I hope I am not being unkind to my good friend, the gentleman from Michigan, but I seriously think this procedure that he is asking us to follow borders on the edge of anarchy and to use his own terms which someone described as cute and humorous—rhetoric, I have got to question who has lost his moorings? Who has flipped his wig? Who has blown his top?

Why do I say that? Examine the views of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR) closely. Cutting through this cute and humorous rhetoric, he only has really three major differences with the work of the House Committee on Armed Services. And what are those differences?

The first is the large nuclear carrier.

Second, there is aircraft procurement. I would state that I do not agree with all of the aircraft procurement. The gentleman well knows I supported some of his views in the committee. He has described my statement on the floor of this House about speaking out in what I thought was fiscal responsibility.

The third difference is that he wants an add-on for the wide-bodied cruise missile carrier.

But now is he presenting an amendment on the floor of this House expressing his own views, his own honest views, his real views? No, I would state to the gentleman from Michigan, he is not doing that. In fact he came to me as chairman of the R. & D. Subcommittee, and I appreciate his remarks commending the work of the R. & D. Subcommittee, and he asked me to introduce an amendment to his substitute bill restoring the work of the R. & D. Subcommittee. He does not even agree with his own substitute. He does not agree with his bill in regard to aircraft procurement. He has gone around and asked Members of this House to make deals adding back the F–14's. Adding back—I am sure it was the F–14, I would state to the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY)—adding back various systems which the committee acted upon.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. ICHORD was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, what the gentleman is doing, I would state to the gentleman from Michigan, is proceeding in such a manner which is an imposition upon the time of the Members of this House. It is a waste of time. We are going to be voting on the propositions, I would state to the members of the committee, by the way the gentleman is proceeding, twice—more than twice. There is no way we can proceed in any other way.

Why did not the gentleman from Michigan offer a bill expressing a substitute, expressing his own honest view? He is going to put the Members of the House in a position of voting upon proposition after proposition about which they cannot possibly know enough to cast an intelligent vote. He is going to be wasting our time. To proceed in such a manner is throwing away the work of 134 committee meetings and subcommittee meetings. It is throwing away more than 500 hours of work. It is throwing away 175 different budgetary and language amendments which the gentleman from Michigan agrees with.

I ask again: Why is he proceeding in such a manner? He is making more than just a direct attack upon the committee system. Some may disagree with the committee system, but the committee system is the best system until someone comes along with something better. He is not only directly attacking the committee system, but he is attacking the chairman of the committee. I cannot in good conscience proceed in such a farce, with such a charade. I cannot cooperate with my good friend.

I cannot offer the work of the R. & D. Subcommittee that he praised so highly, as an amendment.

The gentleman has put me in a position so that I have to oppose him. I will state this, and listen very carefully to the rulings of the chairman in the consideration of this bill. I am not going to participate in a charade of intentionally marking up a bill on the floor of the House, therefore I am going to oppose the gentleman on every amendment. I am going to raise every point of order I can. The gentleman has heard the Speaker say the amendment is going to be subject to a point of order so therefore I would suggest, to save the time of the Members of this House, that we proceed expeditiously to dispose of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR), in the nature of a substitute. The gentleman will have the right to offer amendments to the committee bill to take up the large issues about which the gentleman is so concerned.

This is the only way we can proceed in a logical and expeditious parliamentary manner.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ICHORD. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding. As the gentleman is aware, during the committee procedures on marking up the bill I offered an amendment to provide $9 million to re-engine the KC–135 aircraft. Does the gentleman recall that amendment?

Mr. ICHORD. Yes, I do, and that was adopted.

Mr. HILLIS. It was adopted in the bill to provide for money enough to extend the life of this aircraft.

I would also like to mention to the gentleman that I was approached to offer this as an amendment, I was asked by our colleague, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR), to offer this amendment to his substitute and he responded that he would accept it.

Mr. ICHORD. I think the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana would not be subject to a parliamentary point of order. Certainly all of the general provisions that will be offered to the Carr substitute will be subject to a parliamentary point of order and I intend to raise every parliamentary point of order I can raise to the amendments that are not germane to the Carr substitute because I cannot see the House conducting itself in such a silly manner.

Mr. HILLIS. If the gentleman will yield still further, I also refused to make the offer of the amendment to the Carr substitute because I thought it was in the tone of making a deal, because I had the suspicion that it was that type of an approach.

Mr. ICHORD. I not only have a suspicion, I know it has happened because the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR) came to me and asked me to introduce the R. & D. amendment.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I think everybody should be clear about what is now involved in the Carr substitute. Briefly, the administration's position has changed to the point where Mr. CARR's substitute now represents a substantial cut from the administration bill as submitted.

Mr. CARR's substitute, as submitted, was $1 billion below the administration bill as submitted. However, the administration has now indicated its support for a CVV carrier. The cost for that carrier, as contained in an amendment intended to be introduced by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ASPIN) is $1.5 billion. That means that Mr. CARR's amendment is $2.5 billion below the administration bill. In addition, Mr. CARR has indicated he will accept an amendment which I understand is to be introduced by the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) to accept most of the deletions in title II, which would be an additional cut of more than $600 million in the bill. That means that Mr. CARR's amendment, in other words, is more than $3 billion below the legislation as now supported by the administration.

Voting for such a proposal could hardly be defined as supporting the administration. It represents a substantial cut in defense. The proposal is really quite similar to the Mitchell transfer amendment which was soundly defeated on the House floor during consideration of the budget resolution.

By contrast, since the administration has now indicated its support for an add-on of $1.5 billion for an aircraft carrier, the difference between the committee bill and the administration proposal is only $848 million, in contrast with the Carr proposal which is $2.5 million less than the administration's recommendation.

Therefore, a vote for Carr is more of an antiadministration vote than a vote against the committee bill.

Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I would like to say that if we were to handle a $38 billion bill like this, with the care that the committee has had in bringing it to the floor and then if we were to substitute a proposal which is obviously very, very improperly organized and not thought through, then we would be bound to have chaos, chaos about perhaps the most important thing this Nation does, which is to defend itself.

To approach this matter in such a cavalier fashion in such a political atmosphere, with so little thought behind it, seems to me to be a travesty on the legislative process. Hundreds of hours have been thoughtfully spent by the Committee on Armed Services and the subcommittees in working out these various matters.

All of the proposals which the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR) now wants to bring out he could have brought to the committee. In some cases he did; in some cases he did not. Anyway, those things were fully debated in the committee. To prostitute the legislative process by now bringing a bill here in such disarray as this bill would be if we used the substitute instead of the committee bill, then it would not only be a terrible reflection on the committee process of Congress but, more importantly, it would be a great blow to the confidence of the American people in the way in which their defense requirements are faced and achieved. The Carr proposal should be rejected.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I think we should all reflect on the atmosphere in which we meet today and the importance of this particular bill, considering the state of our defense in comparison with the state of the Soviet and Warsaw Pact nations' defense, where our security has become very critical, and it seems to me we should be mindful of this to bolster our defenses.

The amendment as proposed really would wipe out the effect of all of our hearings, the testimony, and the committee consideration. I feel, the work of this House is the work of committees.

The net increase in the bill as reported by the committee was $2.4 billion over the President's total budget request of $126 billion. That was consistent with the committee's recommendations to the Committee on the Budget, and it proposed transferring more money into procurement of major combat systems, principally shipbuilding, and making corresponding reductions in lower-priority items. But now, the the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BENNETT) has suggested, the administration has recommended a conventional aircraft carrier, and that in itself will make the difference only $850 million, a half of 1-percent increase. I remind the Members that that particular aircraft carrier has not been planned as yet. As I understand, the plans have not been drawn, so there may be no difference whatever. But more than that, more than just the nuts and bolts procurement of weaponry, the state of our manpower itself is in very critical condition in this country, and this particular bill addresses some highly important changes that are necessary in order to bolster our defenses and build our numbers so that we can respond to any threat against our Nation.

Let me point out some of these particular changes that I think we are advancing that are removed from the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR). There are 17 statutory changes in the committee bill regarding manpower. There are 14 major recommendations in the report.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri

Mr. ICHORD. I thank the gentleman for yielding. In what title are those provisions?

Mr. WHITE. There are four titles. Titles III through VI are titles in which these changes are made and these are dropped.

Mr. ICHORD. There are six titles to the original bill? How many titles are there in the original bill?

Mr. WHITE. Seven,

Mr. ICHORD. I am talking about the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. WHITE. There were eight.

Mr. ICHORD. What about the original bill introduced in behalf of the administration.

Mr. WHITE. There were seven. One was added in committee, and that was knocked out by a point of order.

The increases in training are in the committee bill, for the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and permission for women on ships, is in order to give some opportunity for those graduating from the academies to train, and to provide the necessary repairs on ships on a temporary basis. In the Reserve Forces, mind you, it knocks out numbers of the Reserves. It drops back the Naval Reserve from 87,000 to 51,400. In effect it wipes out the Seabee Reserve which is the major construction backbone of the Navy.

Reserve recruiting incentives are knocked out, and these are highly significant and important if we are going to have a back up force of Reserves. We are limiting the transfer to the Standby Reserve to help the serious Individual Ready Reserve problem.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I thank the gentleman for yielding

In effect what the Carr substitute does is it totally knocks out all of the improvements that we have made in our original bill for the Reserve Forces. Officials from the Department of Defense said if the Reserves are to survive, they are going to have to have incentives, which are included in the original bill which the Carr substitute does not even address itself to.

I do not plan, as the gentleman from Missouri, to offer any amendment to the Carr substitute correcting this situation; but if the Members want to finish the National Guard Reserve, then they ought to vote for the Carr substitute but to support the good work of the committee in Reserve affairs vote against the Carr substitute and for the committee bill.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, if we want to bring back a necessity for a draft for the Armed Forces, then vote for the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR). These were the changes that were pleaded for, that were begged for by those associated with the Reserves, the National Guard. It was partly through the leadership of the gentleman from Mississippi.

There were a number of other parts omitted by the Carr substitute amendment. I will not take the Committee's time on that.

Mr. Chairman, we have worked on this committee bill very carefully. I implore the Committee not to accept the Carr amendment, but let the Committee go forward in an orderly complete posture as we have on this bill.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WHITE. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, a moment ago the gentleman made the statement that if you want to bring back the draft, you should vote for the Carr substitute. Would the gentleman elaborate on that?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. WHITE was allowed to proceed for an additional 2 minutes.)

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, at the present time we are something like 300,000 short on our individual Ready Reserves. We are something like 60,000 or 70,000 short in the National Guard and Reserves. These are the backup forces when the men in the front lines are pushed back by attacking forces. It is imperative to have these backup forces to insure that we have a victory wherever the attack is, presumably in Europe.

In order to retain the manpower we need, we have to give incentives to pull people into these Ready and Active Reserves. If we do not give them the incentive, they are going to decline to the point it is absolutely imperative for the insurance of peace and security in this Nation to develop an active draft system so we have the forces ready to repel anv threat.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR). A number of problems with the gentleman's amendment have been pointed out. One of the major problems is the loss of all general provisions included in the authorization bill. Several of these provisions would authorize the temporary extension of expiring enlistment—reenlistment bonuses—special pay health professional authorities. It is certainly true that these authorities could be extended through the normal legislative process. However, testimony received by the committee has indicated the continued need for these authorities and the general provisions of the original bill provide a timely means of accomplishing this end.

I strongly urge all Members to reject the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR).

The primary impact of H.R. 10929 lies in the authorization of funds for the procurement of the Nation's major weapon systems today, and for research, development, test and evaluation of the Nation's weapon systems of the future. In addition, the bill specifies the personnel levels required to support these complex systems. On a less grand scale—but no less important to those service members affected or to the overall management of the force—the committee has included, in the general provisions of the bill, 2-year extensions of three expiring authorities and language placing in statute the current organizational structure of the Army Dental Corps.

The following authorities expire on September 30:

Reenlistment and enlistment bonuses for enlisted personnel in critical skills;

Special pay for health professionals; and Subsistence allowance for Marine Corps officer candidates in the platoon leaders class.

The committee included the expiring authorities in this bill in order to insure their timely extension. Testimony received by the committee highlighted the continuing need for these authorities and the detrimental effect on accession and retention caused by the uncertainty of short periodic extensions. Further, in the case of special pay for health professionals and the subsistence allowance for Marine Corps officer candidates, proposals have been developed that would substantially revise and replace the present systems. The 2-year extensions add a degree of stability and will permit the Congress to consider fully the proposed change.

REENLISTMENT AND ENLISTMENT BONUSES

Authority to provide reenlistment and enlistment bonuses to enlisted personnel in critical skills expires on September 30, 1978. These programs provide up to $15,000 as a reenlistment bonus and up to $3,000 as an enlistment bonus.

The cost of the extended authority would be $155 million and is included in the Defense Department's appropriation request for fiscal year 1979.

The committee also included a retraining provision addressing the situation where the supply of qualified reenlistees in a critical bonus skill is insufficient to meet the reenlistment objectives for the skill. A valuable secondary source of supply for these skill shortages is personnel with less critical skills who can be induced to undergo voluntary retraining and subsequently to reenlist in the more critical skill. The selective reenlistment bonus has the potential to be a strong incentive for encouraging such personnel to volunteer.

Under present law, a member may only be paid a bonus when the skill in which he reenlists is designated for a bonus at the time of reenlistment. Under the bill, the bonus in effect for a skill at the time a member agrees to retrain in that skill would be the bonus payable to him once he qualifies and reenlists in the new skill.

SUBSISTENCE ALLOWANCE FOR MARINE CORPS OFFICER CANDIDATES

Authority to provide financial assistance to officer candidates under the Marine Corps platoon leaders class program expires on September 30, 1978. This program provides a subsistence payment of $100 for each of the 9 months of the college year after an officer candidate has successfully completed summer training. This is similar to the subsistence allowance paid to ROTC cadets while in the senior ROTC program.

The cost of extending this program would be approximately $1 million and has been included in the Defense Department's appropriation request for fiscal year 1979. Approximately 1,200 officer candidates receive this payment each year.

JUNIOR ENLISTED TRAVEL

The committee, during its markup of H.R. 10929, reaffirmed its strong desire that travel and transportation benefits be provided to dependents of junior enlisted personnel. The committee is particularly concerned with the economic circumstances of junior enlisted personnel stationed overseas. The committee believes that the single most important action that can be taken to alleviate the financial plight of these personnel is to provide travel and transportation benefits.

A system of station cost-of-living and housing allowances attempts to insure that service members stationed overseas are not placed at an economic disadvantage compared to their counterparts stationed in the United States. The committee commends the Department of Defense for the administrative actions it has taken to lessen the hardships incurred by these junior members, such as providing, as of March 1, 1978, full station allowances—instead of a partial payment—to junior members who currently have their dependents overseas.

However, much remains to be done administratively and legislatively. For example, because housing allowances make up a major portion of the service members' expenses, it is especially important that they be computed accurately and adjusted in a timely manner. The Department of Defense has within its administrative authority the ability to specify the method for computing the amount of the housing allowance. Some methods, although administratively more complex, provide a more accurate reimbursement for the higher housing costs incurred by our service members stationed in high-cost overseas areas. Serious consideration should be given to revising the computation method.

The long-range benefits of providing travel and transportation benefits to dependents of junior enlisted personnel and other actions include potentially better reenlistment rates, less attrition before completion of enlistment, and longer overseas tours. These management considerations aside, a grievous inequity exists, and the burden of this inequity falls most heavily on those least able to bear it.

I take this opportunity, during the debate on a major weapons procurement bill, to reemphasize for the record the committee's strong support for the administration's request for funds for junior enlisted travel entitlements. Without the availability of our highly qualified junior enlisted personnel, the weapons we discuss are useless.

Mr. Chairman, we have before us a bill that sets the foundation for the defense of our Nation. I believe it is a solid foundation, and I strongly urge my colleagues to support the committee bill and to reject the amendment by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR).

Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. DAN DANIEL).

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the Carr amendment. A basic issue which we have before us today—trimmed of all the rhetoric—is the preservation of the time-honored system of legislating through committees.

Congress, like all legislative bodies, relies heavily upon the work experience and wisdom of its committees. Obviously, it would be impractical—if not impossible—to write every bill here on the floor. Even the least controversial of problems would confound us if we sought to do all our business in the manner being suggested here today.

But on a matter of this magnitude, it borders on the irresponsible to expect that what our committee has spent weeks to achieve can be effectively reshaped in a matter of hours. Our committees spend months considering matters within their jurisdiction and then bring to the floor what is considered to be the best collective judgment of the majority. While the results certainly do not represent perfection, it is the collective judgment of elected representatives. It is not the judgment of faceless planners in the Office of Management and Budget.

Members would do well to consider that while we tend to rely upon precedents in this body, once an established procedure is abandoned, it could come back to haunt us. The administration may see this as good procedure for today, but it could be used in precisely the opposite way tomorrow or next week or next month.

The business of Congress has become too complicated as it is. Let's not further aggravate the situation by trying to cast aside the work of the Armed Services Committee in the name of expediency. If it is done, this will not be last attempt to thwart the committee system, because it will come again, as surely as night follows day.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. DELLUMS AS A SUBSTITUTE FOR THE AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. CARR

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a substitute for the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DELLUMS as a substitute for the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. CARR:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

That this Act may be cited as the Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act, 1979.

TITLE I—PROCUREMENT

SEC. 101. Funds are hereby authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1979 for the use of the Armed Forces of the United States for procurement of aircraft, missiles, naval vessels, tracked combat vehicles, torpedoes, and other weapons, as authorized by law, in amounts as follows:

Aircraft

For aircraft: for the Army, $1,017,800,000; for the Navy and Marine Corps, $3,591,600,000; for the Air Force, $5,376,900,000.

Missiles

For missiles: for the Army, $773,200,000; for the Navy $1,553,600,000; for the Marine Corps, $23,100,000; for the Air Force, $1,461,800,000.

Naval Vessels

For naval vessels: for the Navy, $1,798,100,000.

Tracked Combat Vehicles

For tracked combat vehicles: for the Army, $1,259,100,000; for the Marine Corps, $21,700,000.

Torpedoes

For torpedoes and related support equipment: for the Navy, $364,100,000.

Other Weapons

For other weapons: for the Army, $93,100,000; for the Navy, $34,300,000; for the Marine Corps, $28,000,000; for the Air Force, $300,000.

TITLE II—RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, TEST, AND EVALUATION

SEC. 201. Funds are hereby authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1979 for the use of the Armed Forces of the United States for research, development, test, and evaluation, as authorized by law, in amounts as follows:

For the Army, $2,570,274,000.

For the Navy (including the Marine Corps), $3,777,000,000.

For the Air Force, $3,887,000,000.

For the Defense Agencies, $692,816,000, of which $27,600,000 is authorized for the activities of the Director of Test and Evaluation, Defense.

TITLE III—ACTIVE FORCES

SEC. 301. For fiscal year 1979, each component of the Armed Forces is authorized an end strength for active duty personnel as follows:

(1) The Army, 724,700.

(2) The Navy, 519,700.

(3) The Marine Corps, 170,000.

(4) The Air Force, 561,600.

TITLE IV—RESERVE FORCES

SEC. 401. (a) For the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1979, the Selected Reserve of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces shall be programed to attain an average strength of not less than the following:

(1) The Army National Guard of the United States, 363,000;

(2) The Army Reserve, 196,700;

(3) The Naval Reserve, 51,400;

(4) The Marine Corps Reserve, 33,000;

(5) The Air National Guard of the United States, 92,400;

(6) The Air Force Reserve, 53,200;

(7) The Coast Guard Reserve, 11,700.

(b) The average strength prescribed by subsection (a) of this section for the Selected Reserve of any Reserve component shall be proportionately reduced by (1) the total-authorized strength of units organized to serve as units of the Selected Reserve of such component which are on active duty (other than for training) at any time during the fiscal year; and (2) the total number of individual members not in units organized to serve as units of the Selected Reserve of such component who are on active duty (other than for training or for unsatisfactory participation in training) without their consent at any time during the fiscal year. Whenever such units or such individual members are released from active duty during any fiscal year, the average strength prescribed for such fiscal year for the Selected Reserve of such Reserve component shall be proportionately increased by the total authorized strength of such units and by the total number of such individual members.

TITLE V—CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

SEC. 501. (a) For fiscal year 1979, the Department of Defense is authorized an end strength for civilian personnel of 1,018,200.

(b) The end strength for civilian personnel prescribed in subsection (a) of this section shall be apportioned among the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy (including the Marine Corps), the Department of the Air Force, and the agencies of the Department of Defense (other than the military departments) in such numbers as the Secretary of Defense shall prescribe. The Secretary of Defense shall report to the Congress within sixty days after the date of the enactment of this Act on the manner in which the initial allocation of civilian personnel is made among the military departments and the agencies of the Department of Defense (other than the military departments) and shall include the rationale for each allocation.

(c) In computing the authorized end strength for civilian personnel there shall be included all direct-hire and indirect-hire civilian personnel employed to perform military functions administered by the Department of Defense (other than those performed by the National Security Agency), whether employed on a full-time, part-time, or intermittent basis, but excluding special employment categories for students and disadvantaged youth such as the stay-in-school campaign, the temporary summer aid program and the Fedreal junior fellowship program and personnel participating in the worker-trainee opportunity program. Whenever a function, power, or duty, or activity is transferred or assigned to a department or agency of the Department of Defense from a department or agency outside of the Department of Defense, or from another department or agency within the Department of Defense, the civilian personnel end strength authorized for such departments or agencies of the Department of Defense affected shall be adjusted to reflect any increases or decreases in civilian personnel required as a result of such transfer or assignment.

(d) When the Secretary of Defense determines that such action is necessary in the national interest, he may authorize the employment of civilian personnel in excess of the number authorized in subsection (a) of this section, but such additional number may not exceed 1¼ percent of the total number of civilian personnel authorized for the Department of Defense by subsection (a) of this section. The Secretary of Defense shall promptly notify the Congress of any authorization to increase civilian personnel strength under the authority of this subsection.

TITLE VI—MILITARY TRAINING STUDENT LOADS

SEC. 601. For the fiscal year beginning October 1, 1978, and ending September 30, 1979, each component of the Armed Forces is authorized an average military training student load as follows:

(1) The Army, 67,843;
(2) The Navy, 58,086;
(3) The Marine Corps, 21,324;
(4) The Air Force, 44,917;
(5) The Army National Guard of the United States, 11,793;
(6) The Army Reserve, 5,959;
(7) The Naval Reserve, 991;
(8) The Marine Corps Reserve, 3,074;
(9) The Air National Guard of the United States, 2,471; and
(10) The Air Force Reserve, 1,184.

TITLE VII—CIVIL DEFENSE

Authorization for Defense Civil Preparedness Agency

SEC. 701. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency for fiscal year 1979 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950 the sum of $80,000,000.

TITLE VIII—GENERAL PROVISIONS

RESTRICTION ON CONTRACTING OUT COMMERCIAL AND INDUSTRIAL TYPE FUNCTIONS

SEC. 801. (a) The Secretary of Defense shall submit a report to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives providing the details of any proposed change in policy or regulations, from those in effect before June 30, 1976, regarding the determination of whether commercial or industrial type function at Department of Defense installations located in any State, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and Guam should be performed by Department of Defense personnel or by private contractors during the period beginning on October 1, 1978, and ending on September 30, 1979.

(b) No commercial or industrial type function at any Department of Defense installation referred to in subsection (a) shall be performed by private contractors unless such contractor performance began before the date of the enactment of this Act or performance would have been allowed by the policy and regulations in effect before June 30, 1976. The prohibition in the preceding sentence shall apply until the end of the ninety-day period beginning on the date the report required by subsection (a) is received by the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Certification of Claims

SEC. 802. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, none of the funds authorized to be appropriated for the Department of Defense by this Act shall be used for the purpose of paying any contract claim, request for relief under Public Law 85–804, or other similar request which exceeds $100,000 unless (1) the senior company official in charge at the plant or location involved has certified at the time of submission of such contract claim request for equitable adjustment to contract terms, request for relief under Public Law 85–804, or other similar request, that the claim and supporting data are accurate, complete, and current; or (2) in the case of any outstanding claim, request for equitable adjustment to contract terms, request for relief under Public Law 85–804, or other similar request in excess of $100,000 which was formally submitted without such certification before the date of the enactment of this Act, either (A) such senior official submits such a certificate within 120 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, or (B) a contracting officer's decision has been rendered before such date of enactment, in which case this section shall not constitute a bar to any payment.

Mr. DELLUMS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment in the nature of a substitute be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, is it the understanding of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) that all of the provisions of the amendment are germane?

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman from Maryland will yield, the gentleman would stake his reputation on that. I have checked with the Parliamentarian, and to the best of my knowledge that is correct.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the substitute amendment.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, I also reserve a different point of order on the same amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that only one reservation of a point of order is in order.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) reserves a point of order on the amendment.

The gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) is recognized for 5 minutes in support of his amendment.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, we now have before us three alternatives: First, the alternative offered by the full committee that has been challenged by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR); then we have a second alternative, an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the committee bill, placing before this body the budget offered by the President of the United States, President Carter; and now we have a third alternative, an amendment offered as a substitute for the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR).

This amendment provides a cut. It cuts over $9 billion from the bill of the Committee on Armed Services and over $7 billion from the President's bill.

I would first like to open with a general statement and then go specifically to a discussion of how we arrive at the cuts. Then, finally, Mr. Chairman, I will make some statement as to why I think these cuts are necessary and appropriate.

Every year we come to this point in the budget legislative process when we are faced with the choice of either accepting a defense budget plotted by the actions of the Committee on Armed Services or deleting piece by piece one weapons system at a time. I find this process particularly tedious and intellectually infeasible. It is for that reason that I applaud my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR), who has attempted in his own way today to provide a different framework within which to view the foreign policy and the military posture of this Nation.

I feel that if the Members of this body were given a chance, they would reflect other values than those in the defense budget levels. The committee's authorization proposal shows a lack of discernment, rationale, and restraint. I believe it is now time to present a real choice for a vote on the defense budget. Our intent should be to shape a foreign policy and supporting military structure that reflects our limitations and our true interests.

Our foreign policy should be noninterventionist with our military posture sufficient to defend the United States and our vital interest, but without the adornments necessary for being the police officer of the world or intervenor in the Third World.

It is time to make a choice. Either we must commit yearly over one-fourth of $1 trillion by the Government to build our defenses, in an attempt to patrol and control the actions of the entire world, or we will try to participate in world affairs in ways other than the projection of our military power.

Clearly I feel that we must change our posture in the world militarily and attempt to do only what the American people are willing to pay for and to take those risks that the people are willing to accept.

Mr. Chairman, I would at this point ask this question: What would it take to make the Members of this Congress secure?

We constantly talk about national security. What would make the Members more secure? If we stationed 100,000 more troops in Korea, would that make us more secure? If we increased our overall military strength from a figure of $1.2 billion to $3.2 billion, would that make us more secure?

If we increased the number of our troops to make it equal to that of the Warsaw Pact nations, would that make us more secure? If we built the B–1 bomber, if we had the FB–111, if we sprinkled the terrain with thousands of neutron bomb warheads, if we increased our inventory by a certain number of cruise missiles, would that make us more secure?

What would do it? What would make everyone here secure, who constantly talk about the insecurity of the United States? And I might add, parenthetically, that adding my test, that we should do what the American people are prepared to pay for, and what they are prepared to risk should be the bottom line. Are the American people prepared to pay the billions and billions and billions of dollars to continue to perpetuate a war machine all over the world? And, secondly, are the American people prepared to risk more Vietnams, more Angolas, more Koreas? I hope that we have learned some lessons.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, our attempts to project our power throughout the world lock us into situations where our security and our lives are challenged unnecessarily. Our efforts to maintain third rate dictatorships could be the portal to World War III.

Obviously we cannot pack up and go home but we must decide now where our long-term interests are and begin to shape our foreign policy and military posture accordingly. This will require patience, thoughtful reflection, and effective diplomacy. In Asia, we should back off our capacity to fight a land war in that region. We should assist an indigenous "balance" between China, Japan and the Soviet Union. We should insure a withdrawal from Korea. The prime responsibility for conventional control of Europe must gravitate to our allies.

I have submitted a defense authorization bill which I feel reflects this viewpoint. This substitute authorizes $28.8 billion for military procurement and research and development and lowers the personnel levels for the military. This is $9.5 billion lower than the committee recommendation and $7 billion lower than the President's request. There would be another $1 billion saved as a result of the reduction and deactivation of 83,550 military personnel from the committee bill and 73,000 from the President's. These cuts in military manpower reflect a foreign policy and defense posture that sees our carrier force reduced by one carrier, the Army staying at 13 divisions with a reduction of an air wing for the Air Force and approximately one-half a division for the Marine Corps, reevaluating their mission and subsequent size. Our naval forces should be for any future war, not the conflicts of World War II or Korea. I have cut off the solid gold plating from the committee's naval offerings. Our strategic forces must provide security but they must not provoke. Moves toward a first-strike capability do not provide security for America but greater insecurity in the world.

Specifically, with respect to the Army, the C–12 aircraft, 20, we save $19.6 million. These aircraft were not requested by the President.

Title I, procurement, Navy. The F–14A is an aircraft which has an astronomical cost, weak acceleration, excessive size, and a poor safety and combat readiness record. Fewer planes will be needed if our excessive overseas carrier deployment is reduced. Any gaps in the inventory should be filled with the more cost-effective F–18. This would save $300 million.

Regarding the CH–53E, the proposed total buy of 49 helicopters is not attractive from a cost-effectiveness standpoint. We would cut out 14. This would save $168.1 million.

The Gulfstream, strike $8.1 million for the procurement of a Gulfstream II. This addition was made by the committee to provide a plane for the Commandant of the Marine Corps for his use when traveling between commands. It is certainly unnecessary to add yet another plane to the vast number we already possess in the military inventory. $8.1 million.

Aircraft spare parts and repair, strike $9 million from the committee budget and accept the $6.1 million reduction by the committee. Since these planes will be reduced or canceled, the purchase of spare parts and repair is also reduced or canceled.

The A–10, strike $51.6 million for the procurement of the A–10 aircraft and limit their production this year to nine. The A–10 is a waste of tax dollars. It is expensive and vulnerable when deployed.

As to the F–15, there is no foreign policy or national security justification for carrying through with the expansion of active Air Force wings from 22 to 26. The Air Force wings should be maintained at the post-Vietnam level of 22. Sufficient F–15's have already been assured to modernize the existing 22 wings. Additional F–15's to expand the Air Force structure are simply not necessary. There will be a saving of $1,327,800,000.

Mr. Chairman, with respect to the advance tanker cargo aircraft, we will save $15 million.

The Tomahawk cruise missile, the sea-launched cruise missile, poses severe arms control dangers because it will create the potential to turn every naval vessel into a strategic launch vehicle, thus rendering SALT limitations meaningless and making verification impossible.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) has expired.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, it is my assumption that we are under the 5-minute rule.

I wonder how much longer the gentleman is going to proceed.

Mr. DELLUMS. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Chairman, I will proceed for 5 or 10 additional minutes. We are talking about a substantial bill here. I am willing to stay with the gentleman all night and be here until tomorrow morning. I do not know how long we will talk about it. I think this floor ought to be filled with Members of Congress talking about one of the most important decisions that we will make.

I hope the gentleman will refrain from inhibiting my ability to speak. I have never challenged any Member in this well as to his standing here and speaking as long as he wanted to.

Mr. BADHAM. Further reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I enjoy hearing the gentleman's annual speech, as the gentleman well knows. I am just wondering how long the gentleman is going to proceed.

Mr. DELLUMS. For some minutes.

Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman is going to object, let us not play games with each other. This is a very serious bill before us here.

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there any objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Chairman, I would ask the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. ICHORD) if all of this argument has been made before the committee and whether they had a chance to weigh this matter or consider this approach.

Mr. ICHORD. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Chairman, I am sure that the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) did not attend all of the committee meetings. However, he did express his views before the committee on several occasions, and some of the things he wanted were rejected.

Mr. DELLUMS. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. ICHORD) will recall that my father died during the time of the committee markup. I specifically indicated that I was not prepared at that time because of that major catastrophe, but that I reserved the right to have an opportunity to speak on the floor of Congress.

Mr. ICHORD. The gentleman is correct. The gentleman was absent because of the unfortunate death of his father for a few days.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Reserving the right to object again, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that as the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) just stated, he did serve notice on the committee, because of his inability to appear at the committee sessions and to offer amendments or suggestions, that he would, nevertheless, have some comments to make on the floor of the House.

Mr. Chairman, I personally hope that we can allow him the privilege of using whatever time is required to set forth his views.

Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) is recognized for 5 additional minutes.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to my colleague, the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in response to what the gentleman from Washington (Mr. CUNNINGHAM) said, that, whatever arguments were made before the committee, I think the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) is raising some very fundamental points regarding the effect of the defense budget not only on our national defense capabilities but on the well-being and the economy of the United States of America.

It is a shame that the whole House is not present to hear him because he is doing the country a service, and we have an obligation to the American people to face the issues that he is raising. I want to commend him for taking the opportunity to do so.

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I thank my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

In addition, the weapon is more advantageous to the Soviet Union since the American coastline is more exposed and vulnerable than the Soviet Union's. Since U.S. submarines can launch strategic missiles from 4,000 miles, there is no justification based on deterrents to develop a missile which must be launched from closer to Soviet shores. This would make U.S. submarines more vulnerable and thus weaken deterrents. The saving would be $40.1 million.

Air Force missiles: The air-launched cruise missile should not be produced and developed until more efforts are made in SALT to negotiate trade-offs with the Soviet Union. Development of a full program could create 3 to 8,000 more nuclear warheads; cause proliferation problems with third countries; and create hard-target kill capability which might be feasible for limited nuclear war scenarios. We should not rush ahead before our diplomats have the chance to negotiate real constraints. The saving here is $235 million.

Navy vessels: The SSN–688, an attack submarine, should remain in the force, but it cannot possibly be built 1 day earlier if we contract for it this year or next year. Electric Boat Co., the sole producer, is an average of 3 years behind delivery for each SSN–688 already contracted for. Authorizing a new contract will only give more leverage to Electric Boat Co. to coerce profitable "settlements" from the Navy. Delay this ship until next year. It will save $411.4 million.

CVN—nuclear carrier: This expensive sitting duck is unnecessary and vulnerable, and I would suggest to my colleagues that having a big nuclear aircraft carrier floating around the ocean in the event of the horror of a global nuclear war, this will be the first thing blasted out of the water. We would save the American taxpayer $2.389 billion.

The CGN–42 nuclear cruiser: This is another budget buster for all those people who want to save taxpayers' dollars. There is no program for an all-nuclear Navy. This expensive addition will not solve fueling problems for the fleet. We do not need it in the Third World. Why are we talking about building this? Is it because we want a toy to play with? That toy will cost us $1.096 billion.

What about these frigates—frigging frigates? Strike procurement of four frigates. This is an obtrusive system which is vulnerable in the Atlantic and improper in Asia. This would save us $1.533 billion.

Navy vessel procurement, growth and escalation, strikes $530.1 million for cost growth, and $105.4 million for escalation for prior years. These additional funds are unnecessary and should not be included in this budget to allow—perhaps even encourage—the shipbuilders to obtain cost overruns on their production. If the additional expenses are legitimate, then supplemental legislation can be introduced on a case-by-case basis.

The XM–1 series deserves support, but procurement should be phased in at a slower pace. This would save us $151 million.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

(By unanimous consent Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 5 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. The MK–15 close-in weapons system, otherwise known as Phalanx, has never been demonstrated to work properly against realistic targets. Test and evaluation to date have been against targets that do not adequately simulate the threat. Deferring funding would save us $95.5 million.

R.D.T. & E. Navy: The Trident II missile program; this Trident would create unwarranted counterforce capabilities through improved accuracy and maneuverable warhead.

The 4,000-mile range of the Trident I is sufficient to protect the deterrent role for the foreseeable future. Why do we want to go beyond the deterrent to a counterforce capability which puts us in a first strike nuclear capacity, then forcing the Soviet Union to do the same thing, and thereby destabilizing the peace and not bringing it about? That would save us $5 million.

The Aegis missile system is intended to protect our carriers and other high profile ships from high intensity threats. There are two basic problems. First, the offense probably would have the advantage since it could saturate the Aegis system with large numbers of cheap cruise missiles and overwhelm even the Aegis' impressive computer capability. Second, the Navy mission for which the Aegis was originally planned—protecting supercarriers in a power projection role against the Soviet Union—has been significantly deemphasized by Navy planners. It would not be cost-effective to procure the Aegis system to protect smaller carriers in a sea-control mode. That would save $25.4 million.

On surface effect ships, the system is not supported by the Department of Defense, and that would save us $93 million.

On the R.D.T. & E. Air Force, finally, the advanced ballistic reentry system (ABRES) is a major stride toward maneuverable reentry vehicles and first strike capacity. This is destabilizing the world peace, and we have argued about that many times. My point is simple. With two nations capable of deterring each other, we have not fought a war against each other, but once one gets a first strike capability, then the other has to attain it, and then bad communications, et cetera could trigger a holocaust. This item saves us $130 million.

The AMST would provide technical capability to airlift troops from one NATO sector to another. Again, there is a superior alternative to this unilateral upgrading of U.S. contributions so that the durability of NATO does not depend on U.S. reinforcement capabilities. The current C–130 fleet is sufficient for most airlift needs. U.S. improvements for NATO should be focused on defense of the American sectors, not on a U.S. assumption of defense of other sectors—at least not until better efforts to raise contributions from allies have been made. That would save us $3 million.

Mr. Chairman, for those who believe that our military budget is too low, I agree with them if we accept their assumptions. Our former Secretary of Defense Mr. Schlesinger also agreed with them. That is why they knocked him out of the last administration—because of his hard line. He stated that if we are to play our role as we see it, of the police officer, the most powerful insurgency force in the world, and all these things that people want to do, and get involved in Zaire, and so on, all over the world, it would cost a considerably larger amount of money. His challenge to the administration was that they keep introducing a political budget, high enough to get some improvements but not high enough to get the job done. If we are to go down that road, then we will be spending at least a quarter of a trillion dollars for defense by the late 1980's.

When we do that, what do we do with the other human services programs? Do we throw them out the window? It seems to me that we cannot do that.

Then we must chart a new course, a course different than moving toward a $250 billion budget by the latter part of the 1980's, or a military budget which is a political budget that does not get the job done as you perceive it. Like the budget before us now.

I have a third alternative, and that is a budget that reflects a different role in the world. The world is changing. We cannot return to the 1950's dominance of the world, no matter how much we believe we want to.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, of course this is the first time I have had an opportunity to review the amendment offered by the gentleman from California. I would like to ask him just what he is doing. The committee authorized $37.9 billion; the administration bill, as submitted authorized $35.5 billion; and the Carr substitute has $34.5 billion.

I would like to ask just what the gentleman's substitute authorizes?

Mr. DELLUMS. It is $28,409,200,000.

Mr. ICHORD. The gentleman then is approximately $6 billion under the Carr substitute.

Mr. DELLUMS. That is correct, and it is almost $9 billion under the committee.

Mr. ICHORD. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. DELLUMS. My point, Mr. Chairman, was that our role in the world now must change. We cannot return to our dominant role of the 1950's. How can we? Do we add a million troops here, or more B–1 bombers here, or more troops in Korea, or more in Africa?

Why should we try to turn back to the dominance we had in the 1950's? Even if we could, or even if we thought we could, you simply cannot turn back the hands of time. This is a changing world and therefore our role in the world must also change. It must not be based upon a projection of our military power. For goodness sakes, right now we are frightening to death the American people with the prospects that face us, yet you and I know we have the capability to destroy all life on the Earth. Just refer back to a study that was made in the days of McNamara, and that study said that once you got 400 nuclear weapons you could knock out 30 percent of the Soviet Union and 70 percent of the Soviet Union's economy. But the same study also pointed out that it would knock out 70 percent of our economy and population because of the close proximity of our population to the developmental centers of our country. Each nation has the ability to destroy each other. We ought to change this posture. We ought to be pressing throughout the world a demonstration that ours is a role of peace in the world. Let us try to secure a breakthrough and to move away from the planned destruction that we are moving toward. Because if we continue to develop these more sophisticated weapons we will eventually arrive at a first-strike nuclear war capability, but that also could mark the end of the Earth as we know it now because at that point somebody else would also develop such a capability and then all kinds of hell could and probably will break loose.

I would ask: Where can we fight a conventional war where it will not escalate into a nuclear war? We must stop lying to the American people that building more bombs protects them and gives them more security. It does not, it brings them less security.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, what of the American people who are putting locks on their windows and bars on their doors and who are buying watchdogs, what is that for?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(On request of Mr. LLOYD of California and by unanimous consent, Mr. DELLUMS was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. DELLUMS. As I was saying, Mr. Chairman, what about the American people who are buying watchdogs and putting bars on their doors and windows, is it because they are worried about the Soviet Union coming over here? That is not what makes the American people feel insecure. And I would suggest to my colleagues that building bigger and more dangerous bombs is not bringing about security for the American people. I believe that we therefore should use some logical reasoning and sanity in approaching this military budget.

The amount in this budget is not enough to do what some of you want to do. I would agree with that and many people also agree. I do not think you want to take it to that high a level. And if you do not then I say let us redefine our military posture in the world and let us separate insanity from the reality of the moment.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, I can understand what the gentleman is saying, and I do not necessarily agree with what the gentleman is saying. While there are many who believe in what the gentleman is saying, there are many others who do not including myself concur in the gentleman's views on this subject.

The only way we can survive is through what we can do by maintaining adequate protection for this country and that is all we are talking about today.

Mr. DELLUMS. I also agree with that principle but I come right back to the gentleman and say that I believe we already have that adequate protection. We already have the ability to destroy all life on the earth now. We have superiority over the Soviet Union.

Mr. LLOYD of California. But not if we were involved in a war.

Mr. DELLUMS. Yes, but I hope we never have to fight a war.

And that is the insanity of this whole discussion, we seem to talk like we really want to fight a nuclear war. Does the gentleman realize what would happen in a nuclear war?

Mr. LLOYD of California. I certainly do.

Mr. DELLUMS. Millions of Americans would be blown to smithereens.

Mr. LLOYD of California. I do realize what would occur but I just believe that if we are adequately defended in peace we will not have to fight any war. And that is precisely what we are talking about.

Mr. DELLUMS. And I would suggest simply that we are already at that point.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) desire to be heard on his point of order?

Mr. STRATTON. I do not, Mr. Chairman. I withdraw my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman withdraws his point of order.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, if I could have the attention of the gentleman from California, for whom I have a great deal of respect and for whom our committee has a great deal of respect, we oftentimes have similar goals although different routes to achieve them. There are two ways to cut defense. One is through the old Republican way, the Bow amendment, whereby slashes were taken across the board of 5 or 10 percent, and things of that nature. We nickel and dime the Department of Defense to death, and we spread them thin all around the world. I think that is the wrong way to go about it.

I think it is our responsibility to pick and choose and to identify those programs which are weak and which are of low priority and to phase them out.

The gentleman a few years ago was attracted to the Mansfield amendment, as I was, for he has little confidence in the ability of NATO to respond under present circumstances. There are those who believe that NATO should be beefed up, and that is the route through which this administration is proceeding; but I would suggest that we should again take a look at NATO and under the leadership of the gentleman from Illinois, our chairman, (Mr. PRICE) there are three panels which have been set up to look into the structure of NATO and provide some input into mutual and balanced force reduction, into SALT, and also with reference to the Indian Ocean to see whether or not we can do better.

The main point I have to make is the fact that if we cut across the board, we are going to be spread too thin everywhere, and that is not the way to go. For example, the personnel cuts are alarming, whether in California, Georgia, or wherever they might be. We cannot afford less people than are necessary to do the job. Therefore, I would encourage this House to consider very carefully any effort to make piecemeal cuts; rather, we should identify areas of low priorty and get cuts.

Before I yield the floor, I would like to point out the fact that much reference has been made to mutual assured self-destruction, I will call it. There has been some misconception about the ability of this Nation and Russia to destroy the world. That just is not true. We do not have enough weaponry in this country, nor does the Soviet Union have, to destroy the world. That concept is predicated on the notion that everyone will come into town on bombing day. That is not going to happen in Russia, for on bombing day all of the people are going to start walking. They plan to live. They plan to survive, and we must do the same thing to survive.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. SKELTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I am intrigued by what the gentleman says. What he says is so true. Is it not true that there are what we call prime targets, prime potential targets, which in the event of attack would be the first areas which would receive a nuclear warhead?

Mr. BRINKLEY. The gentleman is absolutely correct. They are basically unprotected. We have systems which are on the drawing boards, to be sure, but they have not been developed, nor have they been practiced. There needs to be much emphasis placed in that area.

Mr. SKELTON. I might point out that there are some 50 areas that are in the so-called prime target areas. They are the nuclear retaliatory force areas, including ICBM fields such as the one in my district, certain SAC bases, and certain submarine bases. These areas have some 10 million people in them. In the event of a nuclear holocaust or war, these are the areas that would receive the attention from any enemy; is that not correct?

Mr. BRINKLEY. That is correct. They are prime targets.

Mr. SKELTON. Let me point this out. Is it not true that Russia, a potential adversary, feels or has a different concept than what many people feel or have. They feel that most of the people could survive any initial strikes in a nuclear war; is that not correct?

Mr. BRINKLEY. That is correct. They are taught that in grammar schools. They have citizen training so many hours a year. They plan to live.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(At the request of Mr. SKELTON, and by unanimous consent, Mr. BRINKLEY was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. SKELTON. If the gentleman will yield further, is it not true also that the civil defense of Russia is based on a comparable level to a department agency that we have here, a Cabinet agency that we have in this country? Is that not correct?

Mr. BRINKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. SKELTON. Is it not also true that every youngster in the Soviet Union has a handbook of civil defense preparedness and orders in the event of attack? Is this not correct?

Mr. BRINKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. SKELTON. So their philosophy is different from ours. They intend in the event of a war to survive. Should we not look at it through the same view?

Mr. BRINKLEY. That is correct. The Soviet system is a system of dispersal.

We are developing that in pilot centers in New York, Robins Air Force Base in Georgia, and other places. Together with that, there should be emphasis on high risk areas.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman has made a very thoughtful statement.

May I ask, has the gentleman been reading about the inhabitants of Bikini Atoll recently? Yesterday's paper reported that radioactive cesium and other radioactive elements were present in their bodies, absorbed from the soil and so forth, at levels considered to be unsafe and they are once more moving them out of Bikini and they cannot go back for 30 years.

I would like to ask how the American people would fare in the years following a full scale nuclear exchange?

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Chariman, I will tell the gentleman, far better if we had a civil defense system and knew what to do. I have served on this Committee on Armed Services which has investigated the return of these natives to their island. It will involve some preparation, but I will tell the gentleman, we would be far better served if we were prepared.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. BRINKLEY) has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. SEIBERLING, and by unanimous consent, Mr. BRINKLEY was allowed to proceed for an additional 3 minutes.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I yield.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, a couple weeks ago I put another article in the RECORD about the Bikini situation. It pointed out that civil defense authorities in the United States are concerned that following a large-scale nuclear exchange, the radioactive fall-out would go into our soil and would find its way into our rivers, lakes, and underground water systems, and that cleaning up large areas contaminated by radioactive particles that have gone into the soil would be practically impossible. If we can't even make a tiny island like Bikini safe to live on, how would we ever clean up the whole United States after a nuclear war?

I ask the gentleman if the gentleman has read that article and how the gentleman responds to this?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I have not read it, but I must agree with the thrust of what the gentleman is saying. I think what the gentleman is saying is the fact that nuclear war is unthinkable, and we should go to all extremes to avoid it.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, my point is that civil defense, while it may save some lives in the immediate aftermath of an attack, is not able to do very much about the long-range effects which could wipe out the entire population of North America.

Mr. BRINKLEY. I do not agree with the gentleman at all. If the gentleman had listened to the testimony in our committee or to the civil defense authorities and other authorities, he would know that there are wide areas in this country which would be basically unaffected. If we could get a dispersal system which would be effective, we would have sufficient warning to implement it.

This Nation, I will tell the gentleman, has never launched a surprise attack on another nation. Therefore, every Soviet plan contemplates 3 days of warning before an attack.

We have surveillance systems that also provide us with warnings. We can have dispersal.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRINKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I know my friend, the gentleman from Georgia, has studied the issues and is knowledgeable in this field.

The gentleman is aware, of course, that our targeting doctrine is not just to slaughter Russians, but rather to cripple the Soviets' ability to wage war on their industrial base, which we are quite confident would be two-thirds destroyed in half an hour, and as a result of collateral points, immediately one-third of their population would be killed.

The gentleman is not suggesting that the Soviet state of civil defense is going to allow them to disperse their population to overcome an almost destroyed industry, people lacking food, lacking heating oil to heat their homes, and as I understand, the Russian winters are pretty severe; so while I agree that a nuclear war is a big mistake for both sides, I think we are making a big mistake in thinking that somehow the Soviets have the ability to survive a nuclear war that we do not have. Neither side will be the victor.

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is not entirely accurate, because the Russian defense system is geared to protect their industrial base.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia has again expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. BRINKLEY was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Chairman, the precise thing that the Russians do intend to protect is their industrial base. They do have some underground shelters, et cetera, and the damage to people inflicted by this would be collateral damage; but they wish to avoid that as well.

While it would not be our intention to destroy people, I think we would.

Mr. DOWNEY. Absolutely.

Mr. Chairman, will my friend, the gentleman from Georgia, yield further to me?

Mr. BRINKLEY. Yes, I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I would only say, counter to the fact that the Soviets are in the process of industrial expansion, the gentleman is, of course, correct.

The other point is that if we develop our cruise missile and put it on B–52's or air-launch platforms, they will have sufficient accuracy so that we would be able to pinpoint industrial targets within the Soviet Union in a nonprovocative way to destroy that heavy machinery and so that we would be on our way to knock out the Soviet's ability to wage war.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. BRINKLEY) has expired.

(On request of Mr. DOWNEY, and by unanimous consent, Mr. BRINKLEY was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. BRINKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have one point only to make. The gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY) has a good point, and I would simply suggest this:

I would simply say that we are being too minimal in our resources in this program. I am not suggesting that unlimited resources be provided or that we put everything underground, but we should simply be prepared from the standpoint of attitude, and some plan should be formulated, in my opinion. I do think a civil defense plan should be augmented.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment in the nature of a substitute and also in opposition to the Dellums substitute amendment.

Some have referred to this bill as being a budget-busting bill. I think if the Members will read it carefully and get the committee reports and compare the reports on this bill with those of bills from previous years, they will find that it is far from being in that classification.

I hope that it is important for the Members to understand the true facts about the budget. The administration proposal as submitted called for $35.5 billion for the budget categories subject to authorization. The administration has now supported an add-on of $1.5 billion for an aircraft carrier. This was confirmed in a letter to me from the Secretary of the Navy.

That brings the total of the bill supported by the administration to slightly over $37 billion. The committee bill, therefore, is only about $850 million above— and I say, "only" with apologies—the request now supported by the administration. This is a position reflecting a change after the figures were originally given to us.

I might point out that in other authorizations reported to date, the committee accomplished a $201 million reduction: $123 million from the nuclear energy authorization bill and $78 million from the military construction bill. In the total authorizations reported by the committee to date, therefore, we find a net increase of only $650 million above the administration request for this fiscal year.

By contrast, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR) was $1 billion below the administration when introduced, and because of the change in the administration position it is now $2.5 billion below the administration's bill.

To support the committee bill, therefore, would mean voting for an increase of less than $1 billion in defense, an increase of less than 2 percent. Voting for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR), by contrast, would mean supporting a $2.5 billion reduction in defense—a cut of 7 percent in our defense effort.

Mr. Chairman, I urge the Members to vote against the substitute and all amendments thereto. I hope that the judgment of the committee will prevail.

Mr. Chairman, remarks have been made here that this committee acted in deep secrecy during the consideration of this legislation. We have had as many open sessions as was possible without violating the normal rules of security. The markup of the bill was had in executive session.

But our voting records are all matters of public record and anyone who was deeply interested or interested enough could come and find what happened—sometimes practically at the end of the day. But the hearings themselves, the markup, because of the sensitiveness and the security involved, were in executive session. But there were enough open sessions, there were enough printed reports, and there is nothing hidden from the public in those printed reports. The hearings are always printed.

I urge the Members of the Committee to support the committee action.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE) has expired.

(On request of Mr. STRATTON and by unanimous consent, Mr. PRICE was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRICE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to commend our chairman for his statement and to point out, just as the gentleman has said, that the action of the committee was taken according to normal procedures. Many of our sessions were in the open. The gentleman, serving as chairman, has given every member an adequate opportunity to present his views to the committee and to have them acted on. He was most fair.

The attack on the gentleman as chairman and on the committee itself, is I think, an unmerited and unworthy slur on the great leadership of the gentleman from Illinois, and I hope that the Members will support his call for the defeat of the Carr amendment and the Dellums amendment so that we can go back to the committee bill, which represents a careful and reasoned approach.

Mr. PRICE. Every committee gets opposition when they present legislation. But I do not want any incorrect impression left in the committee that we performed only in executive session.

Mr. STRATTON. If the gentleman will yield further, is it not true that all of the rollcall votes that were taken in the committee, even in executive session, have been available for public inspection?

Mr. PRICE. Immediately following the meetings.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRICE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BOB WILSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I just want to say, on behalf of the Republican side of the aisle, we have the fullest confidence in the chairman, and the frivolous criticism that has been cast against the committee under the chairman's leadership is entirely unwarranted, and I hope we can show this to the public by a resounding vote against the Dellums substitute, which is a frivolous substitute, and against the Carr substitute, which is even more frivolous.

Mr. PRICE. I have not considered this as a personal attack on the chairman. It is a normal situation. We have it not only on armed services legislation, we have it frequently on many other acts. I have never considered it a personal matter.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRICE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEIBERLING. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I have the greatest admiration for the gentleman in the well, and I do not construe the very thoughtful and serious substitutes offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR) and the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) as an attack on the gentleman.

As a matter of fact, I know they have great respect for the gentleman in his role as chairman, and I understand the chairman himself opposed many of the amendments that his committee adopted, which got into this bill and turned it into somewhat of a Christmas tree. Is that not correct?

Mr. PRICE. My vote was not unanimous all the time with the committee; but on major matters involved, I supported the majority. I accepted the committee's position.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the Carr amendment.

Mr. Chairman, as one of the Members just pointed out, I am standing here in what looks like a uniform, I guess, and I did not intend to wear a uniform today. But I must say that I also have found myself in a unique position today as I rise in support of the Carr substitute, and I would like to talk to some of the Members about many of the things that have been said there.

First of all, I also want to reiterate that this is absolutely never intended and never has been and never would be intended as an attack on the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE) and his leadership of the committee. I think he has done a very, very good job and a fair job of allowing everyone to be heard. I am sorry that people have tried to use this as a personality matter to try to get votes based on criticism. I do not think that is correct. That is not what was intended or meant.

Mr. Chairman, let me tell the Members why I am supporting the Carr substitute and why I was a little bit distressed with what happened.

Every one of us around here is fully aware of the time pressures we all have. We all are on too many committees; we all are on too many subcommittees. We are running all the time.

The Committee on Armed Services has one of the largest chores there is, in that we are marking up one of the biggest budgets we have every year. We all know that pressure.

We also have adopted a new process in this House since I came here. Many people have said it was the gift of the process liberals which has made them the bane of the House's existence ever since then.

If that is true, I must be guilty of being a process liberal. However, as that process liberal, let me tell the Members what some of the problems are and how we have gotten ourselves into a box by adopting legislation that authorizes the Committee on the Budget to set the budget.

Mr. Chairman, we have all voted on putting a lid on ourselves. I happen to think it is a good idea to put a lid on ourselves. It is similar to the situation in which all of us had credit cards. Imagine what we could do here if we could vote credit cards, rather than our consciences. Mr. Chairman, we just have to discipline ourselves in this respect.

Therefore, I think the budget process, in having a lid put on it, is very, very important. We, as a committee, have to, I think, take much more cognizance of the lid; or we, as a committee, have really become rather useless. What we would do is end up being a menu-providing service, a situation in which we would provide the largest possible menu to the Committee on Appropriations and to the Committee on the Budget to whack away at. I think we will have lost a lot of our effectiveness if we do that.

Mr. Chairman, I find it rather tragic that we have spent hours and hours and hours in marking up and in working on the bill if we come out over the budget. In essence, I think we really are going to hurt national defense.

Mr. Chairman, how can I, PAT SCHROEDER, say we are going to hurt national defense by coming out over the budget? Because the budget is there. They are going to have to stick to the budget. I do not think anyone thinks an increase in the budget is going to float around here this year when we are worried about inflation and everything else.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, what will happen when this authorization request goes to the Committee on Appropriations is that they will be making the choices if we, the committee, did not manage to keep it within the budget authority.

What will happen if they make that request? I truly think it is going to come out of readiness. I think the biggest fear we have is readiness, readiness, readiness. However, there is no readiness lobby.

Let us talk seriously. Whom do we know who is around here lobbying for readiness versus whom we know around here lobbying for hardware? I do not know of anybody who belongs to the readiness lobby. I know of a lot of persons who belong to Grumman and other people like that who happen to be selling hardware.

Mr. Chairman, I just think that when we have readiness versus hardware, we are going to buy more hardware. We are going to have that same old problem over and over again. That is why I fault the committee for giving us much too big a menu of hardware to select.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I am delighted to yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, as the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) well knows, I opposed some of the adds-ons in the full committee, just as did the gentlewoman from Colorado.

However, the gentlewoman from Colorado is making what I must consider a very esoteric statement because she said she rose in support of the Carr substitute. I do not see how she can do that because, as the gentlewoman well knows, in the R. & D. subcommittee we cut $635 million from the bill.

The CHAIRMAN per tempore. The time of the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) has expired.

(On request of Mr. ICHORD and by unanimous consent, Mrs. SCHROEDER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield further?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ICHORD. To continue, Mr. Chairman, as the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) well knows, she supported each and every one of those cuts with the exception of one cut.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentlewoman from Colorado how she can stand in the well there and say that she is in support of the Carr substitute when she is going to have an amendment to the Carr substitute? That is my question about this procedure.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for asking the question because he is my distinguished committee chairman. I think he did a very fine job.

Mr. Chairman, I will be offering an amendment to the R. & D. susbtitute, as the gentleman said.

I feel very strange about doing this because I am going to add on the wide-body cruise missile. I do find it a little strange that I am going to be offering an amendment below that of the Carr substitute but above what the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. ICHORD) wants. That is not my usual position. I am usually not below one and above another. Somehow I have to work all of that out.

Mr. ICHORD. If the gentlewoman will yield further, Mr. Chairman, I think we are both in a strange position because I cannot support the gentlewoman's amendment due to the way in which she is proceeding.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. If the gentleman from Missouri will allow me to respond to the question, let me just say that where I think we probably differ—we did have the markup in closed session, I think both of us agree, and both of us agree that we voted against some things that passed anyway. Where I am a little bit confused is that the gentleman says that he does not want to have to vote on any of these amendments on the floor, that all amendments to that substitute are going to be voted on, whether one agrees or disagrees. The committee bill is the only bill, and we are not going to allow Members to work their will or take a vote even if they agree 100 percent; their hands should be slapped if they even respect the Carr substitute.

I think the Carr substitute is a very serious attempt to have the House look at the budget level. As the gentleman remembers, when we first dealt with this issue of our committee being over the budget, the then Budget Committee chairman attempted to make a point of order, and we were told that a point of order of being over the budget was not sustainable in an authorization, as I recall.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore (Mr. EVANS of Colorado). The time of the gentlewoman from Colorado has again expired.

(By unanimous consent Mrs. SCHROEDER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. So, as a consequence, we have gotten ourselves in this position—and I am talking to the gentleman from Missouri very seriously. I am very frustrated that we cannot make a point of order if we are over the budget. We are really deferring all the selections to another committee, and we are not making the hard choices that the gentleman from Missouri was willing to make in his subcommittee.

Mr. ICHORD. If the gentlewoman will yield further, I think this problem is because of the inadvisable manner the gentlewoman is proceeding. If the gentlewoman had offered a substitute expressing her honest views, then I think she would be in a much more credible position.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I would like the opportunity to represent what my views are. I think other Members are going to try to do so also. I find it sad, but I will tell the gentleman why we offered the President's budget rather than ours. I suppose it is a bit of humbleness, and of none of us being able to totally come together.

Mr. ICHORD. But the gentlewoman does not agree with the President's budget.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I agree with a lot of it, and with the R. & D. part of the gentleman's.

Mr. ICHORD. The gentlewoman agrees with an awful lot of the committee bill, does she not?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I certainly do, but I think we should still try and get the committee bill back down to the budget figure or all of the work could be cast aside. I care too much about it for it to be cast aside, all the work the committee has done, and have some other committee take over and make hard choices that I think we should make, because I think, in all honesty, that our committee knows more about a lot of the things and issues than other committees, such as Appropriations and Budget, which have much broader jurisdiction. I think we are the specialists, and we are the ones who should make these very tough decisions.

Therefore, I urge the Members to support the Carr substitute, and also to amend the Carr substitute where they think it is incorrect or not enough. I think it makes a lot of sense, and I will be offering the R. & D. amendment, which will, I think, be just a bit above my chairman. I find myself in a unique position.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the Carr substitute.

Mr. Chairman, a good portion of this authorization bill and the military budget generally reminds me of the famous story about the Mississippi River steamboat which had such a big whistle that every time it blew its whistle the engines stopped. It seems to me that the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS), while his cut probably goes farther than anybody would realistically expect this House to support, nevertheless has raised some very basic questions about the whole tenor and thrust of our Defense budget.

He pointed out the gold-plated character of the budget. Not only do we have a nuclear supercarrier, mere 60,000-ton non-nuclear carriers, and nuclear cruisers in this proposal, but we have MX missiles and a host of other expensive gadgets. Happily we have disposed of the B–1 bomber, but it is a symptom. A few years ago we disposed of the then version of the main battle tank that everybody finally realized was another gold-plated monster. We are still toying with a neutron bomb which would provide less deterrence for NATO and cost twice as much.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEIBERLING. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman said we have already disposed of the main battle tank. There is a good deal of money in this budget for the XM–1 tank program and that is the main battle tank. And we should be glad that money is there for tanks to protect our troops in Europe.

Mr. SEIBERLING. We disposed of an earlier version. Since then, they made some changes in it, and maybe it is a little better. But it is still another monster.

The gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) did a very good job of cataloging this kind of thing.

I think we do need to beef up NATO. I commend the chairman for his efforts to do so. But I question whether a lot of the things in this budget are going to move in that direction or move us in the opposite direction. The situation with the military budget is still as described by former Gen. James Gavin in a private conversation I had with him about 7 years ago. He said that the military would like to have every military application of technology as fast as it can be created and that if we let them have their way they would bankrupt the country.

Certainly the Congress has an obligation to exercise some very tough restraints. It is not just important from a military standpoint. It is important from an economic standpoint. The military spending that is going on around the world, as well as in this country, is the most important factor feeding the constant rise in prices and in inflation. We have spent $2 trillion in this country on military budgets since World War II, and 95 percent of it produces no benefits for the Nation's economy. It is like printing money to pay one's bills: It puts money into circulation but does not create the goods and services to satisfy the demand created by that money. It is highly inflationary. In addition, it takes huge chunks of capital from the civilian economy that could produce far more jobs than spending the money on military programs. So it also adds to our unemployment problem.

I am not suggesting we do away with the Defense budget, but I am suggesting we could do away with a lot of these unnecessary and very costly programs.

For example, funding an additional $1 or $2 billion aircraft carrier would in my view be one of the most foolish mistakes this House could make. Last year we rejected the Nimitz class super carrier. There is no reason why we should reverse direction now.

There are at least two major grounds for questioning the missions which carriers have been used to carry out in the recent past. First, the carrier has been used extensively since World War II in power projection missions against Third World countries. It was used in Lebanon, in Vietnam, in the Dominican Republic, and elsewhere. By now we should have learned the futility of this type of armed counterinsurgency. Certainly this country is determined not to engage U.S. Forces in future Vietnam-type wars. We do not need new carriers for the type of mission which we might have to carry out. And in the event of an emergency which could require offshore power projection against a small country, our current resources are more than adequate now.

As to the super carrier, its use in power projection missions against the Soviet Union is already being deemphasized within the Navy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SEIBERLING was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Chairman, that role is being deemphasized in the Navy and there are several reasons. First, the area around the Soviet Union will certainly be a high threat environment in the event of a war in Europe. It will be extremely costly to protect the carrier in this environment. Expensive Aegis carrier defense missile systems set on nuclear strike cruiser and other platforms will have to fend off attacks. If the carrier survives, only 36 of the 85 aircraft on board the supercarrier are designed for the attack role. The rest are committeed to carrier defense, air superiority, electronic countermeasures, reconnaissance, antisubmarine missions, and so on.

Hence, the closer the supercarrier moves toward the Soviet Union, the greater the assets it must commit simply to defend itself and the greater likelihood that several well-paced cruise missiles or other type of precision-guided munitions will knock the carrier out of action for a long enough period of time to render it useless.

So the giant carrier added on by the Armed Services Committee does not make political sense, it does not make military sense, and it does not make economic sense. We just simply have to end this kind of gold-plated approach toward the military budget.

The alternative is to exercise fiscal discipline and to hope that the President can move ahead with negotiations in the SALT talks to put a curb on the technological arms race and end this vicious spiral that is so destructive of the economy, of our people's morale, and of the hopes of the people of the world for a more sensible and humane order of things.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. SCHROEDER TO THE AMENDMENT IN THE NATURE OF A SUBSTITUTE OFFERED BY MR. CARR

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. SCHROEDER to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by Mr. CARR: Strike all of the language following "section 201." of title II, and insert the following:

Funds are hereby authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1979 for the use of the Armed Forces of the United States for research, development, test, and evaluation, as authorized by law, in amounts as follows:

For the Army, $2,586,215,000, of which the $8,100,000 available for cooperative tank gun development shall not be obligated unless the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives acts favorably on the proposed reprogramming action for fiscal year 1978 funds for cooperative tank gun development as requested by the Department of Defense on January 31, 1978.

For the Navy (including the Marine Corps), $4,287,009,000, of which $10,000,000 shall be available only for research and development of the existing Extremely Low Frequency (ELF) system and none of which shall be available for full-scale development or construction of a new test bed facility for such system.

For the Air Force, $3,989,400,000, of which $29,200,000 shall be available for continued research and development of a Cruise Missile Carrier (CMC).

For the Defense Agencies, $974,816,000, of which $27,600,000 is authorized for the activities of the Director of Test and Evaluation, Defense.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. (Mr. EVANS of Colorado). The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I thought the amendment offered as a substitute by the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR) was the issue before the House and I do not see how an amendment to the Carr amendment in the nature of a substitute is in order.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will state that perfecting amendments to the Carr amendment in the nature of a substitute are in order at a time.

Mr. BOB WILSON. But, Mr. Chairman, we have not yet disposed of the Dellums substitute to the Carr amendment in the nature of a substitute.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. The Chair will further advise the gentleman from California (Mr. BOB WILSON) that the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. DELLUMS) was a substitute for the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR) and that amendments to the Carr amendment in the nature of a substitute are in order.

Mrs. SCHROEDER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, in essence, would restore the research, development, test, and evaluation section, title II, of the committee bill, in the fiscal year 1979 defense authorization.

Mr. CARR. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Chair announces that pursuant to clause 2, rule XXIII, he will vacate proceedings under the call when a quorum of the Committee appears.

Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

QUORUM CALL VACATED

The CHAIRMAN pro tempore. One hundred Members have appeared. A quorum of the Committee of the Whole is present. Pursuant to rule XXIII, clause 2, further proceedings under the call shall be considered as vacated.

The committee will resume its business.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment will restore the research, development, test, and evaluation section in title II of the committee bill, with one exception. That exception would be an add-on of $29.2 million which would be used in further continued research and development of the wide-bodied cruise missile carrier.

This amendment would further the R.D.T. & E. activities of over $11 billion. I have the exact figures if someone wants them; but it would be approximately $607 million below the Carter administration—Carr substitute.

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Chairman, I notice the gentlewoman is adding $29,200,000 for the cruise missile carrier; is that correct?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. That is correct.

Mr. WHITEHURST. I have two questions. One is what programs will this money be taken from, any specific ones?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. This would be exactly what we passed out of the R. & D. Committee with this added on for a cruise missile study, wide-bodied cruise missile study. This is an add-on to what we reported out of the committee.

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Chairman, let me ask this. Since the Department request was $41.2 million, how do we arrive at this particular figure of $29.2 million; what is this going to do?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. That is an excellent question. The gentleman knows that we did have a request in the $41 million figure for two of these. They were going to lease two wide-bodied carriers. We have looked at it and determined they could probably do very adequately with one and we could save money by not leasing two of them.

So what we would be asking the Members to do is to carry on the study with one leased wide-bodied carrier, and, therefore, we were able to reduce the cost from the $41 million we had in the President's request originally down to the $29.2 million I have put in here.

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentlewoman.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, I have a question for the gentlewoman, and that is this:

What are the specifics that would be applicable to this wide-bodied carrier that we have in this program?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, let me state the specifics. I must admit that I voted against this in committee because I felt that two were too many, but the specifics would be to allow us to lease a 747 or one of the other wide-bodied carriers and attempt to put air-launched cruise missiles on them.

Mr. LLOYD of California. The gentlewoman does not really intend that this would be in our weapons systems arsenal?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. This is to be in research and development. We are not procuring this for the weapons systems arsenal.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Just for research and development?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. And test and evaluation.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Research, development, test, and evaluation in what area? Are we going to harden the airframe? Are we going to do anything about increasing the speed and capability of the aircraft?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow me to explain, we have a classified document—and I think the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY) had it last—stating how the wide-bodied cruise missile carrier could survive, and it gives more details about what really could be done.

I am always a little leery about coming down here and saying exactly what we are going to do because I am never exactly sure about what is classified and what is not. The document talks about the rate of attrition and how survivable they would be and what they would be doing to test it in the test and evaluation program.

I do not know that I would propose that this is what they should do over the long-range or that they should put it in the arsenal, but I think if we will read the report, we can learn more about it. I think it is necessary that a test and evaluation should be made of one unit that is leased, and then we can decide where we go from there. I think we are guessing about some things in some instances, although we do have details in the report.

Mr. LLOYD of California. But the gentlewoman is suggesting in reality that the B-52's are not adequate; is that what the gentlewoman is suggesting?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. No; the gentlewoman is not suggesting that the B-52's are not adequate. The gentlewoman is saying that there are differences between penetrating bombers and stand-off air platforms.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) has expired.

(On request of Mr. LLOYD of California, and by unanimous consent, Mrs. SCHROEDER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, the gentlewoman feels that the stand-off air platform might make some sense, at least enough sense that it would be reasonable to spend $29 million to test it.

What it would do is this: It would have the cruise missiles on it, and it clearly would not be intended to penetrate boundaries or penetrate lines. It would be standing off and firing from a long distance, so we would not be worrying about hardening it in quite the same way as we would worry about that in the use of a penetrating bomber.

The question to be answered is: Would these be much cheaper? Would they be more survivable? A lot of it would depend on the air-launched cruise missiles.

There are all sorts of ancillary considerations. I think it would be wrong for us to cut off this alternative by not proceeding on the test and evaluation since it is really not all that expensive. It is not meant to be a substitute for the penetrating bomber; it is just another idea.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, I am still not sure I understand. The gentlewoman says she does not want it in place of a penetrating bomber, as far as this airframe is concerned.

Will it be used in a combat situation, or would it be used in a based air-to-air attack?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I think it depends on how far it can stand off?

Mr. LLOYD of California. How far does the gentlewoman suggest it could stand off, 1,000 miles, 500 miles, or 10,000 miles? Are there some figure?

In other words, I think the gentlewoman is asking us to accept an amendment which says: Let us test this thing, but we are not talking about specifics as to what it will really do to enhance our weapons system capability. That is what I am concerned about.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I hope the gentleman will read the report that is available. As I say, I have read it. I always hesitate to say anything and go into such specific details because sometimes I put my head in a noose. But the report makes some very strong comments and suggest that this might be the way to go, that it would be survivable, and that it really is not as undefendable as people thought in the past. An awful lot of it depends on what range we have on the air cruise missiles, as we all know.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) has expired.

(On request of Mr. ICHORD, and by unanimous consent, Mrs. SCHROEDER was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I am delighted to yield to the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, I have asked for this additional time for the gentlewoman because I do not quite understand the amendment.

The gentlewoman has the same figures as the R. & D. Subcommittee reported out for the Air Force, that is $3,989,400,000, of which $29,200,000 shall be available for continued research and development of a cruise missile carrier.

From what programs are you taking the $29,200,000. Since the gentlewoman is using the same figures the Subcommittee on Research and Development came out with, the gentlewoman has to get $29,200,000 from some other program. I ask the gentlewoman what program she is taking $29,200,000 from.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. We added it to the bill.

Mr. ICHORD. I do not believe the gentlewoman did.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. We did. We added it to the total aggregate sums.

Mr. ICHORD. Would the gentlewoman look at her amendment, please? The gentlewoman has the same figures, $3,989,400,000.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I ask the gentleman to look at the total figures. If the gentleman will look at the total figures, we are coming in at $11,866,640,000.

Mr. ICHORD. I would state to the gentlewoman, with all respect for her views, she still has $3,989,400,000 for the Air Force. Now she has lost the $29,200,000 some place.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. No. My understanding is that this is a $29.2 million add-on to the total R.D.T. & E. package. And that is what our intention is. If it is incorrect, we will submit a technical amendment. But I understand that that total sum adds up to $29.2 million above what we reported in the committee bill at the moment. As I say, I find it unique that I am offering more than the gentleman from Missouri and to be worrying about that position.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the members of the committee will have the report before them. I would direct their attention to page 61. If the members will get a copy of the amendment of the gentleman from Colorado, I direct their attention to the next-to-the-last paragraph.

A few minutes ago, I raised objections to proceeding in what I characterized as a very inane manner, and I think that I can show the members just how inane this procedure is.

My good friend, the gentlewoman from Colorado, rose on the floor and said she was for the Carr amendment. She is not for the Carr substitute. She has just shown that she is not for the Carr substitute. She has offered an amendment cutting $635 million from the Carr substitute.

Going back to page 61 of the committee report, the Subcommittee on Research and Development, in title II, reported out $3,989,400,000 for the Air Force R.D.T. & E. program.

Now I go to the gentlewoman's amendment the next-to-the-last paragraph, and it states: For the Air Force, $3,989,400,000, of which $29,200,000 shall be available for continued research and development of a cruise missile carrier.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) what program in the Air Force R. & D. program is she reducing. She is keeping the same overall figure. She is saying $29.2 million shall be devoted to the CMC.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ICHORD. I yield to the gentlewoman from Colorado. I hope she will please give me an answer.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I will be quite happy to give an answer to the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. ICHORD).

First of all, the gentleman asked me why did I say I was for the Carr substitute when I am now offering the research and development section from the bill? Because I probably agree with more of the Carr substitute than I agree with in the committee package. I am trying to make it something with which I can live. I think it is more within the budget.

For the reasons we discussed before, I feel we should try very hard to stay within the budget or we lose our effectiveness.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, I heard the gentleman saying that while he is for some of the committee report, he is going to vote against it, even though I offer it.

Mr. ICHORD. We are both in strange positions, but where does the gentlewoman get this $29.2 million figure from?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. If the gentleman is correct and it is not added in there correctly, then I should offer a technical amendment to it. I am sorry that I did not do it.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can consult with my husband. He will tell the gentleman that I do have great trouble in balancing my checkbook also. However, what I am saying is that I do not think this is the first amendment that has been incorrect. Clearly, the purpose of this amendment was to have this added on. That is clearly my intent. I did want to add more than the gentleman from Missouri did, and I suppose it was a psychological, Freudian slip because somehow I had great trouble in offering more money than the gentleman from Missouri was for. That is why I probably blew it. It was a psychological slip.

In any event, that is certainly what I intended. I will offer a technical amendment to make sure that that is so.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the candor of the gentlewoman from Colorado. I appreciate her honesty and her frankness with the committee. However, this is exactly the point I have been making all along. I think the gentlewoman made a great tactical error by introducing a substitute which she is not in agreement with and which the gentleman from Michigan is not in agreement with because the gentlewoman supported all of the cuts of the R. & D. subcommittee, and then she has to introduce this amendment. Where does the $29.2 million come from?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. ICHORD) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. ICHORD was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. ICHORD. To continue, Mr. Chairman, here we are with the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) marking up a bill on the floor of the House, and intentionally doing so.

Why did not the gentlewoman come back and offer a version as a substitute which she truly supports? She is consuming the time of the House. She is wasting the time of the House. We are going to be voting more than twice on every issue. We can vote on the CMC later on as a separate amendment. We can vote on the large nuclear aircraft carrier later on as a separate amendment. We can vote on the add-ons on the airplanes on a separate amendment.

However, Mr. Chairman, I wonder why the gentlewoman from Colorado proceeds in this manner, which I consider an imposition upon the time of the Members of the House.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ICHORD. I yield to the gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, one of the reasons I feel strongly that this is the proper way to go is that I agree with more of the substitute than I do with the committee bill.

Yes, we can offer an amendment to strike the Olympics and some of the other things in there; and we will if we go back to the committee bill. However, I think this is a good way to go.

The reason I selected the Commander in Chief budget rather than my writing my own is that sometimes I do not add things up right, and I feel the Commander in Chief budget is more apt to be accurate than if I, PAT SCHROEDER, put together a magic bill which I think everyone will accept.

I think that was a very good starting point, had tremendous backup and all sorts of authority behind it. Many, many thousands of people worked on it. Obviously, we are just a few over here. We just feel that was a good starting point for the Congress so that it could work on the budget of the other branches and amend it as it goes forward.

Mr. ICHORD. If I may reclaim my time, Mr. Chairman, by the time the gentlewoman corrects her amendment, by the time we have all the other amendments, and the deals that have been made, we are going to be here all week. The amendment should be voted down and permit the House to get down to more serious business and especially proceed in a more expeditious parliamentary manner.

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, the committee bill is definitely a step in the right direction. The substitutes that have been proposed would be damaging, seriously damaging, at a time when we need to add to America's conventional warfare capability; to our posture as a nation able to defend itself.

We are gaining more and more the image of a paper tiger that can be pushed around at will. There are none who do not recognize the tremendous superiority in conventional weapons which the Russians have. There are those who say it is our nuclear capability that serves as a deterrent to the Russians. What deterrent? What is stopping the Russians? They are moving all over the world. One nation after another is falling into their orbit.

The Communists now have nearly all of Asia; they are moving in Africa, into one country after another. They want the Cape; they want the Horn of Africa, then they can control the shipping which brings oil to us; then they can control the minerals of Africa which industry must have to function.

Mr. Chairman, I do not for a moment believe there are Members of this body who knowingly, willingly seek to cripple America's defenses. There are differencs of opinion on what is required for our security. The facts should not be difficult to comprehend, but apparently they are. There is obviously a strong feeling on the part of some that we do not need a defense establishment that has capabilities comparable to those which the Russians possess.

There just is not any way to deny that the Russians are far ahead of the United States and our allies in conventional weapons. The evidence is very clear. Four times as many tanks, most of them more modern than ours. Twice as many aircraft, fully protected from airborne strikes and ground sabotage. We cannot say as much for the protection of our aircraft. They have twice as many nuclear submarines; four times as many conventional submarines. This year's budget calls for 15 new U.S. naval ships instead of the 30 we were promised. The Russians build 60 to 70 a year. This has been going on for a number of years. There is no way that America can retain mastery of the sealanes and protection of our merchant vessels, which are essential to supply lines, with this inequality in construction of modern ships. Our armored personnel carriers are Korean War vintage, miserably poor in comparison with the very modern armored personnel carriers which the Russians have in numbers far greater than our poor ones.

It is bad enough to be short on equipment and weapons. There also is a constant effort in and out of Congress to cut back on Operations and Maintenance funds—the heart and guts of any military program. Cutbacks in O. & M. mean cutbacks in capability. The critics like to write in the press about dead-lined military equipment—ships, planes, tanks, trucks, et cetera. They blame the services. In some instances this is correct. But in a great many cases it is the administration and the Congress which should be blamed for cutting too deeply in O. & M. appropriations.

I have talked only about conventional weapons. There are many who like to think we have sufficient nuclear capability to serve as a deterrent to Russian aggression. What is happening in Africa and in Asia and elsewhere in the world should tell us that this is a false hope. Our nuclear capability is no longer a deterrent. For one thing, the SALT I talks gave the Russians the right to "equivalency" in nuclear weapons and, in some areas, the opportunity for superiority. The Russians have taken full advantage of this situation. They are now moving ahead of us. That is what is meant when you are told we have "rough equivalency." That means the Russians are ahead, but we do not know how far ahead. And when we catch them cheating, they deny it and they always promise not to do it again.

The SALT talks now in progress will probably give the Russians a greater edge in nuclear capability. They simply wear us down. They have the patience to repeat the same argument day after day after day. Our delegates want results. They want something which will make headlines at home. Too often they yield. If you need an example, just remember Helsinki. There are those who would like to forget Helsinki and the Russian disregard of the Helsinki agreements.

Unbelievably, we give away highly important bargaining chips without even taking them to the negotiating tables. The B–1 was scrapped. The Russians knew its capabilities and they were very much afraid of it. The neutron bomb is being held in abeyance. The Russians said they will not build them if we do not. The Russians do not have a neutron bomb. It would take them several years to match our capability. They do not need a neutron bomb. We would need them to help stop a massive onslaught of tanks and armored personnel carriers across the plains of Europe. Their offer was a farce and everyone knew it.

Apparently we are willing to limit the effectiveness of our cruise missiles, the most important new weapon we have left. We now want to use a commercial-type aircraft, like the Boeing 474, to deliver cruise missiles only because it is the cheapest way. Those aircraft also are most vulnerable to enemy defenses. Apparently we also are willing to paint them a distinctive color so they would not be mistaken for commercial airliners. Can you imagine the Russians making a concession of this type?

A streamlined, economy-type defense package like those which are offered as a substitute today would set us back many years in defense. There are many facets to national defense. It is now a highly sophisticated, highly complicated, very costly program. But if it does not match the enemy's capabilities, it is of little value. For instance, there are the satellites upon which we depend now for much of our intelligence about Russian military programs. An ominous overtone is the fact that Russia can—and probably would at the beginning of hostilities—shoot down our satellites. We are not moving fast enough to counter this threat.

Russia's aims for world conquest should no longer be in doubt. America's official response has been half-hearted and inconclusive. An inadequate defense of our country spurs Russian adventurism. A stock phrase is that we already have the nuclear capability to kill everybody in the world at least once, and every Russian five times. I fail to see an advantage there if we are all dead first. That could happen if they strike first. We are tempting them when they grow stronger and we stand still.

But that is not the way the showdown will come. Russia does not want to acquire a ruined world. They are in no hurry. One step at a time suits Russia very well. Let us look around us at the world picture. The Communists now have most of Asia. South Korea and Taiwan are the only well armed non-Communist nations in Asia. There are those in our own country who are working to get us out of both. Japan, whose economy we rebuilt, now depends on us for defense when they should provide their own. Ironically, that means they can manufacture and sell their products to us cheaper than we can make them. They do not have to bear military costs to protect the oil they, too, must have. We do it for them.

Africa is now Russia's prime objective. They are using 45,000 to 50,000 Cubans in 14 countries to accomplish this. They want the undeveloped mineral resources of Africa—the largest in the world—minerals we and other developed nations must have. They want the Horn and the Cape, where much of the world's oil traffic and many other ships must pass. They could then deny us the oil we must have from the Middle East and the minerals we must have from Africa. Rhodesia and South Africa are on their timetable. They have Angola and Ethiopia; they dominate Mozambique. They are moving to take Eritrea.

For the second time, in Zaire, Russian-equipped and Cuban-trained revolutionaries from Angola seized much of Zaire's copper-rich province which is essential to the economic stability of that country. Our response again was timid. Fortunately, other countries had courage enough to face the facts and to move to prevent a Communist takeover of another country.

Russia is self-sufficient in oil. That means they can play a waiting game in the Middle East while we bankrupt ourselves buying oil abroad at exorbitant prices. European Communists may, in a few years, hand over much of Europe to the Communist orbit. This is particularly applicable to Italy and France. Then NATO would be of no consequence. The Russians know how to play a waiting game.

A short time ago, an outlawed Communist group seized power in Afghanistan. Afghanistan extends like a dagger far along the borders of Pakistan and Iran. They are old enemies. Russia now has a staging area to move in new directions. When Russia moves, we blink and look in other directions. We don't have a foreign policy worthy of the name. That is all the more reason for being strong enough to take care of ourselves.

We are being isolated. Once before, in World War II, we were virtually isolated—German subs in the Atlantic—the Japanese fleet in the Pacific. We rearmed and overcame unbelievable obstacles. It was a herculean effort. But we did it. It was fight or capitulate. We fought and won.

In the late 1950's the Russian Sputnik electrified the world. We found we had been left behind in space. We rolled up our sleeves and went to work. We had the determination needed to be the leader. The world knows how we recaptured the lead. To this date the Russians have not matched us in space.

In 1962 we had a showdown with Russia. They were installing guided missiles in Cuba which were trained toward American shores—American cities. We had a President with courage. Jack Kennedy demanded that the Russians get their missiles out of Cuba. We had the guns. They did not. They knew it. They backed down.

Now the walls may be closing in on us again. This time the Russians have the guns. We do not. The time may be approaching when we must fight or capitulate. I do not know in today's world of strange forces how much heart and guts America will have for that confrontation. The easy way would be compromise. Then compromise again—and again—until all that America stands for is gone.

I do not believe the American people ever will want the easy way on that day of uncertainty, and it can be avoided. It can be avoided in a very simple, straightforward and easily understood way. We can make our country too strong to be afraid—but we have to start now. It is late—very late—and wars now move too fast to try to catch up after they start. There is too much of the attitude that we will have all the time we need. We do not know the Russian timetable. We must make America stronger now. The committee bill moves in the right direction. It is definitely an improvement over the administration's budget proposals. I urge the defeat of all the substitutes and the approval of the committee bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) to the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mrs. SCHROEDER) there were—ayes 5; noes 35.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote, and pending that, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

The CHAIRMAN. Evidently a quorum is not present.

The Chair announces that pursuant to clause 2, rule XXIII, he will vacate proceedings under the call when a quorum of the Committee of the Whole appears.

Members will record their presence by electronic device.

The call was taken by electronic device.

QUORUM CALL VACATED

The CHAIRMAN. One hundred Members have appeared. A quorum of the Committee of the Whole is present. Pursuant to clause 2, rule XXIII, further proceedings under the call shall be considered as vacated.

The Committee will resume its business.

RECORDED VOTE

The CHAIRMAN. The pending business is the demand of the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) for a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 107, noes 297, not voting 30, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. GONZALEZ was allowed to speak out of order.)

PRESIDENT AND ATTORNEY GENERAL BELL DESERVE CREDIT FOR THEIR EFFORTS ON CIVIL RIGHTS IN TEXAS

Mr. GONZALEZ. Mr. Chairman, this morning there appeared on the television network a person who says that the Carter administration is insensitive and unresponsive to the needs of Americans of Mexican descent. The same story appeared in my home town newspaper this morning. This is pure and simple hogwash.

There are statements that the Department of Justice is not vigorously defending civil rights. The truth is that right now, today, the Department of Justice is pursuing no less than 60 police brutality cases involving Mexican-Americans.

Last year, not 1 month after he became Attorney General, Griffin Bell came to my office personally to tell me that he had reversed a longstanding policy of Justice Department inaction on civil rights cases that might involve a dual prosecution.

Before that change in policy, the U.S. attorneys almost never investigated civil rights complaints, much less took action. In the case I was interested in, the Republican U.S. attorney had publicly refused to act, even though the situation involved the coldblooded murder of a handcuffed prisoner by a chief of police.

Griffin Bell changed that, and the case was investigated and prosecuted.

This was not the action of a man who was indecent or uncaring. It was the action of a man who truly wants to bring justice to all Americans, and who is matching his words with real action.

No administration has done more than this one has to bring justice to Hispanic Americans. No administration has been more sensitive or effective in this area.

It is unfair, unjust, and bitterly disappointing to me that self-appointed spokesmen curse the very President and Attorney General who have brought real meaning to the word justice—these spokesmen have short memories, and do not remember that the previous administration not only did nothing, but adopted policies that prevented anything from being done.

Attorney General Bell and the President deserve praise for what they have done. They have not perfected the world, but they ought to be given credit for making the first real effort to make civil rights mean something in Texas.

Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise not only in opposition to this bill but also in indignation, and amazement. I find the totals in this bill, to say nothing of the laundry list of nonwanted and nonneeded items, utterly incredible, unacceptable, and unbelievable. That we should even have to consider a bill of this nature, of this magnitude, at this time, raises questions in my mind as to whether anyone is even asking questions about national needs, national priorities, and national budgetary restraints. Just 2 weeks ago this house passed a budget resolution which provided essentially the President's budget for defense.

It made a minor adjustment in the President's request to allow for the slippage of one Trident submarine, but it essentially supported the balance of the President's budget estimates. I supported that resolution and that defense total. I thought it was too high, I tried to change it, but in the end I supported the total. Then last week we voted on a conference report which I reluctantly could not support. In our conference with the Senate, the conferees restored the unneeded funding for the Trident submarine and also agreed to add $300 million beyond that. I felt that number was grossly out of proportion to our defense needs and grossly out of balance in our ordering of National priorities. As I said, I reluctantly voted against the budget resolution conference report because of that overfunding of defense at the expense of domestic needs. But the defense spending which would be set in motion by the authorization bill before us today is even in excess of the greatly inflated defense number in the budget resolution conference report. How can anyone support such a total? How can anyone justify it?

It is some $2.1 billion over the amount assumed in the conference report, $2.4 billion over the amount President Carter asked for and it is $3.4 billion, yes $3.4 billion in excess of the total this house supported when we approved the House budget resolution earlier this month.

Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to go into all the reasons why I think this bill should be defeated. I had my opportunity to express my concerns about our Nation's priorities and our Nation's need when we discussed my transfer amendment during the consideration of the budget resolution. At that time I wanted to reduce the defense number and transfer some of the funds to other needs. I was not sucessful. Others attempted to raise the total for defense by $2.4 billion. They were not successful either.

But now we have this defense authorization bill which is $3.4 billion higher than the original House passed target. Mr. Chairman, it is so far out of line with the totals we considered earlier, so far out of line with what our President requested, and so far out of line with our national needs, that it is not worthy of serious debate.

Mr. Chairman, I am not an expert on national defense. I have not even heard all the arguments for or against building more nuclear aircraft carriers, although I suspect that many of the ultrasophisticated weapon systems we are now procuring may prove to be unreliable and nonmaintainable in a combat situation, I do not intend to get drawn into discussion of that nature today. My concern today is the lack of planning, the lack of balance, the lack of prioritizing and the lack of consideration of the long term costs which are inherent in the type of bill now before us. Mr. Chairman, the President sent up an authorization request which was the result of months of planning, and in the final analysis represented the President's best judgment on how much of his long range requirements could be provided for within his fiscal year 1979 budget guidelines.

I did not happen to agree with the President concerning how much he should have allocated for defense, but I think I understand the logic behind his decisionmaking process. However, in the case of this armed services bill before us today I do not only disagree with the total but I defy anyone to explain the logic behind the program content.

Mr. Chairman, the logic cannot be explained because there was none. This bill is not based on a logical balancing of needs and wants within at least some very broad fiscal guidelines. Instead it appears to be a Christmas tree of program favorites, one added on top of the other without any regard to balance, tradeoffs or long-range needs.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this bill should be defeated and the committee should be sent back to come up with a more rational and balanced proposal.

I hope that it will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE I PROCUREMENT

SEC. 101. Funds are hereby authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1979 for the use of the Armed Forces of the United States for procurement of aircraft, missiles, naval vessels, tracked combat vehicles, torpedoes, and other weapons, as authorized by law, in amounts as follows:

AIRCRAFT

For aircraft: for the Army, $1,037,400,000; for the Navy and Marine Corps, $4,554,880,000; for the Air Force, $7,046,400,000.

MISSILES

For missiles: for the Army, $795,600,000; for the Navy, $1,593,700,000; for the Marine Corps, $23,100,000; for the Air Force, $1,632,100,000.

NAVAL VESSELS

For naval vessels: for the Navy, $7,026,100,000.

TRACKED COMBAT VEHICLES

For tracked combat vehicles: for the Army, $1,518,900,000; for the Marine Corps, $24,300,000.

TORPEDOES

For torpedoes and related support equipment: for the Navy, $426,800,000.

OTHER WEAPONS

For other weapons: for the Army, $93,100,000; for the Navy, $129,800,000; for the Marine Corps, $30,200,000; for the Air Force, $300,000.

Mr. PRICE (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title I be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. SCHROEDER

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. SCHROEDER: In title I, page 11, line 5 strike the figure $4,554,880,000 and insert in lieu thereof the figure $4,546,780,000.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would strike $8.1 million for a Grumman Gulfstream II aircraft for the Marine Corps. This is not your basic big ticket item, but then it is fairly rare when one can single out items in the defense budget that contribute absolutely nothing to our national security. It is an item that is highly symbolic of the goodies that were handed out in the Armed Services Committee's closed markup session.

The Gulfstream II was not requested by the administration. No hearings were held on it. It was approved by the committee on the basis of one-half page of justification offered to the committee in markup. The lack of critical review is clearly suggested by the committee's report which simply regurgitates that brief statement.

There are numerous unanswered questions about this aircraft. The Marine Corps has indicated its intention to replace two C–118's and one C–131 with the Gulfstream II. But how can one aircraft possibly replace three. The talk I and my staff have had with Marine Corps officials indicate that you can not. To accomplish the full range of missions accomodated by the three aircraft the Gulfstream would have to be supplemented by aircraft from Cherry Point. The costs associated with the operation of these additional aircraft cast serious doubt on the calculated cost savings presented to the committee.

One might also reasonably ask why if this aircraft is so cost-effective, particularly given the dramatic portrayal of dedicated Marine Corps brass putting their lives on the line flying in the current inventory, this request did not sail through the DOD-OMB budget process.

It might also be asked why Marine Corps officials cannot avail themselves of the interservice pool of executive jets that the Nation currently owns. Aside from service snobbery I have no idea.

Nor has it been satisfactorily explained to me how a $5 million off-the-shelf aircraft can be turned into an $8 million plus aerial limousine simply through the addition of an interior and some additional avionics.

If the Congress can with so little scrutiny ratify this amphibious assault on the cookie jar for an item whose contribution to national security is so opaque, can the Navy, Army, and Air Force requests be that far behind.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ICHORD. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

I want to compliment the gentlewoman from Colorado now that we are back proceeding in a more orderly, expeditious, and parlimentary manner. As the gentlewoman well knows, I supported this amendment in the full committee. I will vote for her amendment on the floor of the House, and I compliment her that she is now back on track and not imposing upon the membership of the House.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentleman from Missouri. I am delighted that he has joined me in this amendment. Let me just summarize and say I hope all Members will vote for this amendment. Yes, it is symbolic, and it is not a huge amount. When the Secretary of the Navy is flying around in a prop plane, when we have a pool of executive jets they can all share, when they can also call on the Navy force, I think it is really silly that we give the Marine Commandant his own separate plane. I do not think it helps national security in any way, shape, or form. Not only that, we are being charged over $3 million what it would cost us to buy the jet in the private market.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentlewoman yield?

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. DAN DANIEL. I thank the gentlewoman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by the gentlelady from Colorado. In doing so, I yield to no Member in my support of the Marine Corps and my admiration and respect for Gen. Louis Wilson, its Commandant.

In this particular instance, I happen to believe that there are resources currently available in the Department of Defense which should be assigned the Commandant.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. I thank the gentleman. The Marine Commandant might be a little embarrassed to receive such great glamorous gifts.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I think the gentlewoman has perhaps given a somewhat misleading representation of this situation. The committee added to the bill funds for a Gulf Stream 2 aircraft not only for the Commandant of the Marine Corps; but actually for many other units of the Marine Corps, by the Navy, by the various other establishments.

I do not think there is anything unusual about providing an executive-type aircraft for the Marine Corps similar to what is made available to the Air Force, to the Navy, to the Army, and to the Coast Guard.

The fact of the matter is that the present aircraft which was available for these missions, not just for the Commandant, but for other officers of the Marine Corps, happen to be DC–118's. These old planes have had six engine failures, either on takoff or en route; two engine failures occurred with the present Commandant aboard, one with the Assistant Commandant, and three engine failures with former Commandants embarked.

In addition, these DC–118's have experienced numerous other failures which are not only a threat to life, but have caused cancellation of important commitments.

The present fleet of Marine and support aircraft based at the Andrews field are all piston aircraft which require higher cost fuel than do turbine engines. The superior reliability of present turbine engines has been demonstrated very clearly.

This new aircraft is going to be available not only to the headquarters of the Marine Corps here, but to the Marine Corps and educational center, the Marine Corps schools at Quantico, and to the Marine Corps at 8th and I Streets, the Marine Corps Band, and the Marine Corps Drum and Bugle Corps.

How many Members have tried to get the Marine Corps Band or the Marine Corps Drum and Bugle Corps in their districts for Memorial Day functions, for example.

So this is not a frivolous proposal at all. I think the Commandant of the Marine Corps deserves a safe aircraft.

I think the Commandant deserves an aircraft that is going to cost less than the present arrangement. I am advised that by retiring these three old C–118's and replacing them with the Gulfstream II we would save $1 million in maintenance costs.

When compared to the DC–118, this purchase is a cost-effective proposal and it should be approved.

We ought to give the Marine Corps, one of our most respected military forces, at least as good equipment as the others. This should apply as well to the other aircraft.

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DANIELSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman asked, "Have you ever tried to get the Marine Corps Band or the Marine Corps Drum and Bugle Corps to appear at an appropriate event?"

Answer: I have. In April 1971 I requested that the Marine Corps send a delegation of its band to appear at the Armenian Martyr's Day celebration in Bicknell Park in Montebello, Calif., and they turned me down. It was an affront to the entire Armenian-American community.

Mr. STRATTON. The reason they turned the gentleman down was that they did not want to trust the band to these dangerous DC–118 aircraft.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, this is an amendment that should be very easy to support. I have been trying to remember what I did in the committee. It was discussed at length. I think we probably spent more time today on the $9 million than we did on the $127 million item that preceded this and the $200 million item that followed it.

The fact is that the matter is not understood. If I might take this brief time, let me explain what is involved here. I talked to the Commandant of the Marine Corps. He said he is embarrassed to have this attributed to him, because he will retire before this plane comes on board. He was on a flight to Panama in a prop plane that is provided to the Commandant and because of serious motor trouble they had to abort the mission and come back. It is not a question of him being given equal treatment with the Air Force generals or whatever. The fact is that this is a simple economic measure. They will retire three propeller aircraft and replace them with one turbo jet aircraft. They will retire three.

Now, the Air Force has already done this. Members of the House probably are not aware of this, but General Jones when he came aboard as Chief of the Air Force got rid of every executive transport propeller aircraft the Air Force had.

And so we have, I suppose, created the "Jones Airline" or something like that, I do not know.

But there are no longer any propeller-driven aircraft based at the various bases. They all go into a pool, and they are centrally dispersed by MAC, the Military Airlift Command. So there are no executive propeller-driven planes. This was done on an economy basis.

What is proposed here—the statistics prove it, and there is no refutation of the facts—is that in buying one plane for $8.1 million they are going to retire three aircraft at an annual savings of $1,790,000.

It takes over 90 personnel to take care of the crew and maintenance problems on the old propeller-driven aircraft, and with the simplicity of the new jet types, this will save over 90 slots, 90 man slots, just in maintenance and crew alone, and there will be a savings of over $1 million per year.

So, Mr. Chairman, we are not throwing money away. We are not just offering some embellishment to the office of the Commandant. This is just dollars and cents.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, I do want to make one point. The gentleman did say there were no propeller-driven airplanes left.

There are turbo-pro aircraft still left, and certainly the C–130's are still there. We have some aircraft there that are used and that are superior.

The gentleman and I have worked very hard together, and we will stick together on this. I believe the key factor to be safety, involved in a new aircraft versus on old aircraft. That is the point I want to make.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for bringing up that point. Safety is a very important factor here.

We are belaboring this point on a $8 million item, because it is cost-effective. This will save money. We will be able to retire three aircraft, and these planes will take their place. To label this as something different is just misleading, and I certainly think we would be foolish indeed not to replace three old aircraft that are not airworthy with planes that are more ecoonmical.

As a matter of fact, I am told privately that they even have a used one in sight. It would not necessarly be a new one coming off the assembly line. They tell me they think they have a good buy.

I would hope, Mr. Chairman, that we would not be foolish in this instance and say that "we are not going to gild the lily" and "we are not going to gold-plate the job of the Commandant." Regardless of who the Commandant is or how worthy he might be, this is not for him as a person. This is cost-effective, it is economical, it is needed, and I see no reason why we should not add this $8.1 million.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DICKINSON. I am very pleased to yield to the gentlewoman from Colorado, the author of the amendment.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I think one of the problems with this issue is, although the gentleman is testifying today, we should have had testimony at the hearings, but we did not. Testimony on the floor is not proper.

The information that I have is counter to what I have just heard.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. DICKINSON) has expired.

(On request of Mrs. SCHROEDER, and by unanimous consent, Mr. DICKINSON was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, if I may continue, the information I have is that there is no way that this Gulfstream can possibly carry on the missions of the three airplanes the gentleman is saying it will replace. First of all, it cannot carry the Marine band because it is not big enough. So the savings that are being implied are not there, because the Marines would have to bring up C–9's from Cherry Point to run many of these missions. Further there are many planes in the Navy and Air Force inventory that are available for some of these duties we are talking about.

Mr. Chairman, I question whether this kind of an item is one that we should be giving as a goodie hand-out, because if we grant this one, everybody else will want one next year, even fancier.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, if I may reclaim my time, I might ask: Who else might want one? This is just one plane for the Commandant of the Marine Corps.

Mr. Chairman, I do not think that is asking too much, and I certainly hope we vote down this amendment.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, let me say first that part of the Gulfstream II is built on Long Island. It is a wonderful airplane, and to those Members who can afford one, I suggest they might go out and buy one. You might use my name, and maybe you will get a discount.

Let me further say that General Wilson as Commandant of the Marine Corps is unquestionably one of the finest Commandants the Marine Corps has ever had, and I hope he is replaced by a man or a woman of equal capability.

He does not need a Gulfstream II to fly him around. As the gentleman from Alabama indicated, there is a whole fleet of Air Force airplanes that could fly him around. There are many Navy airplanes that could fly him around. I think the members could strike a small blow for the taxpayers by voting for this amendment. The good general and those that replace him might find suitable accommodations in existing Navy aircraft or possibly, God forbid this should happen, they could fly in an Air Force aircraft. There are plenty of T–38's to take the good general around.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD of California. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DICKINSON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, I wanted to respond to the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY) by saying that, while the Gulfstream might be in fact made in the gentleman's district, 12 miles from his home, so are the F–14's, and we added 12 of those, at $200 million, so let us not worry about conservatism here.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD of California. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DOWNEY. That is because we needed the F–14.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, I would like to point out that the major reason for doing this is for safety reasons. The aircraft that "it is to replace," as somebody said, if you count speeds, and all of that, they are absolutely right, one Gulfstream, in essence, does not replace two C–118's and one C–131. But what has to be done is to retire these aircraft.

We are talking about $8.1 million, including the maintenance of this aircraft. If indeed we do this, we insure the fact that these other aircraft go out of service, and that solves the problem of old aircraft and it also does something else—it reduces the requirement for maintenance and operations requiring 9 officers and 93 men. It takes logistical support for those other three aircraft. And we must remember that is what we are talking about. I know it is cute and clever to say, "Oh, we have a private aircraft for the Commandant of the Marine Corps." But that is not what it is really about. They are not going to take those other older aircraft off the line if we do not replace it with this aircraft. This aircraft will be used for reasonable, justifiable reasons.

Mr. GINN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD of California. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. GINN. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. CHAIRMAN, I simply want to point out that the Gulfstream II is not made in New York. It is made in Savannah, Ga., in my district, and I think that is one reason why we ought to vote down this amendment.

Mr. LLOYD of California. I thank the gentleman for his comments.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I did not hear much complaining around here when we gave Anwar Sadat a multi-million-dollar helicopter. We are now talking about a man who has command of the U.S. Marine Corps, an important branch of our Armed Forces. It seems to me if we can give Sadat a helicopter, we can maintain the Commandant's plane.

I am probably the oldest living member of the Marine Air Corps today in this room.

We flew in the twenties by the seat of our pants, and I would not want to recommend that today.

If there are any technological innovations to improve an airplane, we ought to have them for our military commanders who have the responsibility of maintaining the defense of this Nation.

Mr. Chairman, we are talking about a couple of million dollars for military defense. It is not just a joke, but there are more Federal executive automobiles around here which cost more than the total cost of this airplane.

Do the Members know what it means when one is called out on an emergency and there is an equipment failure?

In my day, any failure at all with the plane and you would spin into a crash. I crawled away from five crashes, and I was mighty happy to see the first air-cooled airplane motor come on the scene.

Here, Mr. Chairman, we have a new technology which can be developed for very little money.

No one says a word about how much it is going to cost this country for the airplanes we are selling to the Arabs, the Israelis, and the Egyptians.

Mr. Chairman, we want these funds so that the man who has charge of the Marine Corps can reach a trouble spot faster and a little bit more safely.

Mr. Chairman, I have sat in this House when we have spent billions of dollars for foreign aid, and no one so much as utters a whisper to say, "My God, look at what is going to be spent."

How many executive airplanes are going to be bought with the money we have kicked overseas in the last 20 years? Are we sending a signal to the whole world that we are so poor today that we cannot afford to maintain our military commanders?

Mr. DELLUMS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, my distinguished colleague who preceded me in the well indicated that he is probably the oldest marine on the floor. I am probably the youngest; and given my extraordinary youth, it leads me to a different position than that of my distinguished colleague, and that is to be in support of this amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have two brief remarks and then I will be finished.

First of all, it seems to me that this incredible debate on this $8.1 million item only serves to point out one of the old laws that when people come together to discuss budgets, they spend more time in discussing dollars than in discussing millions of dollars. This fact seems to me to underscore that by being willing to debate millions of dollars as against billions of dollars we may be on safer ground.

We can understand that.

Mr. Chairman, the second point is, as I have said many times on the floor, given limited resources and difficult choices, whatever we do should be based upon a rational, intelligent, thoughtful set of priorities.

It would seem to me that last week or the week before last in this body, over 200 Members of Congress, without extraordinary debate, voted to cut 5 percent across the board from the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare budget, which amounted to several billions of dollars—200 Members voted to do that across the board.

Now we find Members trotting into the well and arguing valiantly against cutting even $8.1 million out of the approximately $38 billion budget.

For those Members who do not understand a billion dollars, they can take 1,000 people and give them each a million dollars. That means that they can take 38,000 people and give them all $1 million, and we are here concerned because we cannot cut $8.1 million from the budget.

I would point out how hypocritical that is, to take an across-the-board 5 percent cut from HEW without any intelligent regard for the priorities established in that Budget, and we cannot cut $8.1 million.

We are not trying to challenge the respect for the Commandant from the Marine Corps. Far from it. We are simply saying, given limited resources, given difficult choices, let us make an intelligent set of priorities. No one on this floor can tell me that there is an extraordinary urgency about giving the Commandant of the Marine Corps the Gulfstream airplane. That is the height of absurdity and insanity.

Somebody ought to wake me up. I thought I was in a dream listening to this debate. It seems to me that if we cannot cut $8.1 million, for all those Members who get up and talk about saving taxpayers' money, then they ought to cut this $8.1 million since the Commandant already has three planes he can fly. He can fly but one at a time.

The gentleman mentions that we would save $15,000 flying the North Atlantic. How long would this plane have to fly to get back this $8.1 million?

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I just want to tell the gentleman that I voted against the $5 billion cut in the HEW budget the other day, but I still think we need this plane for the Marine Commandant.

Mr. DELLUMS. It is not going to make us combat efficient; it will not scare off the Soviets. It seems to me this is what all this rhetoric is about. We can cut this $8.1 million, and I do not think a single American taxpayer will get uptight.

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DELLUMS. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman. I support the amendment. I have supported almost every dollar we have spent and have tried to spend on defense spending since I have been in this House, but this one goes a little too far.

Mr. DELLUMS. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 266, noes 136, not voting 32, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. ASPIN

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. ASPIN: Page 11, line 12, strike out "$7,026,100,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$6,471,500,000".

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I am offering here is the carrier amendment. The amendment would strike the money for the large nuclear carrier which is in the bill and replace enough money into the bill to buy a smaller conventionally powered carrier.

Mr. Chairman, this is an issue which is not new to this House, nor is it new to the debate over the last few years. Many people and many administrations have wrestled with this question of which kind of aircraft carrier should we buy. The last Republican administration when Mr. Ford was President and when Mr. Rumsfeld was Secretary of Defense looked at the issue and decided what we ought to buy was the smaller conventionally powered carrier.

When Mr. Carter came into office and Mr. Brown was Secretary of Defense, they looked at the issue and decided what we ought to buy is the smaller conventionally powered carrier.

Indeed, this House of Representatives has looked at the issue and the last time we voted on it a little more than a year ago the House voted in favor of a smaller and conventionally powered carrier; but the issue is still before us and the Committee on Armed Services has put in enough money for a nuclear carrier.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is important to remember what this issue is and what it is not. The issue is not whether a conventional carrier is more effective than a nuclear carrier. It is not. A nuclear carrier is a more effective ship; however, it also cost more money.

The issue is not whether we are going to have a nuclear Navy or a conventional Navy. We have in the fleet and under construction a combination of nuclear ships and conventional ships; four nuclear aircraft carriers, eight conventional aircraft carriers; so whatever we do with this ship, we are going to have a mix.

The question we have to decide is the question about what the next ship should be.

There are some very, very good arguments as to why we should buy the smaller and conventional carrier. First, a smaller ship costs less money, and, therefore, we can buy more ships; second, more ships mean that we can be in more places at the same time; and third, because all ships are vulnerable, the best way to minimize vulnerability is to maximize the number of ships.

Mr. Chairman, no one should doubt that on an individual basis a nuclear carrier is more effective. However, nobody should doubt either that on an individual basis a nuclear carrier is more expensive.

There are lots of different ways of looking at the cost comparisons. If we have a comparison of just shipbuilding costs, we see that a nuclear carrier costs about twice as much as a conventional carrier. If we look at life cycle costs, we see that the comparisons are more like 5 to 4. If we look at life cycle costs, plus the aircraft, the comparison is perhaps 4 to 3 or 3 to 2. If we look at the life cycle costs plus the aircraft, plus the escorts, the comparison is somewhere on the order of better than 3 to 2.

The costs are different but no matter how we look at it the costs in every case show that a conventional carrier is less expensive than a nuclear carrier and, therefore, we can buy more ships.

The essential argument against a nuclear carrier is that it costs $2.4 billion or $2.5 billion. It makes no sense to put $2.4 billion or $2.5 billion afloat in one ship. The technology of ships, the technology of radar, and the technology of missiles are such that ships are vulnerable. When we put $2.4 billion afloat in one ship, that is more than a third of our defense budget for shipbuilding which every year runs about $7 billion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ASPIN) has expired.

(On request of Mr. EVANS of Colorado, and by unanimous consent, Mr. ASPIN was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. EVANS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will be gentleman yield?

Mr. ASPIN. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. EVANS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

The gentleman informed us that the anticipated cost of constructing this carrier is about $2.5 billion?

Mr. ASPIN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. EVANS of Colorado. I would ask the gentleman if he can tell us, when this carrier is complete, how many aircraft would be stationed aboard the ship?

Mr. ASPIN. It carries 89 to 94 planes. A Nimitz-size nuclear carrier carries 89 to 94 planes.

Mr. EVANS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman what the average cost of each one of those planes would be, as best the gentleman can give it to us.

Mr. ASPIN. The planes aboard would be a mix of planes. The most expensive would be the F–14, and the F–14 costs about $20 million each. Then we would go down to the least expensive plane, and that would be about $10 million. So I would guess it would be an average of $15 or $16 million, somewhere in there.

Mr. EVANS of Colorado. About $15 million. Can the gentleman give us any estimate of the cost of supplies that such a carrier would normally have aboard?

Does the gentleman have any ballpark figure of what the cost or the value of the supplies and the munitions, and so forth, would be?

Mr. ASPIN. I have no idea.

Mr. EVANS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I have another question.

How many persons would be expected to be stationed aboard such a nuclear carrier?

Mr. ASPIN. I am not sure. Does any Member know offhand? Would it be about 5,000?

Mr. LLOYD. of California. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, it would be about 3,000.

Mr. ASPIN. Including the pilots?

Mr. LLOYD of California. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Colorado. Three thousand persons.

Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ASPIN) for offering this amendment. I am a little disappointed that his amendment was not to strike the carriers completely.

It seems to me that it is most unreasonable for this Congress to put somewhere in the neighborhood of a total of $4 billion into one ship and put 3,000 persons aboard the ship and expect it to survive in modern warfare. To me that is the height of insanity.

Mr. Chairman, I wish the gentleman would change his amendment and just simply word it to strike all aircraft carriers. However, if forced to and if I have no other alternative, I certainly will support the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the comments of the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. EVANS).

Let me point out one more thing before my time expires. The conventional carrier that I am advocating we buy is by no means a small ship. It is 60,000 tons. It is bigger than any carrier we had in World War II, the average size of those being about 40,000 tons.

This conventional type carrier is almost twice as big as the carriers the Russians are building, and those are about 35,000 tons. This is a very large and a very capable ship that we are putting into this bill, and it is, I think, very adequate for the defense of our country and adequate to accomplish the things we want to accomplish.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, this amendment should be defeated. It should be defeated because there probably has not been any matter of national defense that has been given the degree of study by all levels of Government and come up more consistently with the fact that this is what we ought to do.

I am not a person who has always been wedded to the nuclear carrier. Last year, in conference, many members of the Committee on Armed Services thought I was other than as vigorous and persistent as I should be when I conceded the point that we ought to evaluate alternatives. I acknowleded that many new points had been raised by some in the Senate as to why maybe it should be a conventional carrier, rather than a nuclear carrier, so I agreed to one more study. All studies had been favorable for the CUN in cost effectiveness, battle effectiveness and personnel saving effectiveness. But I felt, since there was still so much said negatively about it, we should have one more study. That new study has come in. It is unanimous. There is no dissent in it at all. It is 100 percent unanimous. It is on page 25, I believe, of the report, the resumé of it. The authorities who looked into it came to the conclusion that, even though they liked the small carrier, the cheaper carrier, nevertheless, the nuclear carrier was the way to go because it was the cost effective way to go.

It is no answer to say how many men will be aboard it. Of course, if you want to save money, you could abolish 10 divisions of the U.S. Army, get rid of those thousands of men. Then you have no defense.

Of course this carrier is vulnerable, but it just happens to be the least vulnerable—not the most, but the least vulnerable—piece of geography that the world has ever had, because it has all kinds of protective devices in addition to its mobility. When you soon add the AEGIS system, it will certainly be even more the least vulnerable piece of property in the world.

Everybody has agreed, without dissent, including OMB, including the Secretary of Defense, including the President, that we must have at least 12 carriers. Although I am not at liberty to tell the Members what the Joint Chiefs of Staff say about it, I can certainly say they have no smaller number than 12 in mind as the least number. We are not to have two or three new carriers between now and the year 2000. Only one is planned to be requested between now and the year 2000. If you are going to get only one carrier between now and the year 2000, why not get the carrier that is going to do the most for national defense?

When this carrier goes into service, it is going to supplant a carrier 40 years old.

It is cost effective. The differential between this and the other type of carrier is only about 5 percent of the life cycle of the ship. Five percent can be looked at in many different ways. If we think OPEC oil will go up—and who does not?—my guess is that it will be three times what it is today—if that is so, we could perhaps logically buy several nuclear carriers.

Mr. Chairman, in view of this situation, it makes good sense for us in 1978 to produce the nuclear carrier. One reason is that the Senate committee asked for a full study to be made of this matter and the study has come in without dissent for the nuclear carrier.

If this law is passed and authorizes a nuclear carrier the Navy authorities state they will build it with enthusiasm because they need it.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BENNETT. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. FINDLEY. Mr. Chairman, I want to say to the gentleman from Florida (Mr. BENNETT) that on a previous vote a year or so ago, I voted against building another Nimitz-class carrier. However, I am impressed by the argument which the gentleman has made, and I support him in the position he is taking.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I am sure that it comes as no surprise that I am here in support of the large carrier; and I do not want to sound parochial and say what a goody guy I am because I have operated off a group of carriers—14, to be exact—and that I have some interest in this subject.

Mr. Chairman, I think for those of us who have had the experience of operating off and in and around carriers, the size really does make a difference.

I remember the first carrier I operated from, which was a Jeep carrier. Interestingly enough, we have submarines today that are bigger, both in weight and size, than that carrier. That was rather an interesting operation to start off with. I remember what we called the fleet carrier at that time, which was, of course, the one that was referred to before as the old World War II-type carrier.

We thought those ships were immense. Then we saw the Midway-Franklin D. Roosevelt-class carrier come along, and there just never was going to be anything any bigger.

When we consider that fact that the "small carrier" that has been alluded to as the CVV is actually about the same as the old Midway-FDR class, it is not a small ship by any manner of means. And about this, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ASPIN) is correct.

However, in the ease of operation commensurate with the aircraft we are trying to operate, it is imperative that we give them a sufficient amount of deck space and that the tighter that deck is, the tighter the squeeze for aircraft operation.

Mr. Chairman, let me tell the Members that as big as a 60,000-ton vessel would be—and fully loaded it will probably be 90,000 tons—it is nevertheless a very tight operation for today's modern aircraft; the F–14, the A–7's, the A–3's, whatever it is that we are operating on that ship, it is going to be a tight squeeze. So safety is a major consideration.

We do, indeed, increase the capability of operating with the big carrier; but the key factor in all of this is that we are talking about a new carrier, the CVV.

When we talk about the CVV carrier, no plans exist for this carrier. There have been no tests and development program of that carrier. There have been no planes which have landed on it. No engineering studies have been made. We are starting from scratch, and what we are talking about is the building of one, not two or three.

I agree with my chairman (Mr. BENNETT) when he said that if we were talking about three, the tradeoffs at this point might be reasonable. However, we are talking about just one of these carriers versus a carrier the basics of which have already been built and which are afloat. We have three of them operating, with the fourth under construction. This is the fifth, so what I am saying is let us stick with what we have because, in reality, it will cost us less.

Mr. Chairman, something else has been talked about here by my colleague, the gentleman from Wisconsin. He said it costs more money. He is right. It does cost more money.

That is like buying an automobile. One gets a cheaper one for $5,000 and it gets 10 miles a gallon; or he gets one which cost $10,000, and it gets 25 miles a gallon. So which cost more in the life of a car.

That is the difference about which we are talking. In the lifetime of this ship it will cost us more to operate that small carrier than it will that big one; and that is the compelling reason for building the CVV.

Mr. RONCALIO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD of California. I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. RONCALIO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I hope I help the cause of the large nuclear carrier by supporting it here and urging a vote against the amendment. I use this occassion to applaud Admiral Rickover for the way he has saved fuel for this country during the last 20 years in having fathered the successful unclear fuel fleet which we have today. We are a much more secure country—militarily—today thanks to him, and I hope the next nuclear carrier launched in this country will be christened the U.S.S. Rickover.

Mr. LLOYD of California. I thank my colleague.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD. I yield to the gentleman from Arizona.

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from California for yielding to me. I recognize his background and experience on this subject. He has flown off carriers and I have flown off carriers.

I just want to talk about the concept of platforms for just a moment. In World War II, I think we had as high as, at one time, something like 14 million people in uniform. We are talking about a movable platform, a working platform here.

In today's warfare techniques there could be annihilated many hundreds of thousands of people at one time in the walking military which does not apply to the self-protective carrier platform.

But, the whole concept of platforms extends from that carrier, which develops a huge punch, either for defense or for attack. That means we can put all this power on to one platform in order to deliver that punch. It is the same concept as an airplane.

Mr. LLOYD of California. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

(At the request of Mr. RUDD and by unanimous consent Mr. LLOYD of California was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. RUDD. An airplane is not just for the fun of flying. Its purpose is to put all the armament we can possibly get on a platform to deliver a telling punch.

Mr. LLOYD of California. A weapons system.

Mr. RUDD. This is the same concept with a carrier. The bigger the carrier, the bigger the punch is going to be, and it is able to defend itself because of the other punches surrounding it.

Mr. LLOYD of California. That is correct.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD of California. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. ROBERTS. Would the gentleman take a page out of his experience and tell us first, how long can we keep that nuclear carrier at sea when we have to refuel the other? Does it take a fleet of tankers to refuel conventional carriers at sea.

Mr. LLOYD of California. I would, indeed. Replenishment at sea under normal conditions for a fully operating carrier is about every 3 or 4 days. It can go for, say, 30 days on its ammunition, on its food, but generally speaking, we replenish every 3 or 4 days, and never more than a week. But, with a nuclear carrier the only replenishment is the demand for aviation fuel. That is the controlling factor, and we can expand that time to 10 to 14 days. Therefore, we have tripled the capabilities.

Mr. ROBERTS. Would the gentleman explain what does occur while they are refueling out there?

Mr. LLOYD of California. When they are out undergoing replenishment at sea, the best they are going to make is about 8 knots as opposed to 30 knots. In addition to that, they are hooked up and tied up to that tanker or supply ship, a dangerous situation.

Mr. ROBERTS. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD of California. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WHITE. With the nuclear carrier, is it not true that with the fuel it has it can go something like 10 years without refueling?

Mr. LLOYD of California. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. WHITE. With a conventionally powered carrier, that carrier can only go as fast as the supply ships themselves.

Mr. LLOYD of California. That is true. It can never get away from its base of supply, but the nuclear carrier can operate on its own.

Mr. WHITE. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

(At the request of Mr. WHITEHURST and by unanimous consent Mr. LLOYD of California was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LLOYD of California. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WHITEHURST. I want to commend the gentleman, and I think that this is the appropriate time, when we are talking about characteristics of the two carriers, to mention that the CVV will have two elevators as opposed to four on CVN. It will have two catapults as opposed to four. What about battle damage if one of those is knocked out?

Mr. LLOYD of California. It would really be hampered. I would say that 50 percent of ship capability would be lost with the elevator being damaged.

Mr. WHITEHURST. This is what the Members of the House should recognize. There is no comparison in making the choice between the CVV and the nuclear ship.

Mr. LLOYD of California. None whatsoever.

Mr. WHITEHURST. The title of this amendment ought to be, "Why not the second best?"

Mr. LLOYD of California. I thank my colleagues.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

I wonder if my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ASPIN) would respond to some questions on his amendment. As someone who is not a member of the Armed Services Committee, I am a little bit confused about the need for an additional carrier, and whether or not the administration believes, in fact, that we do need one.

My understanding was that the administration had not made a request for funds for an additional carrier and that it was added on in the committee. The gentleman seeks by his amendment to knock out the nuclear-powered carrier and replace it with a conventional one. But what is the position of the administration with respect to the need for any kind of additional carrier?

Mr. ASPIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLARZ. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ASPIN. The position is that everybody in the administration, Graham Claytor, Harold Brown, the President, Admiral Holloway, have all said that we need another carrier. The reason we need another carrier is that the Midway is getting old and will need to be replaced. The question has always been, when will it be replaced, and what will we replace it with? The administration's original plan in their 5-year projected budget was to put a CVV into the budget in 1980.

The House Armed Services Committee has put a CVN in the budget in 1979. The administration has said that they will accept a CVV, a smaller carrier in 1979. They have always been in favor of the smaller carrier. The only question was whether it would be put in the 1979 or the 1980 budget. Now there is room in the budget, now that the Trident submarine has been delayed a year. There is room to put it in this budget for 1979.

I have a letter from the Secretary of the Navy, and I would be glad to have anyone read it. In that he has come out strongly in favor of the CVV in this year's budget.

Mr. SOLARZ. I appreciate the gentleman's clarification.

If everybody agrees we need another carrier, then the only question is whether it should be a nuclear or a conventional carrier. There seems to be some disagreement between the gentleman and some of the gentlemen who oppose his amendment as to the lifetime costs of one versus the other. I think many of us who are not familiar with the technical aspects of this question would probably accept the judgment that we need another carrier, but we want the one which is most cost effective.

We have heard some persuasive arguments to the effect that over the lifetime of these ships, the nuclear carrier is more cost effective. Could the gentleman indicate if that is in his judgment not the case, and, if not, why?

Mr. ASPIN. That is absolutely not the case. It has been stated by every study that has been done. It depends on what costs we look at to see how much cheaper the CVV is. It depends on whether we look at the lifetime costs of the ships alone or at the costs with the planes. No matter how we do it however it comes out that the CVV, the conventional carrier, is cheaper.

The ratio of how much it is less expensive varies, depends upon what we look at, but in absolutely every case—and I will state it categorically, that in absolutely every case—the conventional carrier comes out cheaper. That has been confirmed by the Republican administration and by the Democratic administration and by Navy people and by Congressional Budget Office people, by everybody who has looked at it.

Mr. SOLARZ. Can the gentleman give us some indication in rough terms as to how much cheaper it is? Does it come out to a few million dollars or does it come out to hundreds of millions of dollars or does it come out to billions of dollars?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SOLARZ was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, if we take the worst case for the conventional carrier, which is just the lifetime cost of the two ships, that is the ship by itself without the planes, the ratio comes out to 5 to 4 cheaper for the conventional carrier, which is $1 billion. When we add in the planes the cost increases, and when we add the escort ships the cost increases. The difference in the lifetime costs of those two ships is $1 billion. The $1 billion will buy us a lot of ships.

Mr. SOLARZ. What is the difference if we add in everything, with the support ships and planes and everything else?

Mr. ASPIN. Then it becomes more like a 3-to-2 ratio, that we can buy three CVV's for two nuclear carriers.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLARZ. I yield to the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON).

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, we ought to look at the facts. The facts are that it has been demonstrated over the life cycle of the carrier, when we add in the fuel costs—and that is the important difference between the nuclear ship and the oil-fired carrier—when we add in the fuel costs over the 13-year period the figures are very different.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ) has expired.

(On request of Mr. STRATTON, and by unanimous consent, Mr. SOLARZ was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, when we add in the costs of the fuel over the 13-year life cycle—and that is the first time a nuclear ship has to be refueled—the figures show that it costs less money to operate a nuclear ship than an oil-fired ship.

Admiral Rickover is the author of those figures, and I do not dispute him on that.

If the gentleman would yield further, I think the gentleman would want to have the full picture.

We have been talking a lot about the energy crisis. We have been talking about shifting to some energy source besides oil. Is it not better to have the one type of ship which provides the Navy's edge over the Soviet Union and gives us superiority over them, using a fuel supply that will be available so we will not have to be running constantly somewhere else to try to find oil?

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for his additional explanation.

Mr. GIAIMO. Mr. Chairman, would the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLARZ. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GIAIMO).

Mr. GIAIMO. Speaking about correct information, I think the correct information both on life cycle both as to the lead ship and the follow-on ships is that we have about $1 billion in savings, and that includes the estimates on fuel costs.

If you buy the CVV rather than the CVN you save $1 billion on the lead ship, on the life cycle cost over the CVN and you also save $1 billion in the original construction cost. So you are talking about an overall savings of $2 billion.

Second, we have four CVN's in the force now which will take care of the high speed missions that you might need. You do not need 13 carriers to take care of the high speed missions. If you save that $2 billion, which is not hay to start with, you could use it to buy more ships or other types of naval ships that are in short supply and which we need. I think we would, therefore, get a better mix.

We do not need an all nuclear carrier force. Certainly the Soviet Union does not have anything like what we have in nuclear carriers or any other kind of carriers.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GIAIMO) for his information.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLARZ. I yield to the gentleman from California (Mr. LLOYD).

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GIAIMO) does not include the support ships that have to be used. The gentleman has no way of knowing what the cost of oil will be in the year 1995. The gentleman also has not included the operability of the ships where you do not have to refuel on a schedule of once every 4 days.

I believe it is an advantage, as my colleague the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) said, to move forward and do this, to do it in this way so as to continue the advantage that we have over the other people, and, in addition, it has a real economic value.

I do not wish to accept anything else.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, first of all let me say something, with all due respect to the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GIAIMO) in regard to the statement the gentleman has just made. He mentioned something about a lead ship. This is misleading, because this is not only the lead ship, it is also the end ship, and all the ships in between of this nature that are going to be built in the rest of this century. This is a fact that was developed by the chairman of the Subcommittee on Sea Power and Strategic and Critical Materials of the Committee on Armed Services. Further, the gentleman from California (Mr. LLOYD) was dead on the target in his analysis of the situation when you take into consideration the support ships and all of the other associated costs. The findings of our own Congressional Budget Office, which is supposed to provide us with guidance in such matters as these states:

> The Nimitz is clearly the most cost-effective option for a one-carrier purchase.

There is only one that is going to be purchased. Therefore, I believe that we should defeat this amendment and buy the better ship for the same life cycle costs.

Mr. CARR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I will not take my full 5 minutes. I am only here to say that I think when we need a ship, or when we are concerned with an air platform, then I think we ought to have the CVV.

I do not think we need to build any air platform on the sea this year. Therefore, should the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ASPIN) fail then I am prepared to offer an amendment to strike the funds for any carrier in 1979.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to put this debate in proper perspective:

Two years ago the House appropriated funds for the construction of the fourth Nimitz-class aircraft carrier. When President Carter was elected, he moved to rescind these funds and the House and Senate supported the rescission. Many Members were persuaded by the argument that we should be investing our moneys in many smaller nonnuclear carriers rather than one large nuclear carrier, but the posture of this question has changed dramatically in the intervening year. The administration and the Committee on Armed Services agree that we need only one more carrier in order to meet our minimum force requirements until the 21st century. So it is not a choice between one nuclear carrier and many smaller nonnuclear carriers, but it is a question of building one carrier and deciding what carrier is the best investment.

Everyone will agree that the nuclear carrier on a ship-to-ship basis is far more capable.

The nuclear carrier on a ship-to-ship basis is far more capable. It is bigger; it can carry more airplanes; more fuel; more ammunition. It can cruise at higher speeds and for longer duration. Moreover, I would suggest that everyone would agree that the nuclear ship is more survivable. It is sturdier. It is a bigger ship. It can absorb a surprising number of hits and keep fighting. Small ships cannot do that.

The question of cost is of importance to the Members of this body, and I would suggest that the question of cost has not been well resolved. We have heard arguments on both sides, but the key is this: No one knows precisely what the first ship of a new class will cost, a one-ship class. Let me point out some statistics. First of all, in this intervening year at the direction of the Congress the Navy completed a cost analysis study, and that sea-based air platform assessment has in it the life-cycle cost of the CVN nuclear carrier vis-a-vis the nonnuclear CVV. The study shows the ratio to be four CVN's to five CVV's. With the ships and the air groups combined, the ratio of CVN and CVV cost is 3 to 4. Over a lifetime there is not much difference between the cost of these two ships, and we are talking about building only one ship, not many.

Let us talk about the cost to the taxpayers of this country. That is important. I would suggest to the Members that if you will look critically at the figures of this chart in the well, you will be convinced that there is not much difference between the cost of those carriers. Indeed, we can buy a nuclear carrier for less.

First, let me direct your attention to No. 2. That is the itemization of the cost of a nuclear carrier. The construction cost with modifications, which makes it more expensive than the Senate version, is $2.3 billion. That includes the cost of propelling that ship for 13 years. Already the House and Senate have appropriated and expended $268 million for the acquisition of long-lead items for this ship. If we do not build the ship, this money is going to be lost. If we build the ship, it reduces the cost of the ship of $2.1 billion.

What is the cost of the nonnuclear ship? The estimated construction cost is $1.5 billion, but that is an estimated cost for a new ship that has never been built, a sophisticated ship.

I would suggest that experience tells us that a new ship of its class inevitably costs more than the initial estimate. If we are going to look at this ship and assess its cost, we have to factor in the cost of the fuel to propel that ship for 13 years. If we estimate the cost of procuring, storing, and delivering of the fuel for that 13-year period, we will arrive at a sum of $630 million. In order to arrive at that sum, I have factored in a 6-percent increase in inflation per year, which I think is a reasonable sum. If we add those figures up, we find that we can purchase and propel a nuclear carrier for $93 million less than the non-nuclear carrier.

In arriving at those figures I suggest we should consider other factors that we cannot quantify: the cost of inflation over and above 6 percent; the cost of that fuel oil with the price increases that will be encountered inevitably in the next 20 years; the cost overruns for the design and construction of the new ship. If we look at those figures and they are not precise because no one can speak with absolute precision, but I think they are as precise as we will find, and, I think they show eloquently that the nuclear ship is the best investment we can make.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

(At the request of Mr. STRATTON, and by unanimous consent, Mr. TRIBLE was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBLE. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Is is not also true that one of the very important advantages of a nuclear ship is that it can proceed at maximum speed indefinitely; it does not have to worry about fuel consumption; it does not have to worry about running out of oil; and, therefore, it can be in the danger spot where it is needed more quickly and, therefore, it can save lives?

Mr. TRIBLE. Absolutely. The nuclear ship can propel itself for 13 years at higher speeds than the nonnuclear ship.

Mr. STRATTON. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. TRIBLE. I thank the gentleman from New York.

Mr. CARR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBLE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. CARR. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

One of the factors that I think everyone ought to be aware of here—and of which I am sure the gentleman from Virginia is aware—is that one of the costs that was not in the study here is that we pay more for the nuclear-qualified officers to operate the Nimitz-class carriers.

Now, those officers get bonuses if they enlist, they get a bonus somewhere around $5,000 a year. I would like to ask my colleagues in the Committee on Armed Services, I am not sure, maybe the gentleman knows how many nuclear-qualified officers are on a Nimitz-class carrier that are not on a CVV?

Mr. TRIBLE. Those costs have been considered in the life cycle costs of the larger nuclear carrier cost. The figures are reflected in the conclusions rendered in the naval study.

Mr. CARR. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, my understanding is, if the gentleman can show me I would like to see it. My understanding is that the cost studies that were done by the DOD did not include the fact it cost more in personnel to operate the nuclear carrier than it does a CVV. Therefore, that is one area where the studies were comparing apples and oranges.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBLE. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to commend the gentleman from Michigan. The gentleman is absolutely right. But there is one other point that ought to be made about escort ships.

The point is that the escort ships which the gentleman from California (Mr. LLOYD) raised; the gentleman said that the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GIAIMO) did not include escort ships in his cost comparison. It is fortunate that he did not include escort ships, because the argument goes the other way, against the gentleman from California (Mr. LLOYD). To escort a nuclear carrier you have to have nuclear escorts. It makes no sense to have a nuclear carrier without nuclear escorts. We have not enough escorts now for the four nuclear carriers which are in the inventory and under construction. To build a fifth would require that we need even more nuclear escorts.

On the other hand, we do have conventional escorts. The Midway has conventional escorts. If we were to replace the Midway with a conventional carrier, she would be able to use the conventional escorts from the Midway.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

(At the request of Mr. BENNETT, and by unanimous consent, Mr. TRIBLE was allowed to proceed for an additional 3 minutes.)

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBLE. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, my understanding is that they have fewer escorts for nuclear than nonnuclear.

Mr. TRIBLE. That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT. I wanted to add, the reason for that is that the nonnuclear escorts have to be refueled and things like that. Therefore it takes more nonnuclear escorts to provide the same protection on station as the nuclear escorts provide.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRIBLE. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, the point I would like to make to the gentleman from Wisconsin is that the gentleman's statement is just simply not correct. It takes at least 20 to 25 percent more people to man the vessels that are required to support the conventional fleet. Secondly, when you have a nuclear operation, you do not run the ship at 30 knots all the time. Normally the carriers and their two escort ships are running at a higher speed when they refuel themselves. They are tied to the carrier, and the speed of the carrier is the driving factor of the task force.

The reason I know, is that I was a qualified officer of the deck underway aboard a carrier. I do know what I am talking about.

Mr. TRIBLE. Mr. Chairman, in conclusion let me say that in the nuclear ship we have a ship that we know precisely how much it will cost. In the nonnuclear ship we are building, the first ship of its class, we have no real ideas of its cost.

I would suggest that those who support the nonnuclear ship bear the burden of proving its cost to the satisfaction of this body, and they have failed to do so.

Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in strong support of the committee's position and in particular associate myself with the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. TRIBLE) and his very articulate support for authorization for a nuclear-powered attack aircraft carrier for the Navy.

I believe it would be worthwhile for me to quote from a study done by the Center for Strategic and International Studies at Georgetown University. The introduction gives an excellent abbreviated history of the status of our carrier forces. John Lehman's policy paper begins as follows:

Like the movie "Casablanca," the carrier issue has been a hearty perennial since the Second World War. Louis Johnson and Stuart Symington provided vintage years as they cut carrier force levels down to a total of seven by 1950. Then the crucial role of carriers in the Korean war so impressed the Eisenhower administration that six of the Forrestal class, and the first nuclear carrier, Enterprise, were commissioned between 1955 and 1961, averaging one per year.

Through the 1960's, the United States maintained a level of about 15 attack carriers, with active debate centering on whether all new ones should be nuclear powered. Robert McNamara was opposed to nuclear power, but enthusiastic in support of carriers themselves. As late as December 1967, McNamara recommended to the President an optimum level of seventeen attack carriers (CVA's).

This was not to be, however, as the first of the "unfunded" $30 billion per year costs of the Vietnam war, and then the rise of the antidefense era in the Senate decimated successive procurement budgets. First went the 12 anti-submarine (ASW) carriers, leaving 15 combined ASW and attack carriers called CV's. This number fell to 13 in 1974 and then 12 with the retirement of the Roosevelt in October of this year—1978.

Mr. Chairman, that short history tells the tale in stark and frightening reality. The U.S. Navy's capabilities to provide security for our sealanes, to project the impressive power of the United States in the most remote parts of the globe, and to provide security to the fleet which is essential to the proper functioning of the entire force, has rapidly been eroded.

I can appreciate as well as any of my colleagues that budgetary constraints are essential and that it is impossible for optimum funding of all programs and projects. But I implore my colleagues to consider this point—A tired, hackneyed, overused and yet still valid point—without our national security, all other efforts are insignificant. I contend, and I commend the Committee on Armed Services for its contention, that without another nuclear-powered, large-deck aircraft carrier, the national security of the United States will be in serious jeopardy as the 1980's see the retirement of additional carriers from the present fleet. This new carrier will maintain the force level at only 12.

But, what are we really talking about when we debate the carrier issue? Let me emphasize a few of the facts of the case:

We are talking about an authorization in this bill of some $2.13 billion—none of it in the President's budget request. And what do we get for that sum as opposed to the alternative mini-carrier? For one thing, we get a platform which, when the fuel cost differential is considered, is only $205 million more than the mini-carrier. And what do we get for those extra millions? We get a carrier which will carry three times the fuel for its aircraft, twice as much ammunition and ordnance, two more catapults, two more elevators, and 31 to 35 more aircraft. Let me repeat that last point. We get a carrier that carries 31 to 35 more aircraft than the alternative. In addition to all of this, the large-deck carrier operates in weather conditions which, in the North Atlantic, halt the activities of smaller carriers approximately 25 percent of the time.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, I want to again compliment the Armed Services Committee for its consistency, its constancy in the forthcoming seapower crisis, and its continued support of U.S. naval carrier capabilities. This carrier will insure that the minimum force of 12 large-deck carriers will be maintained. I would point out, parenthetically, that I would support the minicarrier concept wholeheartedly if it were additive to the first priority: nuclear-powered, large-deck attack aircraft carriers.

I urge my colleagues to support this effort and this authorization bill.

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, one thing that I think has not been made sufficiently clear is the safety factor for the pilots and the crews also operate on a nuclear-powered carrier. It is at least 25 percent safer to fly off a large decked carrier than it is to fly off a medium or small sized carrier, and it is 50 percent safer when flying at night.

Less than half the accidents per sortie occur when taking off from or landing on a large carrier, as opposed to operating from small carriers.

What is that worth? To the wives and children of pilots, that is worth hundreds of millions of dollars in each instance.

It just seems to me that we have a great opportunity here. If we are going to build just one more major carrier, why should we be satisfied with something that is just half as good? Let us go all the way.

It is not going to be any more expensive. The fact is that if we buy this CVN carrier, it is already fueled for 13 years of operation, and the fact is that if we are buying this CVV, we are paying one-and-a-half times more for it. The CVV will cost the one-and-one-half times more than it would normally cost because it is a so-called lead ship and we are paying a premium for it. For nearly the same price we are getting a ship that is worth only half as much and only half the efficiency and operational capacity of a nuclear powered carrier.

Mr. Chairman, it just does not make sense to me, as long as we know this is going to be our last carrier, to buy the second best one. Let us get the best possible one for the Navy.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOB WILSON. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to let go unchallenged the statement of the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ASPIN) when he said it made absolutely no sense—and I think I am quoting him correctly—to have conventional escorts for the nuclear carrier.

It makes very good sense indeed, because while it is ideal to have nuclear escorts for the nuclear carrier, the fact is that the nuclear carrier can carry fuel for the escorts, and that enhances the capability of the whole group. The ships together would be more efficient, and they would have a greatly enhanced combat effectiveness.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield on that point?

Mr. BOB WILSON. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I would just like to respond to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR.).

The problem is that if we use conventional escorts for a nuclear carrier, we are doing two things: No. 1, we are taking away the advantage of the nuclear carrier in not having to be reliant on oilers, because then the escorts do rely on oilers; and, second, we take away its ability to move at its top speed, because a nuclear ship can move faster. If we have conventional escorts for nuclear carriers, we might as well have a conventional carrier in the first place.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. But overall the capability of the task group is enhanced, is it not, regardless of the type of escorts?

Mr. ASPIN. It would not be making the maximum use of its capabilities. If we are going to have conventional escorts, we might as well have conventional carriers.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. Perhaps it is not the best answer in the world, but it is a lot better than having only conventional ships.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOB WILSON. I yield to the gentleman from South Carolina.

Mr. SPENCE. Mr. Chairman, the point has been made that we can only be in one place at one time with one carrier and that we can be in two places at one time with more ships if we have conventionally powered carriers.

I just want to add this observation: That is if the tanker is cut off from the fleet and if the fossil fuel is unavailable, none of the conventional carriers can be any place at any time.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment offered by my distinguished colleague from Wisconsin (Mr. ASPIN) to delete $2.1 billion for a fifth nuclear aircraft carrier (CVN) and to substitute $1.5 billion for construction of a conventionally powered carrier (CVV).

Mr. ASPIN's amendment offers the House a choice between a 94,000-ton super carrier with a tremendously expensive propulsion system and a somewhat superior military capability, and a 60,000-ton conventionally powered carrier which is vastly less expensive but still an effective weapons platform. Both the Ford and the Carter administrations have endorsed the concept of building smaller carriers, and last year the House endorsed that concept by a vote of 252 to 161, rejecting an attempt to prevent the recission of fiscal year 1978 funds for a fifth nuclear carrier. I urge my colleagues to adopt the Aspin amendment today and hopefully put an end once and for all to the "never say die" advocacy of nuclear super carriers.

The fundamental point to be considered in making this decision is that the Navy cannot have it both ways—reaching its goals of more ships while at the same time building more expensive nuclear ships—without requiring enormous increases in the defense budget which I cannot believe the Nation will accept. The Navy already gets 44 percent of the procurement, research and development funds authorized for the Department of Defense and has 115 ships under construction. Unless the Congress endorses the administration's request for a smaller carrier, the Navy share and the total military budget will contribute to escalate out of sight.

Another point worth emphasizing is the falsity of the claim made by the advocates of nuclear carriers that they are in fact cheaper in the long run than smaller conventional carriers. They make this claim only by distortion and exaggeration of the cost of purchasing oil to operate the conventional carrier, and by underestimating the costs of operation of the nuclear carrier, including the replacement of its $100 million plus fuel core every 13 years. There is no question that the nuclear supercarrier is at least a half a billion dollars more expensive than a conventional carrier, and I urge my colleagues not to be misled by false claims of economy.

Finally, I challenge the claim that the nuclear carrier is less vulnerable to attack by Soviet forces than a conventionally powered carrier would be. The Soviet Union has 375 Badger, Blinder, and Backfire bombers assigned to naval warfare. All of these planes carry antiship missiles which can be equipped with nuclear warheads, and it is impossible to assume that even with improved air defenses none of these missiles will reach their targets.

In addition, the Soviets have 195 attack submarines and 65 cruise missile submarines whose principal mission in wartime would be to attack U.S. Navy vessels. It is irrelevant to cite the U.S.S. Enterprise's ability to withstand the explosion of nine conventional bombs on her flight deck years ago as evidence of the nuclear carrier's survivability. I submit that any carrier subjected to intensive attack by these Soviet forces has little chance of surviving a hit by a nuclear-tipped missile. In fact, since the nuclear carrier is partially designed to use its aircraft for power projection onto enemy shores, requiring it to approach those shores and increase its exposure to enemy attack, one can argue that the nuclear carrier is more likely to be put out of action in the event of war.

I hope the House will resist the allure of these awesome ships by focussing on their equally awesome cost and their undeniable vulnerability. We do not need a fifth nuclear aircraft carrier.

Mr. GIAIMO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, we have a great debate here as to whether we should add the CVN, which is the nuclear carrier, or the CVV, which is a nonnuclear carrier. I do not think we should argue the relative merits of which is the better ship. Rather, I think we should recognize the fact that we have both types and both are good.

We have 4 nuclear carriers either in being or in production, and we have in all 13 carriers in the fleet. We may reduce the number to 12. We will have four that are nuclear and nine or eight which will be nonnuclear. I think what we want to arrive at is the proper mix.

First of all, what do we need them for? What are some of the differences in the areas served? How can we best utilize scarce dollars to get the greatest naval capability? I think that is what we want to do.

I do not want to get into an argument as to which is the better ship. Sure, if everything were nuclear and all the ships including the escort ships were nuclear and they did not cost any more that would be fine, and perhaps we could go down that road. But nuclear ships do cost more. And we have to be concerned about that tradeoff.

We do not have all nuclear ships, we do not have all nuclear escort ships, and we have different naval missions.

We will have four nuclear ships, and certainly they are for high-speed purposes or for projecting power in certain kinds of scenarios. But we have other kinds of missions in the Navy. We have those that do not call for the use of nuclear ships, those that do not relate, for example, to the need to defend ourselves against the Soviet Union. Quite frankly, I highly question our carrier capability of defending ourselves against the Soviet Union, regardless of whether or not we have more or less carriers. I do not think the purpose of carriers will be to defend the United States in a strategic conflict with a nation such as the Soviet Union. I have the feeling that carriers can be used to fight a war like the last war, or to project American power in other parts of the world, like the Pacific or the Mediterranean or in the Indian Ocean, if you will. Given that, and given the fact that we have a scarce amount of dollars, let us not move precipitously. The administration and the Navy indicated they did not want a nuclear carrier, that they preferred to go the route of the smaller, less expensive carrier. They did not ask for that smaller, less expensive carrier in the 1979 budget, from what we hear however, they are intending to do so in the 1980 or in the 1981 budget. The fact is, they wanted to have options and they wanted to study the options.

I know there were those who were unhappy, because the nuclear carrier was rescinded last year, and they want to restore it now. I do not think it is the wise thing to do. I think it saves money if we do not build the additional nuclear carrier. It will save $1 billion in production. It will save $1 billion in life cycle expenditures related to that ship. That is $2 billion. That is a lot of money. The Navy could buy a lot of ships for that amount of money. The Navy could beef up its force. For example, it would be the cost of three DD-963's; it would be the cost of nine frigates; it would be the cost of six cruisers or 1½ DDG-47's the nonnuclear Aegis destroyers. They would be additional ships the Navy could get. I think we ought to think about that. I do not think there is anything magical about having one more nuclear carrier, certainly since there is a serious question about how effective it would be in any kind of a conflict with the Soviet Union.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GIAIMO) has expired.

(On request of Mr. BURLISON of Missouri and by unanimous consent, Mr. GIAMO was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. GIAIMO. So I would urge the members to support this amendment. Let us get a better mix as to nuclear and non-nuclear carriers in our Navy, and also other types of ships which we can then buy with the money we would have saved.

Mr. BURLISON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GIAIMO. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BURLISON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to commend the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GIAIMO) on his remarks and I want to associate myself with them.

The recommendation of the administration to not build another nuclear-powered carrier, at least at this point, and instead build a CVV, is warranted on the legitimate arguments of savings in the sum of 1 to 2 or more billion dollars. The argument is logical that there is no need to have a nuclear carrier when you do not have nuclear support ships with it. Therefore, I am in support of the amendment.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I am in agreement with what the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GIAIMO) stated. However, I do not come to the same conclusion.

He recognized the need for a nuclear task force, and I think even mentioned the fact that we probably should have four nuclear carriers. But how are we going to get them if we do not build them?

Mr. Chairman, if we reject the CVN and this particular program, it will be the second year in succession that the House has turned down the recommendation of the committee.

I think we ought to start now to get those nuclear carriers, and I hope that the committee will vote down this amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRICE. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. Chairman, I am, of course, not on the Committee on Armed Services and am at a great disadvantage in trying to discuss the technical advantages of one ship over the other.

What I would like to know, if the chairman will tell me, is, What is the recommendation of our Commander in Chief and of his military advisers?

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman can read that in any way he wants.

Right now I haye a letter in my hand from the Secretary of the Navy which indicates their interest in carriers and in a nuclear Navy. Right now they want to go with a conventional carrier. Nevertheless, they are still interested in a nuclear carrier force.

Mr. ALLEN. That indicates that the Secretary of the Navy prefers the Nimitz-type carrier over the conventional carrier; is that correct?

I call to mind last year's debate when the House rejected a CVN by an overwhelming margin, and we wound up with no carrier at all. Although in its five-year shipbuilding plan, a CVV was included in FY 80 rather than FY 79, the Administration will now support a CVV this year. While Admiral Holloway has testified that he prefers a CVN to a CVV because of its admittedly superior capability, I can say categorically that he joins me in putting top priority on getting one more large-deck carrier regardless of its method of propulsion, and would prefer a CVV to no carrier at all.

Evidently the Navy is for a nuclear carrier, rather than no carrier at all—if you read that letter carefully.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PRICE. I yield to the gentleman from Florida.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I think since I heard all the hours and hours of testimony, I can boil this down quickly for the Members.

Without dissent, nobody in the Navy, that is, the military people in the Navy, gives other than top priority to the CVN. They all want the CVN over the CVV.

However, the Office of Management and Budget did not allow the Department of Defense to have enough money to give the Navy sufficient money for this carrier. Therefore, the official position of the White House, of the Secretary of Defense, and, in a way, the official position of the Secretary of the Navy even, is that they have to go along with the civilian management of the budget.

That is what the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. GIAIMO) says; but the people who actually have to fight on the scene, and who know what they need to do about it, say that it is not only cost-effective but a better way to save lives of our men and a better way in which to win a war if we have the CVN.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say something with respect to what was said by the chairman of the Committee on the Budget. He refers to the fact that the Russians do not have as good a carrier. They have no need for a carrier. It is fantastic to me that the Russians are producing a carrier for which they do not have any real need. They have a tremendous land mass with an ability to bring to themselves almost all the natural resources in the world without going to sea. They have no problem in that respect.

We have a problem. If we have a war, we are going to have men and material going across the sea. Only 5 percent of those men and material can be carried by air. The men and material have to be carried by sea. We have to have the sea lanes open. The Russians do not.

Mr. Chairman, that is what the study of the air-based platforms was all about.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ASPIN).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appered to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Chairman, I demand a record vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 139, noes 264, answered "present" 2, not voting 29, as follows:

The Clerk announced the following pairs.

On this vote:

Mr. Miller of California for, with Mr. Teague against.

Mrs. Burke of California for, with Mr. Runnels against.

Mr. Archer for, with Mr. Nix against.

Messrs. WYLIE, LENT, DANIELSON, NEAL, FREY, and BUTLER changed their vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. CARR

Mr. CARR. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CARR: Page 11, section 101, line 12, delete "$7,026,100,000" and insert in its place, "$4,896,500,000".

Mr. CARR. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to take my 5 minutes. I know that the Members have had their fill of carrier debate; but I put this amendment on the floor so that those of us who want to vote "no" on any carrier this year will have a chance.

The main thing here is that the President sent up to our Sea Power Subcommittee a 5-year building plan which does not include a new carrier. The fact of the matter is that the President decided, because of shipbuilding problems throughout America and particularly with respect to shipbuilders' claims that we could slip a lot of Navy stuff in here and save ourselves some money. When he sent his budget up to us this spring he sent it up without any carriers.

The recent letter we have seen circulated on the floor stating the administration's preference for a CVV in support of the Aspin amendment is a very Johnny-come-lately effort by the administration to get some votes and to try to effect a change in the House.

The fact of the matter is that we do not need a nuclear carrier in fiscal year 1979.

Mr. Chairman, I ask the House to support the amendment and defer any new carrier of any kind.

Mr. EVANS of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the amendment. I will be very brief.

I know the distinguished gentleman from Florida and the committee have made a decision that they feel is in the best interests of this Nation. I just happen to have a strong, overwhelming, basic disagreement with these large aircraft carriers. It is not just the cost of $2.5 billion. It is not just the fact that you put about $1.5 billion in aircraft aboard. It is not only that you have 3,000 people on board such a carrier that is almost the size of the Empire State Building.

To me, I am absolutely convinced that once we get into a serious situation with Russia, one of the first targets Russia would look at would be these big aircraft carriers, and whether it be by missiles, surface-to-air, or air-to-surface or by submarine, these carriers are going to get knocked out quick and early.

I do not think it is wise to put so much investment of money and men into one combat machine. I hope the amendment carries.

Mr. BENNETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

Mr. Chairman, there is no piece of equipment, no place on Earth that is less vulnerable, that is more protected than the nuclear carrier.

The second point is that the Secretary of the Navy has presented this matter to us and he did say that they do support a carrier this year. They must have 12 deployable carriers in the future. The Secretary of Defense testified they must have 12. They will not have 12 unless we build one such carrier in the immediate future.

The Secretary of the Navy says if the law is passed that authorizes and directs the nuclear carrier, they will build it with enthusiasm. He so testified before the Seapower Subcommittee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. CARR).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. CARR. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 106, noes 293, not voting 35, as follows:

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. LLOYD OF CALIFORNIA

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LLOYD of California: Page 11, line 5, strike on line 6 the amount "$7,046,400,000" and insert in lieu thereof the amount "$6,984,200,000."

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is not the same amendment that I offered before. I am not trying to strike all of the funds for the A–10. What I am talking about is the long-lead items for 125 of these, aircraft plus $22.9 million for an inertial navigation system.

What I am really doing, in essence, is saying to the Air Force, "OK, if you want the A–10 in the northern European environment, you got it," but what I am also saying, because I firmly believe this to be the absolute poorest aviation weapons system that we have today in our arsenal—is that it is archaic; the technology that is involved in this weapons system is over 25 years old, it is a straight wing aircraft; we have a proven engine, and there is nothing wrong with the aircraft and its flight capability—it flies. The only thing wrong is that it is rated at a little over 400 knots, but as soon as we put any kind of load on it we are back to the speeds we were back to at the time of the Korean war.

I am told that the major function of this aircraft is bringing this gun, which is a 30 millimeter high cyclic rate of fire gun, to bear on tanks. They go out and kill tanks with the aircraft, and do it at 100 feet off the ground in the battleline environment.

I will tell you who are going to be killed in a battle scenario at 100 feet off the ground. Pilots are going to be killed. The reason I know is that I have flown close air support, and I want to tell the Members that this is not the right support application of this system.

I spoke to some marines the other day, and I said, "If you had your choice, would you take the A–10 or the A–4?"

They flat out told me that they did not want the A–10 under any circumstances, that they will take the A–4, which is two generations older than this airplane.

In addition, I have asked Navy people; I am not talking about admirals and generals and those great analysts over there in the Department of Defense—I am talking about the people who have to fly this airplane during wartime. They tell me they do not want it. They say it is the last one they want, but if you put it on the point of whether it is this plane to fly or no flying at all, yes, they will fly it.

I hear from my flying colleagues and I asked some of the pilots whether they really want this as a weapon system. The answer is "no."

Any pilot who gets into an airplane does not believe that aircraft to be the best is a damn fool. I have flown some pretty sick airplanes in my day, but never did I crawl into an airplane and not believe that it would operate properly. These guys who operate the A–10 are going to do the same thing exactly and I admire them for it. They are going to take their chances in an aircraft that ought not be going into the main battlefield area in support of ground troops. If this is a good weapons system so too is the F–111 and the F–14, and we can use anything at that point. We do not need this expensive aircraft.

We started out with this aircraft at $1.8 million. That was all it was going to cost us. We are now up to $6.3 million and going higher every day. We were told that we did not need the sophisticated infrared systems or the inertial navigations system, and yet, by golly, here it is and we need it. We really are being had by a weapons system that is not good enough operationally and economically.

If we have to have the A–10, for goodness sake, reduce the buy and put the extra money into the F–16's or F–15's, and let us put our money where it counts. That is why I am asking the Members to vote with me on this amendment. Show the pepole we have the ability to discriminate in weapons systems.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

I think what we have here is an individual who has had a very distinguished record as a pilot of a very rapid flying jet aircraft, who finds it difficult to accommodate himself to the idea of the A–10, which is a new type and slower plane, developed very largely in response to the efforts of the House Armed Services Committee to provide a really effective close air support for our troops on the battlefield, whether in Vietnam or in Europe.

The A–10 is admittedly a cumbersome looking aircraft. It does not fly as rapidly as the other jets. But actually it is a kind of flying tank. It was built to be used for close air support, and is specifically designed against tanks. Maybe those who fought in previous wars do not think that an aircraft can be used against tanks, but that is exactly what the aircraft is for. It has demonstrated its usefulness, and I think it would be a serious mistake for us to cut it out.

The Air Force has demonstrated that it can work. The Air Force wants the money in there for it. As I say, it was largely pressure from the House Armed Services Committee to develop a close air support plane that could be utilized in a combat situation, that led to the production of the A–10.

It has long been under development and in production. We have got several hundred of them in the inventory already. The Air Force wants 200 more. The gentleman from California wants to cut out the long leadtime items. That means we are going to deprive our troops in Europe of these planes if the Russian superiority in tanks should suddenly be used and they should break through with their 18,000 tanks against our 6,000. This plane would give us an ability to take out those tanks.

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, I understand this amendment is to knock out the inertial navigation system. My impression of the inertial navigation system basically was that it would permit a pilot in a plane where he knows where he is to go off to some place where he does not know where he is going. If this is for use in Europe in an airplane for close air support against tanks where presumably the pilot knows where he is, why is this necessary to have in that aircraft?

Mr. STRATTON. I do not know what the exact reasons are for the Air Force request but my understanding is the European environment is very frequently involved in fog and the number of rainy days and days of poor visibility are extremely numerous in that theater.

The use of this inertial navigation system will make it possible for the pilot to be absolutely certain where he is and for zeroing in on his target in spite of the weather. If that is so, if the Air Force feels that is what they need, I think we ought to give it to them.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I would state that on low approaches, when they are flying 100 feet or so above the ground it is very difficult to know where one is and this system permits such low level flying with very accurate navigation which is very important.

Mr. Chairman, let me add that I wish to associate myself with the remarks made by my colleague, the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON), on this issue. We have gone down this road before, this is not the first time that we have had this issue before us because we have had it before us for the last few years. We are committed to the program, and to the A–10 plane. We have approved an increase in its numbers for 4 or 5 years and if we do not go this route we will not have anything.

This plane is well armored with a titanium armored seat around the pilot. It has a very high performance gun. It has other things that help adapt it to use against tanks. The A–7's and all the others do not have the features to go after tanks that this plane does.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, if there is any one Member of this body who is responsible for this plane's being developed, it is the very knowledgeable and respected former member of our committee who, unfortunately, will be retiring at the end of this year. I am referring to the distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. PIKE).

The gentleman from New York (Mr. PIKE) stayed after the Air Force to develop this kind of plane. It was clearly as result of his foresight that we have finally developed the A–10. Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think, in the year that marks the last service of the gentleman from New York (Mr. PIKE) in this body, it would be most ungrateful for us to knock out this plane of his.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I will yield briefly to the gentleman from California.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding and I would just like to make one point that was brought up by the gentleman from California (Mr. BADHAM) who inquired about the inertial navigation system, and there is no question about the fact that this aircraft needs this INS system. However, they led us to the conclusion that they did not need it when they first proposed the A–10. They told us they did not need it, whereas it is, clearly, needed for this aircraft.

There is also no question about the gentleman from New York (Mr. PIKE) doing what was said but the war this aircraft was designed for is over and gone.

Mr. AMBRO. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOWNEY. I will yield briefly to my colleague, the gentleman from Long Island, N.Y. (Mr. AMBRO).

Mr. AMBRO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding me this time. We are asked to consider an amendment to the DOD authorization bill that would cut the Air Force budget by $51.6 million for long lead time procurement and associated R. & D. funds for the A–10 antitank attack aircraft—a plane designed specifically for close air support of ground troops facing an armor threat.

In considering whether to reduce this program, I think it is important that you recognize that procurement levels authorized in this bill are precisely the same as those recommended and requested by the Secretary of the Air Force, the Secretary of Defense, and the President of the United States. They are the same as those approved by a House Armed Services Subcommittee, the full committee, Senate subcommittee and full committee. Every tier in the Federal budget making process, on both the executive and legislative side, with authority and expertise in military and defense matters has endorsed this program precisely as it is contained in the bill on the floor. There have been neither add-ons nor reductions.

Furthermore, amendments essentially the same as this one to reduce A–10 procurement and related program ingredients were offered in committee by the sponsor of this amendment; and defeated in each instance by almost 3-to-1 margins.

The sponsor of this amendment, my good friend and colleague from California, (JIM LLOYD), offers this measure in the firm and sincere belief that the plane is unworthy of the tax dollars being spent on it.

Not a single Member of the House can question either Mr. LLOYD's commitment to this Nation's military preparedness or his knowledge of fighter aircraft and aviation. I will be the first to defend his determination that this Nation's defense capability be second to none, as well as his expertise in aviation.

But all other experts, whether at the Department of the Air Force, Department of Defense, White House, House or Senate Armed Services Committees, disagree with him on this matter.

They believe that the United States and our NATO allies desperately need the A–10 to counter the Soviet and Warsaw Pact armor and tank numerical superiority.

They believe that on-schedule procurement and deployment of A–10 squadrons are essential to force modernization and tactical preparedness.

They believe that recent changes in the air defense threat, particularly in Europe, require lower altitude capabilities than originally called for in A–10 design and that the current budget provides those capabilities, including:

Flying at extremely low altitudes; as low as 100 feet;

Eliminating the need for straight and level flight which virtually rules out effective antiaircraft sighting by enemy forces.

They believe that total Air Force modernization calls for procurement recommended in this bill, which includes A–10 deployment for our Air Force Reserve components.

They believe that the A–10 is the weapon that should meet Soviet and Warsaw Pact armored divisions rolling across Eastern Europe should a breakthrough occur. They believe that such a threat is real. They believe that such a threat mandates a highly maneuverable, unconventional, devastatingly effective warplane. They believe the A–10 is that plane.

The House and Senate Armed Services Committees believe them. The White House believes them. The Secretary of Defense believes them. The Secretary of the Air Force believes them. And I believe them.

The sponsor of this amendment, obviously, thinks otherwise. The experts disagree with him.

I ask you to join our associates on the Armed Services Committee and once again reject this attempt to reduce the procurement of this incredibly capable "tank killer," just as you rejected such an attempt by a 2-to-1 margin a year ago.

I just wanted to ask the gentleman from upstate New York (Mr. STRATTON) whether or not it is true, since neither of us is a pilot and that, as a result, our judgments are made through the recommendations given by the experts, from reviews, from fly-offs, and is it not true that this plane, at this level of funding, comes from recommendations of the President, the Department of Defense, the Air Force, the Joint Chiefs of Staff, General Haig, and all the others who have reviewed this plane and its capabilities, its mission and that they indeed want it?

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield briefly?

Mr. DOWNEY. I will be happy to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I would say that the gentleman from New York (Mr. AMBRO) is absolutely correct. As a matter of fact, we have had objections to this A–10 before, in the discussions of the Committee on Armed Services, and we had a fly-off between the A–7 and the A–10. After that fly-off the pilots came in before the committee and they testified that for the mission of the A–10, the A–10 was the best aircraft.

Mr. AMBRO. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman very much for yielding and I also thank the gentleman for his remarks.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the A–10 was designed to shoot down tanks. It has a 30-millimeter gun known as a Gau–8. It is essentially an airplane that has been built around a gun. It has a titanium cockpit to protect the pilot against ground fire.

I might add that it is not a very sexy looking aircraft and it does not fly very fast and as I say, it does not look very sleek, but it does its mission, especially in the European theater where it will come up against the Russian tanks, and it can destroy them emphatically.

My good friend the gentleman from California (Mr. LLOYD) is a very able pilot but does not like the A–10, despite the trips that he has taken to New York to look at the plane. The plane is under cost and on schedule, a rarity for Department of Defense programs, and I urge the committee to support it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. LLOYD).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LLOYD of California), there were—ayes 23, noes 45.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any further amendments to title I? If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE II—RESEARCH, DEVELOPMENT, TEST, AND EVALUATION

SEC. 201. Funds are hereby authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1979 for the use of the Armed Forces of the United States for research, development, test, and evaluation, as authorized by law, in amounts as follows:

For the Army, $2,586,215,000, of which the $8,100,000 available for cooperative tank gun development shall not be obligated unless the Committee on Armed Services of the House of Representatives acts favorably on the proposed reprogramming action for fiscal year 1978 funds for cooperative tank gun development as requested by the Department of Defense on January 31, 1978.

For the Navy (including the Marine Corps), $4,287,009,000, of which $10,000,000 shall be available only for research and development of the existing Extremely Low Frequency (ELF) system and none of which shall be available for full-scale development or construction of a new test bed facility for such system.

For the Air Force, $3,989,400,000.

For the Defense Agencies, $974,816,000 of which $27,600,000 is authorized for the activities of the Director of Test and Evaluation, Defense.

Mr. PRICE (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title II be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. DOWNEY

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOWNEY. Page 12, section 201, delete line 21, and insert in its place the following: "For the Air Force, $4,018,600,000, of which $29,200,000 shall be available for research, development, test, and evaluation of a wide-body strategic cruise missile carrier including, at the discretion of the Secretary of Defense, use of wide-body aircraft originally placed in the Air Force inventory for other purposes."

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I might say at the outset that the wide-bodied cruise missile carrier is not built on Long Island nor anywhere near Long Island. I suspect if it is built at all, it will be built in Seattle. It is a program that the administration and the Air Force have asked for. What the administration asked for is $41 million to study a number of different prototypes to be cruise missile carriers. What I am asking for is $29 million to provide for a study of the number of options—basically, the airframe of the 747, which would be configured as a cruise missile carrier.

Why do we need a cruise missile carrier? President Carter indicated when he decided not to go ahead with building the B–1 bomber that he wanted to have a mix of B–52's and cruise missile carriers to stand outside the Soviet Union, in the case of the cruise missile carrier to fire cruise missiles on targets into the Soviet Union in the event that a war should break out.

The cruise missile carrier has certain advantages over the B–52. If it is a 747 or an L–1011 or a C–5, that particular platform could carry between 60 and 70 cruise missiles as opposed to 20 which could be carried on a B–52.

The alert rate of the B–52 and the cruise missile carrier are approximately the same. In other words, they can both take off quickly under attack and with additional money, if it is provided in out years, it can be hardened to as the flexing command post is against a nuclear blast.

It has a number of unique advantages, over the B–52. It can carry more missiles. It has additional room for crew space, so it can stay on alert longer. In a Cuban missile-type crisis, it can be airborne as quickly as a B–52 and stay on alert longer and in the air longer.

The last point I want to make, and I do not normally like to make this argument, but I believe it is an important one, is that during the SALT II negotiations we have managed to get the Soviets to concede the fact that we can produce a cruise missile carrier. It seems to me that this Congress, and particularly the Committee on Armed Services, would not want to preclude our SALT II negotiators from one of the effective positions they have negotiated. If we do not provide the money in the House, it is provided in the Senate bill and I suspect some compromise could be worked out, but I think it is very important for the Members to further realize that the cruise missile has advantages in the terms of warheads it can carry, the time it can stay aloft and it is equal to if not better escaping a short SLBM attack.

I think it is a $29 million option that we want to preserve. If you are against the $29 million, you are against the option and it seems to me it leaves you in the position that you either go back to the B–1 or another penetrator, or in the future look to some alternative platform for a cruise missile, which would be more expensive.

One other thing I will say about the cruise missile carrier, that it, that the carrier is very expensive. It is almost 80 to 90 percent of the cost of a B–1 bomber. Fortunately we do not want to develop 244 of them. We may want to build 50 or we may want to build 100, but we do want the option of keeping the B–52 and the cruise missile carriers.

I urge in terms of strategic deterrents and hard targets kill capability the cruise missile is the most positive way to go. It will do much toward destroying the hard-target points in the Soviet Union that we would want to do with our bombers, but which we might not want to do with our ballistic missiles.

I urge that we keep the $29 million to keep the option for acquiring the planes and keeping our deterrent forces strong.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, my good friend, the distinguished gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY) is in a very unusual position in that the gentleman is going against his R. & D. Subcommittee on a deletion. It is not very often that the gentleman from New York comes before this House asking for an add-on and not supporting reductions; but I would state to the Members of the House that we looked at this wide-bodied cruise missile carrier very, very carefully, in the R. & D. Subcommittee. After giving it a long hard look, we voted on the program.

There were only two Members, if my memory serves me correctly, who supported this, and I refer to this $41.2 million for a wide-bodied cruise missile carrier. I believe they were the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) and the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY).

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ICHORD. I yield to the gentlewoman from Colorado since I mentioned her name.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I want to clarify the gentleman's statement. He is correct that I did support the deletion of the wide-bodied cruise missile carrier. I supported the deletion when it was at the higher figure, but I think the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY) has now lowered it to $29 million and has provided the test be one plane rather than two planes. Therefore I now support this program.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, whether it is $29 million or $41.2 million, let me state to the Members of the House that what they are asking us to do is to start off on a multibillion dollar program, building an airplane that is going to cost better than $100 million a copy.

Now, we thought the B–1 was high in price. This one is going to cost $100 million a copy, and it is going to be sitting out there, particularly with the 2,500-kilometer limitation, like a sitting duck.

The logical defense against a wide-bodied cruise missile carrier is to deny that wide-bodied cruise missile carrier a launch point. If we have a 2,500-kilometer limitation—and it looks like we are going to have that in SALT II—I can tell the Members of this body today that they are very, very vulnerable.

I was talking to the Air Force only last night, and I was told that in the 1980 time frame, when the wide-bodied cruise missile, this monster that costs $100 million a copy, does come into the inventory, there is not going to be any doubt about the Soviets being able to shoot it out of the air. Personally, I believe that such a plane, if it were in existence today, it would be very vulnerable. In any event we can expect the Soviets to continue to extend their defense parameters.

Mr. Chairman, I want to make one more point. The committee was greatly concerned that the SALT II treaties themselves would make the wide-bodied cruise missile carrier a dead issue. I have just received the latest report from the SALT II negotiations which supports and substantiates the decision of our Subcommittee on Research and Development. Apparently the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY) has not received it as yet.

This is the report, the latest word that I have received: It is that the Soviets have accepted our approach for B–52's carrying ALCM's contingent upon agreement that no ALCM carrier can have more than 20 cruise missiles, and also contingent upon exclusion of Bison tankers from the overall aggregate.

They further state they will not accept fragmentization limits on ICBM's unless we accept similar limits on ALCM carriers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. ICHORD) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. ICHORD was allowed to proceed for 3 additional minutes.)

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, the report further states that this approach is intended to avoid contentious negotiations during conclusion of the SALT II negotiation by putting this issue off for now. It would be most acceptable to the Soviets if limits on new types of ICBM's were contained only in the protocol. The question of cruise missile, other than B–52's, is bound up with other issues that should be addressed in SALT II.

Mr. Chairman, I say to the Members of the House that it is all over. We have 120 B–52 (G)'s already in the inventory that can carry 20 missiles each, and they are asking us to embark on a multibillion dollar program that most certainly will be canceled in the very near future. Why do we need a $100 million aircraft that can carry 60 missiles if SALT limits our cruise missile carriers to 20 missiles?

In my early remarks I pointed out that we must halt this expensive start and stop syndrome. This is one program that will never go any place, I assure the Members, because of the vulnerability of the aircraft and I ask you to support your Subcommittee on Research and Development.

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ICHORD. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Chairman, this is a quotation in support of the gentleman's own arguments which are very effective. Secretary of Defense Harold Brown on April 29 last year made this statement, and let me just read it into the RECORD:

> The estimated cost to develop and procure one hundred 747-type cruise missile carriers is about $10.6 billion. . . The cost of cruise missiles would add about $5.9 billion in inflated dollars, or about $5.1 billion in constant fiscal year 1978 budget dollars, to this total.

It is obvious we will have a total cost of about $16 billion to convert a commercial aircraft to a cruise missile carrier.

Mr. ICHORD. The gentleman is correct. I thank the gentleman for his most astute observation. Mr. Chairman, I want to point out to the Members of the House that I have a parochial interest in this matter. One of the contenders for the missile carrier is made by McDonnell Douglas, which is located in Missouri; parochial interests naturally tend to make a Member look with more favor on a given program but this proposal is so ludicrous that I could never vote for such a program.

Mr. BADHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words.

Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment to restore funding to the cruise missile carrier aircraft program. I do so not because of concerns over the issues of survivability, affordability, and performance—although I, too have these concerns—but because of what the Department proposes to do in their research and development program.

Let me first remind the Members that this is not a $41 million program, it is a $96 million program. That is the total price tag. And what do we get for this effort? Do we get an operational cruise missile carrier aircraft? Absolutely not. In fact, the Government will not even own the aircraft, it will either be leased or furnished by the contractor.

Let me read what the Air Force proposes to do for $96 million, and I want to point out that this description comes directly from the Air Force research and development justification books:

> The Cruise Missile Carrier Aircraft (CMCA) program is an orderly examination of the operational and technical suitability of current generation wide body aircraft to perform the standoff cruise missile carrier role. It is a forward looking program with the objective of providing a mid-term (1980s) option to supplement the B–52 if this capability is required. The B–52G can carry cuise missiles in sufficient quantities to fulfill anticipated national needs well into the mid-term period.

What this all boils down to is simply this: the Air Force wants to determine whether it is possible to dump a cruise missile out the rear end of a 747, DC–10, L–1011, or C–5A. In my view, that is a rather pedestrian sort of thing to do. Where is the technical challenge in that? Why should it cost $96 million to demonstrate this capability? And, let me again remind you, for this $96 million, we are not even buying an aircraft.

I think the Defense Department is grandstanding on this one. First, there is no immediate need to go to a wide-body cruise missile carrier fleet. By the Air Force's own admission, the B–52G's can do this job well into the midterm.

Second, if we ultimately need to go to a wide body carrier, we do not need to "warm up" with a $96 million program. After modifying the B–52G's to carry cruise missiles, modifying a wide body aircraft should be a "piece of cake." That is not to say it will be cheap or that some research and development will not be needed.

My point is, why do it now? We do not need a wide body cruise missile carrier at present and, if and when we do, let us do the research and development once and for all. The technical challenge is not that great. Compared to the complexities involved in designing a nuclear powered submarine, a high performance fighter aircraft or a sophisticated surface-to-air missile, modifying a wide body commercial aircraft to carry cruise missiles is a relatively simple task.

I urge you to join with me in voting to defeat this amendment.

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment to add funds for the conversion of a wide bodied commercial aircraft to a cruise missile carrier.

Each of us here today has an obligation to maintain, through legislation, the national security of this country. Let us not forget, however, that we also have an obligation to insure that the tax dollars of our constituents are used effectively and efficiently to reach this objective. If the Congress provides funds to build a dedicated cruise missile carrier, then I believe that we are acting capriciously and certainly not in the best interests of the people we represent.

Let us review for a moment the President's statement of last June 30 to terminate production of the B–1 aircraft. The President said:

> * * * we should begin deployment of cruise missiles, using air-launched platforms such as our B–52s, modernized as necessary.

Earlier in the statement, the President alleged that the bomber-delivered cruise missile system was a more cost effective approach than the B–1.

Whether you agree or disagree with the President on this point—or whether you are for or against the B–1—is a rather moot point at this time. The President recommended killing its production; Congress has voted to support that recommendation. And I have reluctantly accepted that decision. I am not up here to reincarnate the B–1. I am up here to solicit your support to defeat an amendment that would give us a weapon system that is most certainly cost and performance ineffective. I urge each and every one of you here today to vote against this folly called a cruise missile carrier. It is a folly because the Department of Defense is talking about converting a $35 or $45 million commercial aircraft into a weapon system that, when finished, will cost $100 million per aircraft—an aircraft that would have virtually no chance of surviving in combat.

I am not going to throw out numbers in the absence of supporting data. Today, a DC–10 or a 747 cost $35 and $45 million respectively. Using the Department of Defense estimates, the conversion of either of these aircraft to cruise missile carriers would add in excess of $50 million to this price tag. Now, this resulting $100 million aircraft would not be capable of surviving in a nuclear environment.

The supporters of this amendment contend that such an aircraft could launch cruise missiles outside the Soviet air space. This is a little far-fetched and it does not take a mathematician to realize that the cruise missile range constraint that is currently being negotiated in SALT II would make it absolutely essential for this cruise missile carrier to operate well within the range of the existing Soviet defense capability.

So for those of you who did not like the B–1 because of its $85 million cost, I ask you to consider how we could justify an aircraft that costs at least $20 million more and cannot do nearly as much.

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

I have sat and listened to the debate; and of course, am aware that one of these wide bodied aircraft is built in my district, as are others in other districts.

Mr. Chairman, while not a member of the committee, I have had an opportunity to see the presentation of using the wide bodied aircraft as a cruise missile launcher. We have heard a lot of conversation today on the floor to the effect that we are building one of this and one of that. Now we have an opportunity to look at existing aircraft that already are flying, that already are being produced, and that already have a performance rating, and to spend money to look at what additional services wide bodied aircraft can provide.

We have the new special performance Boeing 747. I certainly would think that this would be a prudent investment. To say that when we need it, we will do the research and development is a case of locking the barn door after the horse has been stolen.

David would have a tough time finding a stone once Goliath was stepping on him.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I might point out that the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. ICHORD) mentioned an interesting proposal in SALT about the limitation on the volumetric, I would assume, constraint on the B–52.

I followed those negotiations resonably closely, and I find nothing in the negotiations at the present time that would preclude us—quite the contrary—from having a wide-bodied option, which is something we would negotiate.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CUNNINGHAM. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY), I think the gentleman from New York was out of the Chamber when I made my remarks, and he can be advised that that information is fresh from the State Department.

I think the gentleman will agree that if we are going to limit the cruise missile carrier to 20 cruise missile carriers, then the wide-bodied cruise missile carrier, which will carry approximately three times the 20, or 60 cruise missiles—and it has been estimated as high as 70—is out the window, would he not?

Mr. DOWNEY. If the gentleman will yield further, Mr. Chairman, I would certainly agree, and I do not question the veracity of my friend, the gentleman from Missouri. I would only question the unique timing of his information.

Mr. ICHORD. It just so happened that it just arrived, I would state to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. DOWNEY).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—ayes 145, noes 246, not voting 43, as follows:

Mr. BONKER changed his vote from "no" to "aye."

Mr. LEACH changed his vote from "aye" to "no."

So the amendment was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments to title II?

If not, the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE III—ACTIVE FORCES

SEC. 301. For fiscal year 1979, each component of the Armed Forces is authorized an end strength for active duty personnel as follows:

(1) The Army, 776,600.
(2) The Navy, 525,300.
(3) The Marine Corps, 191,500.
(4) The Air Force, 566,350.

ASSIGNMENT OF WOMEN TO NAVAL VESSELS

SEC. 302. Section 6015 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by striking out the last sentence and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "However, women may not be assigned to duty in vessels or aircraft that are engaged in combat missions nor may they be assigned to other than temporary duty on vessels of the Navy except for hospital ships, transports, and vessels of a similar classification not expected to be assigned combat missions. For purposes of this section, a member assigned to temporary duty on a vessel will not fill a billet authorized for that vessel, but will serve in addition to all such authorized billets, and for a period of not more than six months' duration. If a vessel on which women are serving on temporary duty is assigned a combat mission, every reasonable effort will be made to disembark them prior this section, 'combat mission' is defined as to execution of such mission. For purposes of one which has as one of its primary objectives to seek out, reconnoiter, or engage the enemy. The Secretary of the Navy shall promulgate regulations governing the assignment of women hereunder.".

Mr. PRICE (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that title III be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any amendments to title III?

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. STRATTON

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. STRATTON: Page 13, line 2, after "SEC. 301." insert "(a)".

Page 13, after line 8, insert the following new subsection:

(b) No funds authorized to be appropriated by this Act may be used for the purpose of reducing Army combat troops stationed in the Republic of Korea below 26,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is a very simple one.

POINT OF ORDER

Mr. VOLKMER. Mr. Chairman, I have a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VOLKMER. I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) has already begun his remarks, and that precludes the point of order.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is a very simple one, but I think it brings to the House the opportunity to express our will with regard to a very important action that is already underway; namely, the withdrawal of the 32,000 infantry combat troops now stationed in the Republic of Korea. This amendment is being offered not simply by myself, although the parliamentary situation makes it necessary for us to do that. It is essentially the same language approved by a 2-to-1 vote in the Committee on Armed Services, and the recommendation it contains resulted from a factfinding subcommittee of our committee that visited Korea in January of this year and then visited the neighboring countries of Japan, the Republic of China on Taiwan, and the Philippines.

What this amendment would do is to allow the President to withdraw 6,000 troops from Korea in the coming fiscal year, but not to reduce those forces any further, so that 26,000 troops would remain. The fact of the matter is that Korea is probably the most volatile spot in Asia. There is a very definite edge in North Korea in terms of combat capability. Although there has been peace, supposedly, in Korea for 25 years, the North Korean Dictator, Kim Il Sung, is poised with very substantial forces to attack across the demilitarized zone. Even the National Security Council acknowledges that if he did attack, he could probably capture Seoul, and it would take three Marine amphibious forces and five carrier task groups for us to dislodge the North Koreans from Seoul.

We do not want that kind of conflict to erupt. We want to deter a war in Asia just as much as we want to deter a war in NATO. The single most important factor, as our committee found in visiting Korea, in deterring a North Korean attack is the presence of the American 2d Division. The South Koreans do have greater population than the North. They have got a better economy too. But Kim Il Sung is lean and tough and hard, and he has been concentrating primarily on aggressive military tactics. The one thing that he does not want to do, however, is to tangle with American troops.

If we were to remove all our infantry forces from Korea, if we were to announce that the first removal is simply part of a plan that will result in the entire removal of American forces in 5 years, the temptation would be very great for Kim Il Sung to attack.

General Singlaub, for example, who testified before our committee after he had been transferred by the President for speaking what was, in fact, the truth, said that the removal of the 2d Division would increase the risk of war in Korea. If South Korea were to fall to the Communists—it is now the only non-Communist part of the Asian littoral from the Arctic Circle to the South China Sea—if Korea were to fall to the Communists it would be a dagger at the heart of Japan. So what we really seek, it seems to me, is to maintain peace and stability just as much in Asia as in Europe. This can be very easily done by maintaining those forces in Korea, as my amendment would do.

Now, the President has made plans to withdraw 6,000 troops from Korea this year. We do not object to that. I am willing to allow him to take 6,000 out; but when he says that this first withdrawal is just the first part of a larger which will remove all U.S. ground forces from Korea by 1982, then I think the Congress of the United States must express its will on this very risky plan.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

(At the request of Mr. WOLFF, and by unanimous consent, Mr. STRATTON was allowed to proceed for an additional 3 minutes.)

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield to my friend, the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOLFF).

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, does the gentleman realize that the gentleman's amendment means that as the troops are pulled out, that none of the funds in this bill can be used to refurbish the troops that are pulled out in the United States?

In other words, as the troops are pulled out, it means there will be no further funds available for those troops that are pulled out so that they can be refurbished in the United States.

Mr. STRATTON. Well, refurbishing in the United States is something entirely different. It is not touched in this amendment.

Mr. WOLFF. This says that none of the funds can be used for the replacement of those troops. None of those funds can be used for the replacement of the troops or the replacement of the equipment that the men have that they are going to leave in Korea.

Mr. STRATTON. If the gentleman will allow me to recover my time, there is presently in the gentleman's own committee legislation which would authorize the transfer of equipment to the South Korea forces.

I would not oppose this insofar as it relates to the 6,000 troops. Transferring the equipment of those troops would cost about $80 million or $90 million, as General Vessey has testified. Frankly, it would be a lot easier to pass a transfer of $80 million or $90 million than the $800 million that is now in the bill coming out of the gentleman's committee.

The removal of 6,000 troops from Korea is all we are concerned about in my amendment. There is nothing in it that would prevent withdrawal of the 6,000. If we want to resupply them when they get back here, then the Army would of course have to come before our committee for reprograming of funds.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, in other words, if the gentleman will yield further, the gentleman would deny the replenishment of any of those troops that are repatriated to the United States.

Mr. STRATTON. No, no. All this amendment does is prevent any money in this bill from being used for the purpose of reducing Army combat troops in Korea below 26,000. The President has already said he is only going to withdraw 2,000 this year. So if that is what is done there will be no limitation on using these funds. However, if the force in Korea drop below 26,000.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield further, as I recall, during the consideration of the war powers bill or resolution that was before the House, the gentleman made a particular point of the fact that the President was the Commander in Chief and he did not want to tie his hands in any actions that he had to take as Commander in Chief.

The gentleman has now changed his mind, and he wants now to tie the President's hands so he cannot remove the troops from Korea; is that correct?

Mr. STRATTON. That is exactly the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. STRATTON was allowed to proceed for 2 additional minutes.)

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, if there is a chance of this country getting into a situation where we are likely to have a war in the Pacific, that is a pretty serious matter. Every knowledgeable person to whom our committee spoke during our trip agreed that pulling our troops out of Korea would increase the risks of war.

So if the President has embarked on a course that could increase the risk of war, I believe it is the duty of Congress to say something about it. My amendment is the simplest way to do something about it.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STRATTON. Yes, I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WOLFF. In other words, the gentleman wants to strip the President completely of his powers as Commander in Chief; is that correct?

Mr. STRATTON. We have already demonstrated that the President does not have absolute power in this area when we passed the War Powers Act. The War Powers Act made it perfectly clear that the President does not have any untrammeled ability to move troops into a foreign country. He is required to come back to Congress and get approval.

In my amendment we are doing exactly the same thing, saying that when the national security is threatened he ought to withdraw those troops. The Constitution provides to the Congress the authority to provide for the "regulation and the government of the land forces." If that does not include a decision as to where they are stationed, then I do not know what the Constitution means.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. STRATTON. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, what powers does the gentleman think the President has, then, as Commander in Chief of our Armed Forces?

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, the President's authority is limited to the extent that Congress decides to put limitations on it. The gentleman from New York (Mr. WOLFF), as has just been pointed out, was one of the major advocates of that war powers resolution. If we did not put limitations on the President's powers in that bill, I do not know what we did. All one has to do is to pick up the paper in the morning and read that the President is complaining about the restrictions we put on him.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON) has again expired.

(On request of Mr. LEVITAS, and by unanimous consent, Mr. STRATTON was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I yield to the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, I have a question. I do not know yet how I am going to vote on this amendment, but I have a question.

In the event there were an incident elsewhere in the Western Pacific outside of the Republic of Korea and it was necessary in the opinion of the President to move a large contingent of forces to meet that problem, say, in the Philippines, in Japan, or someplace in the Western Pacific, could he use the forces in Korea if it meant a reduction below 26,000, assuming they were the most readily available combat troops to assign? Could he do that even though it meant a reduction below 26,000 in Korea?

Mr. STRATTON. I happened to be in this Chamber, in the gallery, the day we declared war on Japan, and anybody would be surprised at how rapidly it is possible in an emergency for the House of Representatives to reverse itself.

Actually I think it would be very risky for the President to pull the 2d Division out of Korea if we had something erupting in the Philippines, because that would open the way to Kim Il Sung. We have emergency forces in Hawaii and in Okinawa to meet these emergencies. It would be risky to be faked out of the key defensive position in Korea.

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I have great respect for my friend, the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON), who I know feels very strongly about this question.

However, I must say that this amendment is a little bit like a legislative version of the old shell game. Earlier today we had a similar amendment which was ruled out of order by the chairman on the grounds that it was not germane. Unfortunately, the chairman did not this time recognize one of the Members who had risen to challenge the germaness of this amendment, so we are not in a position, by virtue of the fact that debate had already started, to test the parliamentary acceptability of this amendment.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLARZ. I will be happy to yield as soon as I have finished.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I yielded to the gentleman on my time, and I would appreciate his yielding to me.

Mr. SOLARZ. I yield briefly to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to point out that the wording of my amendment is almost identical with that of the Dellums troop withdrawal amendment and that of the O'Neill withdrawal amendment of previous years. So I think any Member who wanted to rise and challenge it would have been on shaky grounds.

Mr. CHARLES H. WILSON of California. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Chairman, if I may, I would like to finish my statement first, and then I will be happy to yield. I am afraid that my time may run out.

I want to address myself to the substance of the amendment which is before us. First of all, this amendment, even if it were adopted, would not accomplish what it purports to accomplish. What the amendment does is to prohibit the use of any funds from this act for the purpose of reducing the number of American combat troops in South Korea below 26,000. But there is nothing in the amendment which would prohibit the President from using funds from other acts to reduce our ground combat presence in South Korea below 26,000. So if, in fact, your objective is to keep at least 26,000 American combat troops in South Korea, the adoption of this amendment will simply not accomplish the objective.

But let us, for argument's sake, say that people are interested in making a policy statement rather than accomplishing a policy objective. It seems to me that, even under those circumstances, this is the wrong amendment, at the wrong time, for the wrong reasons. The fact of the matter is that even if we do gradually withdraw our ground combat forces from South Korea—which the President does not plan to complete until 1982, and then only after we have transferred almost $1 billion worth of assets of the 2d Division, which is already in place north of Seoul but south of the DMZ—the South Koreans are perfectly capable of effectively defending themselves. They have more than twice the population of North Korea. They have a gross national product that is more than twice as large as the gross national product of North Korea. And over a period of time, with continued American logistical and military assistance, there is absoultely no reason why they should not be in a position to defend themselves.

Some may think that the withdrawal of our ground forces from South Korea will create a vacuum into which the forces of North Korea will move. The fact of the matter is that if this amendment is rejected, and if the President is allowed to continue his policy of gradually withdrawing our ground troops from South Korea, the Mutual Defense Treaty will remain intact. We will still have a military presence in South Korea because, while it is the President's plan over 5 years to gradually withdraw our ground combat presence, he is not planning to withdraw our air presence, or our naval presence within South Korea and surrounding waters. We are planning to provide the South Koreans of upwards to $2 billion of military assistance during this transition period in order to give them the ability to effectively defend themselves if war should break out anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York (Mr. SOLARZ) has expired.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. SOLARZ was allowed to proceed for 1 additional minute.)

Mr. SOLARZ. The thrust and the spirit of this amendment is, in effect, to say to the President and to the people of this country that, in spite of the fact that the Koreans will be able after 5 years to defend themselves, in spite of the fact that the mutual defense treaty will still be in existence, and in spite of the fact that the South Koreans have the economic capacity and the manpower to defend themselves, that we are in perpetuity going to keep almost 26,000 American combat troops in South Korea who would be immediately and gratuitously involved in another war on the Asian mainland if another conflict broke out in South Korea. That would be a tragedy for our country, but it is precisely what could happen if this amendment and the logic behind it were adopted, and I urge its rejection by the committee.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not take the full amount of time that is given to me here, except to state that the Congressional Budget Office made a study of the troop withdrawal for the Subcommittee on Asian and Pacific Affairs. This study showed that the Koreans can adequately defend themselves today without American ground forces.

In addition, evidence the fact that it costs the people of the United States about $1.3 billion a year to keep those people in Korea.

Mr. Chairman, I think it is about time that we took the step and followed the President in this and removed the ground troops from Korea.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the requisite number of words, and I rise in support of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I had the privilege of accompanying the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON), our chairman, on a trip to Japan, Korea, Taiwan, and the Philippines, as he mentioned, in January.

Mr. Chairman, it was the uniform opinion, shared by the military and civil leadership in each country, and the opinion of our U.S. military leaders in each country that the risk of war will be unacceptably heightened with the withdrawal of these troops.

That trip persuaded me of the danger of our withdrawal. It persuaded me of the wisdom that most of our troops remain, as the amendment would provide.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I urge the support of the amendment.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL. JR. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Does the gentleman know that the Joint Chiefs of Staff have recommended the withdrawal of our ground forces on an extended basis?

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. I think on an genuinely extended basis we could have a withdrawal. It depends on how extended it is.

I think the withdrawal as proposed—and this is what we are dealing with in the real world—was considered dangerous by the military and civil leaders to whom we talked, and I certainly find it to be so.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the gentleman's yielding.

The gentleman from Virginia (Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR.) was a very knowledgeable and effective member of our delegation; and he has reported the facts exactly as they are.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOLFF) says that it costs x billions of dollars to keep these forces in Korea. The fact of the matter is that it is going to cost a lot more to bring them back to the United States, and that is an absolute fact. It would cost still more if by another miscalculation we were to get into another war in Korea.

Mr. Chairman, the interesting thing is that for many years we had an annual effort on this floor, and in the other body, to withdraw troops from NATO on the ground that it had been 25 years since they went over there. Senator Mansfield, before he became Ambassador to Japan, annually put in an amendment to pull 150,000 of them back to the United States.

Fortunately, both the President of the United States and the Congress now recognize that our troops in Europe are protecting our own security and are deterring an attack in Europe. We have 300,000 troops in Europe, and only 32,000 in Korea, yet those 32,000 are also deterring an attack, and are serving a very valuable purpose.

Why should we risk the possibility of war by withdrawing 32,000 troops while we still keep 300,000 in Europe? We are getting security cheap by maintaining a single division in Korea until there is an actual settlement of the Korean war.

Mr. ROBERT W. DANIEL, JR. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON), our chairman, certainly made most persuasive points that these troops would cost more stationed anywhere else in the world, including in the United States, and that it is our security that is so intimately bound up in their continued presence there.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. LEVITAS TO THE AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. STRATTON

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LEVITAS to the amendment offered by Mr. STRATTON: Add in the Stratton amendment after "26,000.", the following ", except in the case of an emergency declared by the President."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS) is recognized for 5 minutes in support of his amendment.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVITAS. I am happy to yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS) has been kind enough to show me his amendment, and I will be glad to accept it as an amendment to my own.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS) to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON).

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON), as amended.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

RECORDED VOTE

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were--ayes 142, noes 247, not voting 45, as follows:

Mr. Teague for, with Mrs. Burke of California against.

Mr. LIVINGSTON changed his vote from "no" to "aye."

Mr. FORD of Tennessee changed his vote from "aye' to "no".

So the amendment, as amended, was rejected.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the remainder of the bill be considered as read, printed in the RECORD, and open to amendment at any point.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

The remainder of the bill is as follows:

TITLE IV—RESERVE FORCES

SEC. 401. (a) For fiscal year 1979, the Selected Reserve of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces shall be programmed to attain an average strength of not less than the following:

(1) The Army National Guard of the United States, 363,000.

(2) The Army Reserve, 196,700.

(3) The Naval Reserve, 87,000.

(4) The Marine Corps Reserve, 33,000.

(5) The Air National Guard of the United States, 92,400.

(6) The Air Force Reserve, 53,200.

(7) The Coast Guard Reserve, 11,700.

(b) The average strength prescribed by subsection (a) of this section for the Selected Reserve of any Reserve component shall be proportionately reduced by (1) the total authorized strength of units organized to serve as units of the Selected Reserve of such component which are on active duty (other than for training) at any time during the fiscal year, and (2) the total number of individual members not in units organized to serve as units of the Selected Reserve of such component who are on active duty (other than for training or for unsatisfactory participation in training) without their consent at any time during the fiscal year. Whenever such units or such individual members are released from active duty during any fiscal year, the average strength prescribed for such fiscal year for the Selected Reserve of such Reserve component shall be proportionately increased by the total authorized strength of such units and by the total number of such individual members.

EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM FOR ENLISTED RESERVES

SEC. 402. (a) Section 2132(b)(1) of title 10, United States Code, relating to eligibility for educational assistance, is amended—

(1) by striking out "automatically extended by two years" and inserting in lieu thereof "not less than six years"; and

(2) by striking out "eighth anniversary" and inserting in lieu thereof "last day of the term".

(b)(1) Section 2135 of title 10, United States Code, is repealed.

(2) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 106 of such title is amended by striking out the item relating to section 2135.

REENLISTMENT BONUS FOR MEMBERS OF SELECTED RESERVE

SEC. 403. Subsection (a) of section 308b of title 37, United States Code, relating to reenlistment bonuses for members of the Selected Reserve, is amended—

(1) by striking out clause (1);

(2) by redesignating clause (2) as clause (1) and striking out "service as a member of a reserve component" in such clause and inserting in lieu thereof "total military service"; and

(3) by redesignating clause (3) as clause (2).

(b) Subsection (b) of such section is amended by inserting "an amount not to exceed" before "$450", "$900", and "$150".

(c) Subsection (g) of such section is repealed.

BONUS FOR ENLISTMENT IN THE SELECTED RESERVE

SEC. 404. (a) Chapter 5 of title 37, United States Code, is amended by inserting after section 308b the following new section:

"§ 308c. Special pay: bonus for enlistment in the Selected Reserve

"(a) Any person who, after September 30, 1978, enlists in the Selected Reserve of the Ready Reserve of an armed force for a term of enlistment of not less than six years, is a graduate of a secondary school, and has never previously served in an armed force may be paid a bonus as provided in subsection (b).

"(b) The amount and method of payment of a bonus to be paid under subsection (a) shall be determined in accordance with regulations prescribed under subsection (c), except that the amount of such bonus may not exceed $2,000 and—

"(1) one-half of the bonus shall be paid upon completion of the initial active duty for training of such person; and

"(2) the remainder of the bonus may be paid in periodic installments or in a lump sum, as determined by the Secretary concerned.

"(c) This section shall be administered under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Defense for the armed forces under his jurisdiction and by the Secretary of Transportation for the Coast Guard when it is not operating as a service in the Navy.

"(d) A member who fails to participate satisfactorily in training with his unit during a term of enlistment for which a bonus has been paid to him under this section shall refund an amount which bears the same ratio to the amount of the bonus which has been paid to him as the unexpired part of such term of enlistment bears to the total length of such term of enlistment.

"(e) The Secretary of Defense shall submit a report to the Congress every three months stating the number of members of the Selected Reserve of the Ready Reserve who at the time of such report are serving a term of enlistment for which a bonus has been paid under this section and listing each unit of the Selected Reserve of the Ready Reserve to which any such member is assigned at the time of such report. The first such report shall be made not later than December 31, 1978.".

(b) The table of sections at the beginning of such chapter is amended by inserting after the item relating to section 308b the following new item:

"308c. Special pay: bonus for enlistment in the Selected Reserve.".

AUTHORIZATION OF APPROPRIATIONS FOR RESERVE EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE PROGRAM AND RESERVE ENLISTMENT AND REENLISTMENT BONUS

SEC. 405. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for fiscal year 1979 to carry out the provisions of chapter 106 of title 10, United States Code, and sections 308b and 308c of title 37, United States Code, the sum of $32,750,000.

RESTRICTION ON TRANSFER FROM READY RESERVE TO STANDBY RESERVE

SEC. 406. (a)(1) Section 269 of title 10, United States Code, relating to transfers from the Ready Reserve, is amended—

(A) by striking out "eligible to transfer" in subsection (a) and inserting in lieu thereof "transferred";

(B) by striking out the colon at the end of the third sentence in subsection (d) and inserting in lieu thereof a period;

(C) by striking out subsection (e) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(e) Subject to subsection (g) and under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Defense, and by the Secretary of Transportation with respect to the Coast Guard when it is not operating as a service in the Navy, a member in the Ready Reserve may be transferred to the Standby Reserve."; and

(D) by striking out subsection (f) and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"(f) A Reserve, if he is qualified and so requests, may be transferred to the Retired Reserve under regulations prescribed by the Secretary concerned and, in the case of the Secretary of a military department, approved by the Secretary of Defense.".

(2) The amendments made by paragraph (1) shall not apply with respect to a member of the Ready Reserve of an Armed Force who served on active duty (other than for training) before the date of the enactment of this Act.

(b) Section 271 of such title, relating to continuous screening of the Ready Reserve, is amended—

(1) by inserting "(a)" before "Under regulations";

(2) by striking out "significance" in clause (1) and inserting in lieu thereof "significant"; and

(3) by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(b) Under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Defense, and by the Secretary of Transportation with respect to the Coast Guard when it is not operating as a service in the Navy, any member of the Ready Reserve who is designed as a member not to be retained in the Ready Reserve as a result of screening under subsection (a) shall, as appropriate, be transferred to the Standby Reserve, discharged or, if such member is eligible and applies therefor, transferred to the Retired Reserve.".

(c)(1) Section 511(b) of such title, relating to terms of enlistments in Reserve components, is amended—

(A) in the first sentence—

(i) by striking out "the Secretary concerned" and inserting in lieu thereof "the Secretary of Defense, and by the Secretary of Transportation with respect to the Coast Guard when it is not operating as a service in the Navy"; and

(ii) by striking out "sections 451–473 of title 50, appendix" and inserting in lieu thereof "the Military Selective Service Act (50 U.S.C. App. 451–473)"; and

(B) in the second sentence—

(i) by inserting "not less than" in clause (1) before "two years" and by adding "and" at the end of such clause;

(ii) by striking out clause (2); and

(iii) by redesignating clause (3) as clause (2) and striking out "Standby Reserve" in such clause and inserting in lieu thereof "Ready Reserve".

(2) The amendments made by paragraph (1) shall not apply with respect to a person who enlisted as a Reserve for service in the Armed Forces under section 511(b) of title 10, United States Code, before the date of the enactment of this Act.

(d)(1) Chapter 37 of such title, relating to general services requirements, is amended by adding after section 651 the following new section:

"§ 652. Individual Ready Reserves: requirement of notification of change of status

"Under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of Defense, and by the Secretary of Transportation with respect to the Coast Guard when it is not operating as a service in the Navy, each member of the Individual Ready Reserve shall notify the Secretary concerned of any change in such member's address, marital status, number of dependents, or civilian employment and of any change in such member's physical condition which would prevent him from meeting the physical or mental standards prescribed for his armed force.".

(2) The table of sections at the beginning of such chapter is amended by adding after the item relating to section 651 the following new item:

"652. Individual Ready Reserves: requirement of notification of change of status.".

REPEAL OF REQUIREMENT FOR ANNUAL REPORT ON RESERVE FORCES

SEC. 407. (a) Section 264 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by striking out subsection (c).

(b)(1) Section 279 of such title is repealed.

(2) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 11 of such title is amended by striking out the item relating to section 279.

TITLE V—CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

SEC. 501. (a) For fiscal year 1979, the Department of Defense is authorized an end strength for civilian personnel of 1,018,200.

(b) The end strength for civilian personnel prescribed in subsection (a) of this section shall be apportioned among the Department of the Army, the Department of the Navy (including the Marine Corps), the Department of the Air Force, and the agencies of the Department of Defense (other than the military departments) in such numbers as the Secretary of Defense shall prescribe. The Secretary of Defense shall report to the Congress within sixty days after the date of the enactment of this Act on the manner in which the initial allocation of civilian personnel is made among the military departments and the agencies of the Department of Defense (other than the military departments) and shall include the rationale for each allocation.

(c) In computing the authorized end strength for civilian personnel there shall be included all direct-hire and indirect-hire civilian personnel employed to perform military functions administered by the Department of Defense (other than those performed by the National Security Agency), whether employed on a full-time, part-time, or intermittent basis, but excluding special employment categories for students and disadvantaged youth such as the stay-in-school campaign, the temporary summer aid program and the Federal junior fellowship program and personnel participating in the worker-trainee opportunity program. Whenever a function, power, or duty, or activity is transferred or assigned to a department or agency of the Department of Defense from a department or agency outside of the Department of Defense, or from another department or agency within the Department of Defense, the civilian personnel end strength authorized for such department or agencies of the Department of Defense affected shall be adjusted to reflect any increases or decreases in civilian personnel required as a result of such transfer or assignment.

(d) When the Secretary of Defense determines that such action is necessary in the national interest, he may authorize the employment of civilian personnel in excess of the number authorized in subsection (a) of this section, but such additional number may not exceed 1¼ percent of the total number of civilian personnel authorized for the Department of Defense by subsection (a) of this section. The Secretary of Defense shall promptly notify the Congress of any authorization to increase civilian personnel strength under the authority of this subsection.

TITLE VI—MILITARY TRAINING STUDENT LOADS

SEC. 601. (a) For fiscal year 1979, each component of the Armed Forces is authorized an average military training student load as follows:

(1) The Army, 67,843.

(2) The Navy, 58,086.

(3) The Marine Corps, 21,324.

(4) The Air Force, 44,917.

(5) The Army National Guard of the United States, 11,793.

(6) The Army Reserve, 5,959.

(7) The Naval Reserve, 991.

(8) The Marine Corps Reserve, 3,074.

(9) The Air National Guard of the United States, 2,471.

(10) The Air Force Reserve, 1,184.

(b) The average military training student loads for the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Air Force and the Reserve components authorized in subsection (a) of this section for fiscal year 1979 shall be adjusted consistent with the manpower strengths authorized in titles III, IV, and V of this Act. Such adjustment shall be apportioned among the Army, the Navy, the Marine Corps, and the Air Force and the Reserve components in such manner as the Secretary of Defense shall prescribe.

REDUCTION OR REALIGNMENT OF THE TRAINING BASE

SEC. 602. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, no action may be taken to effect or implement any substantial reduction of the training base (as defined in subsection (c)) or any substantial force structure realignment of the training base planned as a part of the fiscal year 1979 Defense manpower program unless and until the provisions of subsection (b) are complied with.

(b) No action described in subsection (a) with respect to a substantial reduction or realignment of the training base may be taken unless and until—

(1) the Secretary of Defense or the Secretary of the military department concerned notifies the Committees on Armed Services and Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives in writing of the specific reduction or realignment proposed;

(2) the Secretary of Defense or the Secretary of the military department concerned certifies that such reduction or realignment is in the best interest of the national security and provides for the most cost effective and efficient management of the training base, both in time of peace and in ability to meet mobilization requirements; and

(3) a period of thirty legislative days expires following the date on which the notification and certification referred to in clauses (1) and (2) have been submitted to such committees, during which period no irrevocable action may be taken to effect or implement such reduction or realignment.

For the purpose of paragraph (2), a legislative day is a day in which either House of Congress is in session.

(c) For the purposes of this section, the term "training base" means the composite of installations, posts, camps, stations, and bases that have as a primary or secondary mission the conduct of formal entry level, advanced individual, or specialty training.

TITLE VII—CIVIL DEFENSE

AUTHORIZATION FOR DEFENSE CIVIL PREPAREDNESS AGENCY

SEC. 701. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency for fiscal year 1979 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of the Federal Civil Defense Act of 1950 the sum of $137,000,000.

TITLE VIII—GENERAL PROVISIONS

EXTENSIONS OF AUTHORITY FOR SPECIAL PAY FOR HEALTH PROFESSIONALS

SEC. 801. (a) The second sentence of section 2 of the Act entitled "An Act to amend chapter 5 of title 37, United States Code, to revise the special pay structure relating to medical officers of the uniformed services", approved May 6, 1974 (88 Stat. 96; 37 U.S.C. 302 note), is amended to read as follows: "The authority for the special pay provided by the amendments made by the first section of this Act shall expire on September 30, 1980.".

(b) Sections 302a(c) and 303(c) of title 37, United States Code, are each amended by striking out "September 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "September 1980".

AUTHORITY FOR ENLISTMENT AND REENLISTMENT BONUSES

SEC. 802. (a)(1) Section 308(a) of title 37, United States Code, is amended—

(A) by inserting "(1)" after "(a)" and by redesignating paragraphs (1), (2), (3), and (4) as subparagraphs (A), (B), (C), and (D), respectively;

(B) by striking out "designated as having a critical military skill" in paragraph (1)(B) (as redesignated by subparagraph (A)) and inserting in lieu thereof "qualified in a military skill designated as critical"; and

(C) by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"(2) Notwithstanding paragraph (1)(B) of this subsection, a member who agrees to train and reenlist for service in a military skill which, at the time of that agreement, is designated as critical, may be paid the bonus approved for that skill, at the rate in effect at the time of agreement, upon completion of training and qualification in that skill, if otherwise qualified under this subsection and even if that skill is no longer designated as critical at the time the member becomes eligible for payment of the bonus.".

(2) The amendments made by paragraph (1) shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

(b) Sections 308(f) and 308a(c) of title 37, United States Code, are each amended by striking out "September 30, 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1980".

EXTENSION OF AUTHORITY FOR SUBSISTENCE ALLOWANCE FOR MARINE CORPS PLATOON LEADER CLASSES

SEC. 803. The Act entitled "An Act to provide subsistence allowance for members of the Marine Corps officer candidate programs," approved November 24, 1971 (85 Stat. 491; 37 U.S.C. 209 note), is amended by striking out "September 30, 1978" and inserting in lieu thereof "September 30, 1980".

CHIEF OF ARMY DENTAL CORPS; AIR FORCE ASSISTANT SURGEON GENERAL FOR DENTAL SERVICES

SEC. 804. (a) Section 3040(b) of title 10, United States Code, is amended by inserting after the first sentence thereof the following new sentence: "He is Chief of the Dental Corps and is responsible for making recommendations to the Surgeon General to the Chief of Staff on all matters concerning dentistry and the dental health of the Army.".

(b)(1) Chapter 307 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3081. Dental Corps: Chief, functions

"(a) The Chief of the Dental Corps shall be an officer of that corps appointed as prescribed in section 3040 of this title.

"(b) Under such regulations as the Secretary of the Army may prescribe, all dental functions of the Army shall be under the direction of the Chief of the Dental Corps. All matters relating to dentistry shall be referred to the Chief of the Dental Corps.

"(c) The Chief of the Dental Corps shall—

"(1) establish professional standards and policies for dental practice;

"(2) initiate and recommend action pertaining to organization requirements and utilization of the Dental Corps and dental auxiliary strength, appointments, advancement, training assignment, and transfer of dental personnel; and

"(3) serve as the advisor to the Office of the Surgeon General on all matters relating directly to dentistry.

"(d) Under such regulations as the Secretary of the Army may prescribe, dental and dental auxiliary personnel throughout the Army shall be organized into units commanded by a designated Dental Corps officer. Such officer will be directly responsible to the commander of installations, organizations and activities for all professional and technical matters and such administrative matters as may be prescribed by regulation.".

(2) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 307 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"3081. Dental Corps: Chief, functions.".

(c)(1) Chapter 807 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"8081. Assistant Surgeon General for Dental Services.".

"There is an Assistant Surgeon General for Dental Services in the Air Force, who is appointed by the Secretary of the Air Force upon the recommendation of the Surgeon General, from officers of the Air Force above the grade of major who are designated as dental officers under section 8067(b) of this title. The term of office of the Assistant Surgeon General for Dental Services is four years but may be increased or decreased by the Secretary of the Air Force.".

(2) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 807 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"8081. Assistant Surgeon General for Dental Services.".

RERSTRICTION ON CONTRACTING OUT COMMERCIAL AND INDUSTRIAL TYPE FUNCTIONS

SEC. 806. (a) The Secretary of Defense shall submit a report to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives providing the details of any proposed change in policy or regulations, from those in effect before June 30, 1976, regarding the determination of whether commercial or industrial type functions at Department of Defense installations located in any State, the District of Columbia, the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, and Guam should be performed by Department of Defense personnel or by private contractors during the period beginning on October 1, 1978, and ending on September 30, 1979.

(b) No commercial or industrial type function at any Department of Defense installation referred to in subsection (a) shall be performed by private contractors unless such contractor performance began before the date of the enactment of this Act or performance would have been allowed by the policy and regulations in effect before June 30, 1976. The prohibition in the preceding sentence shall apply until the end of the ninety-day period beginning on the date the report required by subsection (a) is received by the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives.

ASSISTANCE TO 1980 OLYMPIC WINTER GAMES

SEC. 807. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of Defense is authorized—

(1) to provide logistical support and personnel services, including medical services, transportation, communications, course preparation, and security, to the XIII Olympic winter games;

(2) to lend and provide equipment to officials of the Lake Placid Olympic Organizing Committee; and

(3) to provide such other services as the Lake Placid Olympic Organizing Committee may consider necessary and the Secretary may consider advisable.

RESTRICTION ON PROCUREMENT OF ARTICLES CONTAINING FOREIGN-PRODUCED SPECIALTY METALS

SEC. 808. (a) Except as provided in subsection (b), no funds may be obligated or expended (except in amounts not exceeding $10,000) for procurement of any article for which appropriations are required under section 138 of title 10, United States Code, to be authorized by law if such article contains specialty metals (including stainless steel flatware) not produced in the United States or its possessions.

(b) The provisions of subsection (a) shall not apply—

(1) with respect to procurement of an article containing specialty metals to the extent that the Secretary of the military department concerned determines that a satisfactory quality and sufficient quantity of such specialty metals produced in the United States or its possessions cannot be procured as and when needed at United States market prices; and

(2) with respect to procurements outside the United States in support of combat operations, procurements by vessels in foreign waters, and emergency procurements by establishments located outside the United States for the personnel attached thereto.

CERTIFICATION OF CLAIMS

SEC. 809. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, none of the funds authorized to be appropriated for the Department of Defense by this or any other Act shall be used for the purpose of paying any contract claim, request for relief under Public Law 85–804, or other similar request which exceeds $100,000 unless (1) the senior company official in charge at the plant or location involved has certified at the time of submission of such contract claim request for equitable adjustment to contract terms, request for relief under Public Law 85–804, or other similar request, that the claim and supporting data are accurate, complete, and current, or (2) in the case of any outstanding claim, request for equitable adjustment to contract terms, request for relief under Public Law 85–804, or other similar request in excess of $100,000 which was formally submitted without such certification before the date of the enactment of this Act, either (A) such senior official submits such a certificate within 120 days after the date of the enactment of this Act, or (B) a contracting officer's decision has been rendered before such date of enactment, in which case this section shall not constitute a bar to any payment.

SEA-BASED AIRCRAFT PLATFORM STUDY FUNDS

SEC. 810. The unobligated balance of $40,000,000 authorized to be appropriated in section 201 of the Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act, 1978 (Public Law 95–79; 91 Stat. 323), for conducting comprehensive evaluation studies of sea-based aircraft platforms shall after the date of the enactment of this Act be available and primarily applied toward performing any design work related to any such sea-based aircraft platform authorized by this Act.

CARRIER SERVICE LIFE EXTENSION PROGRAM AND DDG–2 DESTROYER CONVERSION

SEC. 811. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary of the Navy may not take any action (other than the procurement of long-lead items) (1) with respect to the use of either public shipyards or private shipyards for conversion, overhaul, or repair work under the carrier Service Life Extension Program (SLEP) and the program for the modernization of DDG–2 class guided missile destroyers, or (2) for the employment of additional personnel in, or transfer of additional personnel to, any public or private shipyard to engage in such conversion, overhaul, or repair work, until the provisions of subsection (b) have been complied with.

(b) No action described in subsection (a) (other than the procurement of long-lead items) may be taken until—

(1) the Secretary of the Navy completes a least-cost approach study comparing the costs of carrying out the programs referred to in subsection (a) at public shipyards and at private shipyards;

(2) a written report of such study is submitted to the Committees on Armed Services and on Appropriations of the Senate and House of Representatives; and

(3) a period of sixty days of continuous session of Congress expires following the date on which the report referred to in paragraph (2) is submitted to such committees.

(c) For purposes of subsection (b)(3), the continuity of a session of Congress is broken only by an adjournment sine die, and days on which either House is not in session because of an adjournment of more than three days to a day certain shall be excluded in the computation of such sixty-day period.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the bill and all amendments thereto close at 6:30.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE).

The motion was agreed to.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, am I to understand the time is limited?

The CHAIRMAN. That was the gentleman's motion.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, had the Chair recognized Members that will be permitted to speak?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is endeavoring to identify Members who are standing and who want to participate in the debate.

The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER).

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MRS. SCHROEDER

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mrs. SCHROEDER: Page 34, line 8, insert "(a)" before "Notwithstanding".

Page 34, after line 18, insert the following: "Notwithstanding paragraphs (1) and (3), no services shall be provided under this section if such services are available from civilian sources and if such services do not, in the opinion of the Secretary of Defense, confer some training benefits to the military personnel to be utilized to provide such services.

"(b) The Secretary of Defense may spend only such funds for the purposes of this section as the Congress may specifically appropriate for such purposes.".

Mrs. SCHROEDER (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Colorado?

There was no objection.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would add some restrictive language to the blank check the committee has written to the Lake Placid Olympic Organizing Committee. It would provide that the Department of Defense be restricted to providing only those services to the OOC that are not available from civilian sources, and which, in the opinion of the Secretary of Defense, confer some training benefits on the military personnel to be utilized. The amendment would also require that any costs to the Federal Government involved in the provision of services and equipment be specifically appropriated.

This section of the Defense authorization bill is a real honest-to-goodness ripoff of the Public Treasury. The gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON), in the committee's markup noted that there is a precedent for the provision of such services by DOD, but, in fact, this language will break more precedents than it will follow.

While it is true that military personnel were utilized in limited numbers in the 1960 Winter Olympics at Squaw Valley, the authorizing authority was embodied in separate legislation (S. 3262) on which hearings were held, and the funds provided to support such activities were specifically approved through the appropriations process.

No hearings were held on the language currently contained in the fiscal year 1979 Defense authorization bill and no dollar limitation is contained in the language. My conversations with Department of Defense officials suggests that the Department contemplates paying such costs from its regular appropriations. In this case there would be no congressional oversight. The language in this bill constitutes a signed blank check. The House should block payment.

A few numbers are pertinent to this debate. The Federal Government has already appropriated $58 million in public funding to a private organization. That is a figure more than four times greater than that provided by the State of New York. In 1960 the State of California bore the burden of the games providing more than 12 times the meager Federal contribution of $4 million. At Squaw Valley only an estimated 160 Army personnel and a smaller number of Navy personnel were provided. Before Colorado turned down the 1976 winter games the Olympic Organizing Committee was talking about the utilization of about 6,000 military personnel and this at a time prior to the Munich Olympics and the consequent demands for additional security. In 1976 the Canadians spent $100 million just to provide security at the summer games or about $8,000 per athlete. The Congress should demand an accounting of the expenditures to be involved in the provision of these services and require an authorized appropriation ceiling.

The Armed Services Committee reports on S. 3262 also make clear that the Department of Defense was to provide only those services "uniquely within the competence of the Department of Defense" and that such support was not intended "as a replacement for services available from civilian sources." The language in this year's authorization bill is virtually open ended as to the types of services that could be provided. I think we can all remember Japanese soldiers at Sapporo in the 1972 winter games carting snow around the slopes. I do not believe that type of activity provides useful military training and I would not like to see it repeated.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, this section of the bill is itself a New York State amendment. All the section does is give the Secretary of Defense authority to provide help, if he believes it is appropriate, to the winter Olympics at Lake Placid in 1980. This help would relate primarily to security matters. We are going to have a lot of foreign visitors there. They will need protection against possible terrorism. It would also relate to communications. And it would relate to emergency evacuation if that were required. The Secretary if the amendment is adopted, will be the one who would decide what type of assistance would be appropriate and what would not be appropriate. The gentlewoman from Colorado does not really understand the substance of this section which was included in the bill on my motion. I urge that her amendment be rejected.

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word. I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, there is no question this provision in the bill is substantial and should be retained. We witnessed in the previous Olympics at Munich the Israeli competitors assassinated in cold blood. We do not want a recurrence or even the slightest potential of such a recurrence. To remove the availability of the military contains the seed of disaster and an invitation to terror acts.

I urge strongly and most vigorously that this amendment be defeated.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. MITCHELL of New York yielded his time to Mr. MCEWEN.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New York (Mr. MCEWEN).

Mr. MCEWEN. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON). This is a New York amendment; it is also a United States of America amendment.

The site of the 1980 winter Olympic games is to be in a little village in the Adirondacks, a village of less than 3,000 people, known as Lake Placid. The host nation is the United States of America. During that summer the summer Olympics will be in the Soviet Union, and the site will be Moscow.

All of us, I know, recall the tragedy of Munich. One of the things we hope this authorization will provide is military support that can avoid a tragedy like that of Munich. The military can provide security, and the military can help and provide aid in the event of accident to any of the young men and women who are competing in the games or in the event of accident to any of the spectators who are on the scene in this mountain community that is served only by narrow, two-lane roads. In the event of trouble we would hope the military might provide helicopters for evacuation purposes.

Any of us who read the Washington Post this past Monday know there was an article that talked about $150 million for shoveling snow, but that is not so—this is not for that purpose. Neither is it for $100 million for security; that is a figure that was ascribed to Montreal, a figure which I cannot verify.

Mr. Chairman, what this language does mean is that the military of this Nation will be able, as has the military of every host nation in modern Olympics, to provide support for these games.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER).

The amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HILLIS

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HILLIS: Page 38, after line 9, add the following new section:

CEILING FOR PAYMENTS TO PHYSICIANS UNDER CHAMPUS

SEC. 812. (a)(1) Section 1079 of title 10, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(h) Payment of a charge for physician services for which a claim is submitted under a plan contracted for under subsection (a) may be denied because the charge is in excess of a predetermined charge level based upon customary charges made for similar services in the same locality only to the extent that such charge is in excess of the charge level that, on the basis of statistical data and methodology acceptable to the Secretary of Defense, in consultation with the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare, is equivalent to the 90th percentile of the customary charges made for similar services in the same locality during the last preceding calendar year elapsing before the start of the twelve-month period (beginning July 1 of each year) in which the claim for the payment is submitted.".

(2) Section 1086 of such title is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new subsection:

"(f) The provisions of section 1079(h) of this title shall apply to payments for physician services under a plan contracted for under subsection (a).".

(b) The amendments made by subsection (a) shall apply with respect to claims submitted for payment for services provided on or after the first day of the first calendar year beginning after the date of enactment of this Act.

Mr. HILLIS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Indiana?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILLIS. Mr. Chairman, my amendment is aimed at improving a serious deficiency which developed in the CHAMPUS program after it was originally enacted in 1966.

The Armed Services Committee has been looking into the problems which have resulted in a gradual deterioration of military health care for active duty members, their dependents, and retired members and their dependents. Military hospitals across the country have had to curtail health care, particularly for dependents and the retired community, because of a shortage of physicians and other deficiencies which have plagued military medicine in recent years.

In rather sudden fashion, many beneficiaries found themselves with more limited medical care in military facilities or no medical care at all when services were curtailed. This situation caused many to turn to the CHAMPUS program for their medical problems, and in all too many instances, use of CHAMPUS became difficult and expensive.

For those of my colleagues who may not be aware of it, CHAMPUS is an acronym for the civilian health and medical program of the uniformed services, which is basically an extension of military health care for dependents of active duty personnel, retired members, and their dependents. The program affords an opportunity for health care in the civilian community on a cost-sharing basis. For example, after certain deductibles, a retired member pays 25 percent of the approved charges with the Government paying 75 percent.

Obviously there must be some method of arriving at charges to be approved for payment. Basically what happens is this: The system establishes a profile for each physician in a geographical area for given procedures, such as an appendectomy, which results in determining the average charge by that physician for each procedure.

Next, the charges by all physicians for that procedure in that area are laid out on a vertical scale from the lowest to the highest. The CHAMPUS program then goes up that scale to the 75th percentile and strikes a figure which represents the highest fee that will be approved for that procedure in that area.

It is the compilation of basic data and striking the fee at the 75th percentile which has created difficulties in CHAMPUS. First, compilation of the basic data has been delayed in some instances up to 2 years, which means that in some cases payment schedules are 2 years old. Second, many physicians refuse to agree to the charge at the level of the 75th percentile.

This amendment would seek to correct those problems. It would provide for payment up to the 90th percentile and would require fee schedules to be updated every 12 months. At one time CHAMPUS did allow payment at the 90th percentile and in some instances, had more timely fee schedules. Experiences under that formula indicated wider approval of the program and a great deal more satisfaction among beneficiaries.

The evil of the 75th percentile system is that the beneficiary is often required to pay far in excess of what the Congress intended when it set the CHAMPUS cost-sharing formula in 1966. At that time Congress mandated that retired people pay 25 percent of the charges for care in civilian facilities and 25 percent of the charges for outpatient care. A combination of charges above the 75th percentile and outdated fee schedules has resulted in patients paying up to 45 to 50 percent of the actual charges rather than the 25 percent as clearly intended by Congress. The same result has plagued dependents of active duty personnel when seeking care under CHAMPUS.

The Armed Services Committee has acted favorably on this legislation which was reported last November as H.R. 8647. However, due to the urgency of implementing its provisions and the expected crush of other legislation before the House, I thought it expedient to include the provisions with the fiscal year 1979 Department of Defense authorization bill as, I understand, was also done in the other body.

Mr. Chairman, I urge my colleagues to support this amendment to offer an early and significant improvement to CHAMPUS and at once illustrate that Congress is certainly not indifferent to attempts at erosion of military benefits.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILLIS. I yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. HILLIS) is a good one. I have had an opportunity to look it over. The committee gave the original bill its unanimous approval, so I see no reason why we would not be willing to accept this amendment.

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HILLIS. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I am happy to say that our side will accept the amendment also.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. HILLIS).

The amendment was agreed to.

(By unanimous consent, Mr. ICHORD yielded his time to Mr. DICKINSON.)

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. DICKINSON).

Mr. DICKINSON. Mr. Chairman, I rise for the purpose of asking my colleague and distinguished subcommittee chairman, Mr. ICHORD, a question regarding an Air Force research and development program titled the "engine model derivative program."

This program seeks to demonstrate and develop the growth potential in current operational military jet engines. Specifically, the program will provide for increases in the performance of current gas turbine engines to—

Permit higher thrust to weight ratios to be realized;

Decrease life-cycle costs;

Increase fuel efficiency; and Increase reliability and maintainability.

Simply stated, this is a jet engine product improvement program. Through this program, the Air Force is trying to squeeze that last 10 to 15 percent in performance out of existing inventory engines.

As the gentleman from Missouri knows, our R. & D. Subcommittee recommended terminating funding for this program because of the belief that industry should fund this effort out of its own funds in that industry would be the ultimate beneficiary of any increased Air Force business.

Since our markup, I have talked with the Air Force Systems Command and have discovered that engine development is an extremely costly endeavor and few contractors are willing to commit resources of this magnitude on speculation. Further, using independent research and development funds in pursuit of a program with the objectives of the engine model derivative program would insure a philosophy of the rich-get-richer since only those contractors with large military/commercial business could afford to invest in a program of this nature.

My question to the gentleman is simply this. Would the gentleman be willing to have the R. & D. Subcommittee review this additional information? Although the justification presented to the committee during our budget hearings was admittedly rather weak, I believe the subcommittee will find the Air Force actually has a well structured, eminently supportable program.

Mr. ICHORD. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, I would say to the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. DICKINSON) that I would be very pleased to review this program with him.

The gentleman will recall that the committee omitted the money primarily because it was an Air Force program and we thought it should be a joint Navy-Air Force program.

I would state to the gentleman that I personally am a great believer in product improvement, and I certainly am interested in getting as much use as we possibly can out of current inventory jet engines. In that regard I might mention that the thing of the future in engine development is in the field of ceramics for high temperature environments such as one experiences in a modern gas turbine engine. Right now metal matrix is ahead of ceramics.

Mr. Chairman, I would be anxious to delve deeper into this program to see if the Army, the Air Force, and the Navy plan to pursue this technology.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. SKELTON

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SKELTON: On page 27, immediately after line 23 insert the following new section:

"SEC. 702. (a) From the sum authorized to be appropriated to the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency pursuant to Section 701 of this act, the sum of $200,000 shall be used for a study of the special civil defense needs of areas which contain significant elements of the United States' strategic nuclear retaliatory forces.

(b) The study provided for in subsection (a) of this section shall include, but not be limited to, the following information:

(1) An identification of areas in the United States which because they contain significant elements of the United States' strategic nuclear retaliatory forces are prime targets in case of a nuclear attack.

(2) A determination of what civil defense evacuation and shelter plans and warning systems are now available or are proposed to be available to these areas.

(3) An evaluation of the effectiveness of these existing evacuation and shelter plans and warning systems.

(4) A determination of the feasibility of establishing more effective evacuation and shelter plans and warning systems for these areas, and a determination of the potential costs and methods of financing.

(5) A detailed analysis of the specific effects of a nuclear attack on each of these areas.

(6) A determination of the need for educating and the most effective methods of educating the public in these areas on civil defense matters.

(c) The study required by this section shall be complete, and copies filed with the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives, before April 1, 1979.

Mr. SKELTON (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this proposed amendment is to provide for a study of the special civil defense needs of areas in the United States which contain significant elements of the U.S. strategic nuclear retaliatory forces.

For instance, Missouri's Fourth Congressional District contains 150 intercontinental ballistic missiles (ICBM's). These missiles are saturated throughout the district. In some cases, the missiles are actually located in people's backyards, as was pointed out in a 1972 NBC television report.

This amendment should be adopted because of the following: 50 areas of the United States contain about 10 million people which are located in similar high risk or prime target areas. It is my opinion that these high-risk areas will be the first to receive a nuclear strike in case of an attack against the United States. This opinion is shared by the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency (DCPA). As of now, these 10 million people are virtually defenseless. It is my understanding that the immediate future holds little hope for truly effective protection in these 50 areas.

This study should be completed in order to—

First. Provide new facts and information about the prime target areas that are not now available.

Second. Learn what information is already available that can be made applicable to the special needs of these 10 million people. Available information should be funneled to a program or programs that are concerned with high risk areas.

The DCPA has informed me that some of the facts for which I am looking are available. However, this does not solve the problem. The information must be gathered with the knowledge that it possibly is going to be used for meeting the special protection needs of these 10 million people. Much of the information must be localized to these special areas.

For example, in response to my question about warning systems the DCPA sent me an answer which looked at the national warning system and a Missouri State warning system. One sentence went thusly:

The local warning points activate outdoor warning sirens and/or contact radio and television stations to alert the public of an attack or natural disaster.

I know for a fact that a large portion of the communities in my district do not have warning sirens. I also know for a fact that during the 1972 false alert when all radio and TV stations were given orders to go off the air because a nuclear attack was imminent * * * none in my district, to my knowledge, went off the air. My point is this * * * the DCPA information was of a national or at best a State nature. It needs to be on the level of all the 50 local areas.

Under my amendment, no additional authorization would be required. The study would be funded from money the Armed Services Committee has authorized DCPA for research and development.

The elements of the amendment are:

1. A determination of what civil defense evacuation and shelter plans and warning systems are now available or are proposed to be available to these areas.

2. An evaluation of the effectiveness of these existing evacuation and shelter plans and warning systems.

3. A determination of the feasibility of establishing more effective evacuation and shelter plans and warning systems for these areas, and a determination of the potential costs and methods of financing.

4. A detailed analysis of the specific effects of a nuclear attack on each of these areas.

5. A determination of the need for educating and the most effective methods of educating the public in these areas on civil defense matters.

Let us look at the humanistic side.

At this moment, the United States is paying $124 million to harden the ICBM silos at the Whiteman Air Force Base in Missouri. I do not disagree with the need to harden these silos. However, I cannot but help raise the following question: If my country can spend more than a tenth of a billion dollars on this project * * * why cannot it invest a lesser amount into protecting the lives of the half million people who live in this part of Missouri? They did not ask to be part of the high risk areas. Their property and lives are in a very special danger. For this sacrifice, I believe we should study the possibility of providing them with the protection they need.

Right now, the Federal Government is spending more money on hardening the missile silos in my district alone than it is spending on the entire fiscal year 1978 civil defense budget.

I believe these 50 areas of the Nation which contain the 10 million people all deserve this special study.

This map is compiled from two publications that are in the public domain. One source is found on page 50 of a Senate Subcommittee publication titled: Analyses of Effects of Limited Nuclear Warfare. It was printed in September of 1975. The same map can be found on page 21 of a Library of Congress publication titled: United States and Soviet City Defense. It was printed in August of 1976. The second source or publication in TR 82 which is published by the Defense Civil Preparedness Agency. It is titled: High Risk Areas. This is also in the public domain as all of the above are.

I urge the adoption of the Skelton amendment, as it will give us this much needed study of potential high risk areas. Thank you.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SKELTON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PRICE. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Chairman, the committee has had an opportunity to examine the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. SKELTON) and we are willing to accept it.

Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Chairman, I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri (Mr. SKELTON).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GARY A. MYERS

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARY A. MYERS: Page 35, line 10, strike out "and".

Page 35, line 15, strike out the period at the end thereof and insert in lieu thereof "; and".

Page 35, after line 15, insert the following:

(3) with respect to the procurement of specialty metals, or an article containing specialty metals, produced outside the United States or its possessions when such procurement is necessary to comply with agreements with foreign governments requiring the United States to purchase supplies from foreign sources for the purposes of offsetting sales made by the United States Government or United States firms under approved programs serving defense requirements or where such procurement is necessary in furtherance of the standardization and interoperability of equipment requirements within NATO so long as such agreements with foreign governments comply, where applicable, with the requirements of section 36 of the Arms Export Control Act and with section 814 of the Department of Defense Appropriation Authorization Act, 1976.

(c)(1) The Secretary of Defense shall conduct a study regarding the effects of subsection (b)(3) of this section—

(A) upon producers of specialty metals in the United States;

(B) upon producers of equipment for the Department of Defense; and

(C) upon the economy of the United States.

(2) Not later than one year after the date of the enactment of this Act, the Secretary of Defense shall submit a report to the Committees on Armed Services of the Senate and House of Representatives containing the findings and conclusions of the Secretary of Defense regarding such study.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is heard.

The Clerk continued the reading of the amendment.

Ms. HOLTZMAN (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I be allotted one-half my time at this time and reserve the balance for another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, this amendment would simply do two things. It would add to the section of the bill addressing the question of limited ability to purchase material through the special steel uses and add the present language that was in the 1978 appropriations bill. It would also require a study to be sent to the Congress on the impact of such language if in fact it is included in this bill.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, the committee has had no opportunity to even see this amendment or to study this amendment, so the committee opposes the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GARY A. MYERS).

The amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. WOLFF

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WOLFF: add on page 38 after line 9 the following:

SEC. 812. (a) The Department of Defense shall report to the Congress at the end of fiscal year 1979 what efforts it has taken during the fiscal year to formulate a productivity plan with respect to manpower needs and what efforts it has taken during the fiscal year to gather productivity data under that plan upon which to base manpower requests for subsequent fiscal year authorizations.

(b) The Department of Defense shall make such plan and data available to the Congress at the end of fiscal year 1979.

Mr. WOLFF (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOLFF. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to offer an amendment to the Department of Defense authorization bill for fiscal year 1979. This amendment would require the Department of Defense to report to the Congress at the end of fiscal year 1979 what efforts it has taken during the year to formulate a productivity plan with respect to manpower needs. Furthermore, it would require that the Department report to the Congress what efforts it has taken during the fiscal year to gather productivity data under any such plan which to base manpower requests for subsequent fiscal year authorizations. Finally, the Department would be required to make available to the Congress the actual plan and data themselves by the end of fiscal year 1979.

The rationale behind this amendment is clear and speaks to an ever growing concern of the American public. Simply stated, the public is worried about increasing spending and is demanding that whatever money is spent be governed by the admonition—distinguish between the essential and the excessive.

As we know, when Government spending is increased, the country runs two risks. First, if the spending results in a deficit, then there could very well be an adverse impact on the rate of inflation. Recent public opinion polls point out in stark terms the growing anxiety which Americans feel with respect to the high cost of living. Second, if the spending results in an increased budget, then taxes may have to be raised in order to avoid a deficit. I am sure that my colleagues have heard from their districts, as I have from mine, that taxes are already too high and that the people will not stand for more. Given these two unpalatable risks which we run as the result of increased Government spending, it is our responsibility in the Congress to insure that whatever money is spent be spent efficiently so as to reach for the greatest degree of productivity.

Of course, everyone favors efficiency as a goal. The real issue, then is can efficiency be achieved and how can it be done. A recent General Accounting Office report entitled "Improving Federal Agency Efficiency Through the Use of Productivity Data in the Budget Process" speaks directly to this issue. Although the report concedes that some types of activity are not quantifiable in terms of productivity under current methodologies, it clearly states:

It has been our experience, however, that these types of activities are a small part of the overall Government workload. Our work on the Federal productivity measurement system has shown that the majority of the Federal activities can be measured.

The report further states:

Productivity data is necessary for management to accurately determine the personnel and funds required to meet the organization's goals. Emphasizing productivity during budget preparation and approval can help ensure more efficient use of the Federal budget dollar.

Therefore, productivity data can be effectively utilized in the analysis of manpower requirements.

The concept of productivity data encompasses all measures of efficiency. This may take the form of productivity measurement data. which is the ratio of output to input measured against a predetermined base year. Or it may take the form of work measurement data, which is the comparison of output and input to a standard targeted performance. Efficiency could also be measured by unit cost data, which looks to the cost of producing a single unit of output. Finally, there are certainly other measures of productivity which can be developed in the future as aids to the budgetary process. As I have already indicated, I am aware that there may be some manpower requests to which productivity analysis is not suitable. Nevertheless, since productivity data can be helpful in the majority of cases, it is the Congress responsibility to see to it that the Department seeks to formulate a productivity plan with respect to manpower needs and seeks to implement that plan. This is what my amendment is intended to do.

I am hopeful that the effect of this amendment would be to emphasize throughout the budgetary process the concept of productivity regarding manpower needs. The GAO report spoke directly to the need for congressional initiative in encouraging the use of this data. In the words of the report:

The process of institutionalizing productivity improvements in the Federal Government is an area where much remains to be done. The use of productivity data as a management tool has been very sporadic, dependent mostly on motivation and commitment of individual managers. This process now needs to be revived by the top executive branch and congressional support.

Therefore, this amendment should strongly encourage the department to factor productivity data into its manpower requests, and should aid the Armed Services Committee in focusing on those requests during the review process.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, my amendment simply asks the Defense Department to strive to use productivity data in the formulating of manpower requests. Logic compels its use. The American people demand it.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOLFF. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I have read this amendment, and it does not entail any costs. However, we have not had much opportunity to study it. We will be willing to take this to conference and see what we can do and work with the other body.

Mr. WOLFF. I thank the Chairman.

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will yield, we will be happy to accept the amendment on this side.

Mr. WOLFF. I thank the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York (Mr. WOLFF).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. QUAYLE

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. QUAYLE: Page 33, strike out line 8 and all that follows through line 6, on page 34.

Redesignate the succeeding sections accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE) is recognized.

Mr. QUAYLE. Mr. Chairman, in 45 seconds it is going to be very difficult to explain this amendment.

It strikes section 806. What it does is to allow fair competition with DOD and the private contractors. DOD is the only Government agency now that has a special rating when it computes its costs.

Mr. Chairman, that is unfair. I do not think anybody, even the committee, will dispute the fact that it is unfair.

This amendment will do two things, one, save money; and two, allow small business to compete in DOD procurement. If this amendment is not adopted, we are going to see the continual decline of small business activity in DOD procurement. We are not going to help Boeing or any of the other big companies. We are just going to help small business people like laundry services.

Mr. Chairman, I urge support for the amendment.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, the committee, first, has not had any opportunity to study this amendment and would like to study it before we pass any judgment on it.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I have a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, with all due respect to the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE), I am not certain that he has time to speak now.

Has he not already consumed his time?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman's additional time was yielded to him by other Members.

The gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE) is recognized for 20 seconds more.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. I thank the Chairman.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, the committee urges rejection of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. BOB WILSON).

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to speak against the amendment.

We have had this provision of law for 1 year or 2 years. It was put in there primarily to prevent the abuses which the Government was engaging in with regard to contracting out. They were firing Federal employees and having the job contracted out at about 1½ or 2 times the expense. It is not a money-saving procedure at all. In fact, it is an expensive procedure if that is permitted.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I am very much opposed to this amendment and urge that it be rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. QUAYLE).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. QUAYLE) there were—ayes 37, noes 61.

So the amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. CORNWELL

Mr. CORNWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CORNWELL:

TITLE V—CIVILIAN PERSONNEL

Page 24, line 18; delete 1¼, and insert 2.

Mr. CORNWELL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to offer an amendment to increase the authority given to the Secretary of Defense to exceed the civilian manpower ceiling from 1¼ to 2 percent. This is a modest proposal, increasing by approximately 7500 the number of manpower billets which may be added when it is deemed to be in the national interest.

As you may remember, we are well below the 3 percent flexibility approved by the House during consideration of last year's Defense Authorization Act.

I believe that the discusison of the Dodd amendment made clear many of the problems associated with the civilian manpower ceiling. While such ceilings look good politically by implying efficient management of a tightly controlled civilian workforce, we have seen that the ceilings work in the reverse by compromising efficient management efforts. I am sure that each of my colleagues with an industrially funded activity in their district has seen the inhibition on valid employment caused by the manpower ceilings. Each of you is aware of the millions of taxpayer dollars squandered every year by installations in attempting to find means of meeting the manpower ceilings. Similarly, more millions of taxpayer dollars are wasted each year on the hundreds and probably thousands of Defense Department employees who do nothing but study and re-study installation manpower ceilings. It is not, however, my intention to turn this amendment into a referendum on the manpower ceilings' applicability to industrially funded activities. Rather, it is my hope that through passage of this amendment we will call further DoD attention to congressional concern that all defense civilian installations, and particularly industrially funded activities, be allocated sufficient manpower to meet their funded workloads.

I have already discussed the problems encountered at Crane Naval Weapons Support Center, an IFA in my district. Briefly, the manpower ceiling allocated the installation by the Navy was 360 billets below that needed to meet the funded workload. After weeks of disarray, the Navy finally decided to increase Crane's manpower ceiling by 120, but only if the slots could be taken away from another installation. Finally, a sacrificial shipyard was found, and Crane got its 120 slots. When we debated the increase in the endstrength flexibility last year, I and many of my colleagues stated that we hoped that an increase in the endstrength flexibility might put an end to, or at least ease, the defense agencies' practice of playing off one installation's manpower needs against another's. Unfortunately, the example at Crane shows that the Defense Department has not followed our intentions.

Further, the Senate has seen fit this year to approve an endstrength flexibility of only ½ percent in opposition to the administration's request to retain the 1¼ percent now in law. As such, passage of this amendment would send a message to the Senate that we aim to maintain the endstrength flexibility at its current level.

Until we either exempt IFA's from the manpower ceilings, or remove the ceilings on civilian personnel altogether, the long-term problems created by the ceilings will not be solved. We will continue to waste millions of taxpayer dollars supporting an inefficient management system that no responsible businessman would endorse. Until such time, it is necessary to provide a means of alleviating the rigidity of the ceiling policy and to urge the Defense Department to use that means to the best of its ability. It is in this light that I urge your support for my amendment.

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield.

Mr. CORNWELL. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Chairman, we are very happy with this amendment and accept it on this side.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CORNWELL. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, the committee will accept the amendment providing for the 2 percent.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Chairman, we will accept the amendment.

Mr. CORNWELL. Mr. Chairman, I urge support for the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana (Mr. CORNWELL).

The amendment was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. GARY A. MYERS

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARY A. MYERS: Page 38, after line 9, add the following new section:

RESTRICTION ON ABORTIONS

SEC. 812. (a) Chapter 55 of title 10, United States Code, relating to medical and dental care, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"1090. Restriction on abortions

"No abortion—

"(1) may be provided under the provisions of this chapter if, on the date on which such abortion would be performed, any law of the United States prohibits the use of Federal funds to perform such an abortion on any person entitled to medical assistance under any State plan approved under title XIX of the Social Security Act; or

"(2) may be paid for (A) under any contract entered into under section 1079 or 1086 of this title, or (B) under any other provision of this chapter if, on the date on which such abortion was performed, any law of the United States prohibited the use of Federal funds to perform such an abortion on any person entitled to medical assistance under any State plan approved under title XIX of the Social Security Act.".

(b) The table of sections at the beginning of chapter 55 of such title is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"1090. Restriction on abortions.".

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment in the name of the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GOODLING), whose amendment it is. His intent is simply to bring consistency to our present Federal policy on abortion.

I would also point out that last year some 11,000 abortions were performed in military hospitals and through the CHAMPUS program, at an expense of $5 million.

Ms. HOLTZMAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, for many reasons this is a highly objectionable amendment. It is also extremely dangerous to the well being of our Armed Forces.

There are over 117,000 women who now serve in the Armed Forces of this country. In addition, well over 50 percent of the men serving are married.

This amendment will have a serious and adverse impact on the ability of this country to recruit women into the voluntary army and to recruit men who are married. I think it undermines the security of this country.

In addition, I would like to point out that this amendment, contrary to what the gentleman from Pennsylvania says, imposes additional hardships on women that are not contained in the policy adopted by the Congress on medicaid abortions. I urge defeat of the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. GARY A. MYERS).

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. GARY A. MYERS. Mr. Chairman, I demand a recorded vote.

A recorded vote was refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. HANSEN

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HANSEN: On page 38, after line 9, add the following new section:

"SEC. 812. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, none of the funds authorized to be appropriated for the Department of Defense by this or any other Act shall be used directly or indirectly for the purpose of effecting any force reduction or base realignment in the Panama Canal Zone in support of implementation of the Panama Canal Treaties approved by the United States Senate in 1978 without specific Act of Congress."

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is very simple. As it was read, it simply provides:

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, none of the funds authorized to be appropriated for the Department of Defense by this or any other Act shall be used directly or indirectly for the purpose of effecting any force reduction or base realignment in the Panama Canal Zone in support of implementation of the Panama Canal Treaties approved by the United States Senate in 1978 without a specific Act of Congress.

Today's amendment is similar to House Concurrent Resolution 347 which has 240 cosponsors and states:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress of the United States that any right to, title to or interest in the property of the United States Government agencies in the Panama Canal Zone or any real property and improvements thereon located in the zone should not be conveyed, relinquished, or otherwise disposed of to any foreign government without specific authorization of such conveyance, relinquishment, or other disposition by an Act of Congress.

Today's amendment is also similar to H.R. 11201 which is supported by over 80 percent of the members of the House Armed Services Committee and states:

Be it enacted by the Senate and the House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, notwithstanding any other provision of law, no right, title, or interest of the United States in or to any real property located in the Canal Zone which on the date of the enactment of this Act is under the jurisdiction of the Secretary of a military department may be transferred or otherwise disposed of unless such transfer or disposal has been specifically authorized by Act of Congress enacted after the date of the enactment of this Act.

And finally, today's amendment is similar in purpose to my recent amendment to the first concurrent resolution on the budget designed to stop any slush funding of the Panama treaties which originally passed the House by a vote of 231 to 170 and which was finally accepted by both the House and the Senate in the conference report last week. This amendment declared an intent by Congress to eliminate the never-used $40,000,000 borrowing authority of the Canal company and bring the Panama budget closely under the scrutiny of the Congress so that there is no authority for transfer of funds or property in Panama without a specific act of Congress.

This is our opportunity to vote on the principle of House Concurrent Resolution 347, Mr. Chairman.

With the adventures of Castro's Cuba in exporting revolution and terrorism across the world, this is hardly the time to take lightly any efforts to withdraw

U.S. presence from the Caribbean and particularly the Canal Zone and I strongly urge the approval of this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Are there any Members on the list who wish to be heard on this amendment?

If not, the question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. HANSEN).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HANSEN) there were—ayes 61, noes 35.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. ASHBROOK).

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Chairman, there is one issue of overriding importance facing us today. That issue is the survival of our Nation.

Since the early 1960's our military strength relative to that of the Soviet Union has been declining. We have let military superiority slip from our grasp.

Any objective analysis will show the growing threat to our national security. The hard truth is that we are more vulnerable to a Soviet attack than ever before.

The Library of Congress has prepared an excellent analysis of the United States-Soviet military balance. According to that report: "American armed services possessed pre-eminent strength at the time of the Cuban military crisis in 1962. U.S. forces have registered many improvements since that time, but their relative decline when compared with Soviet counterparts has been dramatic."

The relative decline of U.S. military power has indeed been "dramatic." Under liberal pressure and influence our overall military strength has been undercut to the point where in 1978 we face a clear and present danger.

Today the U.S.S.R. would go into a confrontation with superiority in virtually every area. And the situation is rapidly growing worse. The Library of Congress analysis notes that even our intercontinental ballistic missiles are becoming vulnerable. It states:

Most authorities agree that Soviet ICBM's will pose substantial threats to Titan and Minuteman missiles in the 1980's. The key questions are not whether the Soviets could eventually crush them with a first strike, only when they could achieve that capability, and how seriously that situation affects U.S. security.

In other areas the Library of Congress study shows that the situation is the same. Our tactical air forces are in danger of being overwhelmed by massive numbers of Soviet aircraft. Our Navy is entering "an era of reduced options and reinforced risk." Our ground forces are a mere drop in the bucket compared with the vastly superior Soviet forces. Our overall military position vis-a-vis the Soviet Union is eroding.

In no area can we more clearly trace the decline of U.S. military superiority than in our basic declaratory policy. Let's look for a moment at the statements of our Government leaders over the past 25 years on U.S. military policy toward the Soviet threat and our own military capabilities.

Massive retaliation. In the 1950's our avowed policy was for massive retaliation against an enemy whether we were confronted with regional or local aggression of any type. We were clearly superior. In 1954 we had no throw weight in missiles but we had 1,500 B–47's and 500 B–52's. The U.S.S.R. had very few bombers and few missiles and the U.S.S.R. could not stand up in any type of confrontation. All this began to change with the McNamara policies of the 1960's.

Sure destruction policy (1965). The U.S.S.R. deployed a missile force after the Cuban missile crisis. The United States talked for the first time in terms of damage to our own population. Secretary McNamara began to phase out our bombers and at this point our superiority began to deterioriate.

Mutual assured destruction (announced by Secretary McNamara in 1967). The Soviets gained parity and for the first time they had more deployed throw weight in missiles than the United States. The U.S.S.R. clearly had momentum and we lost it. At this point the U.S.S.R. sought a SALT agreement on the grounds they could stop our ABM and MIRV while the liberals in the Congress were scuttling both and telling our people we could hold down the U.S.S.R. momentum by a SALT accord. Our imbalance got worse so we again changed our policies.

Strategic sufficiency (announced by President Nixon in 1969 at the U.N.). Suddenly we had passed to sufficiency, whatever that is, while the U.S.S.R. was rapidly moving ahead.

Essential equivalence (Secretary Schlesinger, 1974). This was the beginning of the whistling in the dark. The U.S.S.R. in the meantime had started a massive civil defense program, spending billions of dollars and circumventing the avowed purposes of the ABM treaty.

Rough equivalence (Secretary Rumsfeld, 1976). This policy was vague and couched in terms of hopes of what the United States could do rather than a firm statement of our ability to deter an aggressor.

More or less equal (Secretary Harold Brown, May 1977). At this point the Soviet Union is clearly superior, believes their civil defense is successful and that there is no way that we can deter them.

We have gone from a position of superiority to a situation where the United States has no real declaratory policy today. It is fair to say that our declaratory policies have followed our military realities. The military realities today are that we are falling behind and are in a very precarious position. The Library of Congress study summarizes the situation as follows:

Quantitative changes since the Cuban missile crisis favor the Soviet Union, with scattered exceptions. U.S. qualitative superiority, less pronounced than in the past, is slowly slipping away.

As it stands:

Mutual Assured Destruction seems less mutual than it was in the last decade.

Only about one-fourth of all U.S. divisions are free to contend with contingencies without undercutting U.S. capabilities in Europe.

The U.S. Navy is poorly prepared to cope with Soviet anti-ship cruise missiles, which severely constrain its mission capabilities.

The U.S. Merchant Marine could support small-scale contingencies, but even modest attrition from Soviet attacks would sap it quickly.

Emerging Soviet offensive strength is creating a new range of threats against NATO, whose forces cannot stand large losses.

America's land, sea, and air forces alike would be hard pressed to support NATO plans at existing levels and deal concurrently with large-scale diversions including those caused or sustained by the Kremlin in spots that contain U.S. life lines.

In short, current trends curtail U.S. freedom of action. The upshot abridges abilities of U.S. armed services to deter attacks on the United States, defend this country effectively if deterrence should fail, and safeguard associates whose security is closely linked with our own.

We cannot allow the present course of events to continue. If we are to make nuclear war more unthinkable, then we must have a superior defense. We must have a better air defense, we must have the B–1 offensive bomber. We must have the air-launched cruise missile (ALCM), we must have mobile land-based minutemen missiles, we must have the Trident submarine. We must move ahead with the cruise missile and develop antisatellite missiles. We must not yield the technological edge to our enemies.

Our goal must be to regain military superiority. This is the only way of assuring our ability to keep the peace and survive as a nation.

At this point in the RECORD I am including a statistical summary of the current United States-Soviet military balance as prepared by the Library of Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. DAN DANIEL).

Mr. DAN DANIEL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike the last word.

The fate of the United States and the future of our children and our children's children rests on small events. One such event is the action of this House today in approving the bill prepared by the Armed Services Committee. It should be obvious to the administration that rhetoric does not prevent the overthrow of governments or massacres like the one perpetrated in Zaire last week. This brings me to the second point I wish to make about national survival—faith.

How can we have faith in the utterances of the leaders of the Soviet Union today when we learned from the media that the Soviets started buying cobalt—most of which comes from Zaire—at least 6 months before the invasion and destruction of a vital mining area. The United States faces no impending shortage of cobalt; we have plenty for the time being. How much did the head Communist know about the impending slaughter of innocent men, women, and children in Zaire? The answer is obvious. The Soviet leaders who now rule in Angola knew before the start of the year that an invasion with subsequent destruction and massacre were planned.

These are the same despotic rulers we are told we must trust to live up to the terms of a SALT Treaty and of a Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty. Let us just consider two items, one from each projected treaty.

We have been told by aviation experts—not the disarmers—time after time that the Soviet Backfire bomber can reach the United States and drop nuclear weapons on us. Our nonexpert disarmament negotiators say they do not think Backfire can reach the United States. They expect to get a note from Papa Brezhnev saying he will keep all the Backfire aimed at Iran, so we will not have to worry.

During hearings on a possible comprehensive test ban, we were told that there was a nuclear weapon yield threshold below which the Soviets could test without the United States verifying or proving that they were testing. Such actions—no tests by the United States, tests by the Soviets—would destroy the credibility, and probably the actual effectiveness of our nuclear weapons stockpile in some 5 years or so.

We are told by our disarmament experts that we do not have to worry. The Soviets would fear world opinion. In other words, my distinguished colleagues, we must have faith that the Soviets will not cheat on a comprehensive test ban.

Mr. Chairman, I have no faith in Soviet promises. I have very little faith in the Soviets adhering to the terms of treaties they sign, if they feel an obvious transgression suits their national purpose or if they can violate treaty provisions with little chance of the violation being proved.

It has been obvious for years that the only thing the Soviets fear is modern weapons—such as the enhanced radiation weapon—and the will of a nation with modern weapons to call their hand on adventures such as the one in Cuba in the 1960's.

Mr. Chairman, unless we start to rebuild a collective national will, backed by modern arms, we are going to be in the unenviable position of taking advice from the Soviets, not giving it to them.

We must rekindle the faith we had in America as a world leader or our fate will be decided for us.

I strongly support the committee bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS).

AMENDMENT OFFERED BY MR. MATHIS

Mr. MATHIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MATHIS: Add the following new section to Title VIII—General Provisions:

"AUTHORITY TO PROTECT MILITARY PERSONNEL STATIONED OVERSEAS AGAINST DEVALUATIONS IN THE DOLLAR

"SEC. 814. Chapter 17 of title 37, United States Code, is amended by adding the following new section:

" 'SEC. 908. Without regard to the monetary limitations of this title, the regular military compensation available to military personnel stationed overseas shall, under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Defense, be periodically adjusted to reflect any changes since January 1 1977, in the rate of exchange between the dollar and the official currency of the country in which such personnel is stationed, except that in no case shall such compensation be adjusted below that payable on the date of enactment of this section.' "

Mr. MATHIS (during the reading). Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

PARLIAMENTARY INQUIRY

Mr. MATHIS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MATHIS. Mr. Chairman, due to the fact that the gentleman from Georgia had this amendment printed previously in the RECORD, is the gentleman entitled to the full 5 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. The answer is that under the rules the gentleman is entitled to the 5 minutes, yes.

Mr. MATHIS. Mr. Chairman, the amendment I am offering would require that the regular military compensation now being paid to personnel stationed overseas be increased to offset the decline in the value of the dollar since January 1, 1977. Once this adjustment is made, regular military compensation would float with the dollar in the international exchange markets. The amendment does not provide backpay to compensate for losses already sustained. It provides that, upon enactment, compensation in terms of the foreign currency will be the same as it was as of January 1, 1977. Thereafter, such compensation would fluctuate with the dollar.

Since the devaluation of the dollar in 1971, and the subsequent floating of the dollar in March of 1973, the value of the dollar in relation to other world currencies has gone up and down. Taken as a whole, the other currencies have declined somewhat against the dollar since 1973. However, beginning last year, the dollar has declined steadily in relation to many of these currencies, particularly the German mark and Japanese yen.

The 230,000 U.S. servicemen stationed in West Germany have seen the price of the mark increase by 11 percent since last year. The 50,000 in Japan have experienced a dramatic 28-percent increase in the price of the yen. As a result, military personnel in these countries now receive less compensation, in terms of marks and yen, than they received on January 1, 1977. The purchasing power of the mark and yen in the local economies has also declined at rates of 4 and 5 percent, respectively, due to inflation in these countries. The combined effects of a falling dollar and local inflation have seriously eroded the standard of living of military personnel serving in Japan and Germany. Members of the armed services already have the same inflationary forces to contend with as other Americans and should not have to bear the added burden of international dollar devaluation. I might add that an additional 75,000 servicemen serve in Britain, the Philippines, and South Korea, where the value of the dollar has also fallen.

The Department of Defense provides cost of living allowances for servicemen stationed in some countries, but this is not enough to compensate for dollar devaluation and local inflation. More importantly, over 100,000 military men and women in Germany and Japan get no such allowance.

Mr. Chairman, I believe this amendment will provide some of the assistance needed by our servicemen overseas and I urge its adoption.

Mr. NICHOLS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS).

Mr. Chairman, I must, with some hesitation, rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS) although I strongly agree with his intent.

Let me point out that the Subcommittee on Military Compensation is presently hearing testimony on this situation from representatives of the Department of Defense and we hope to have representatives from the noncommissioned officers and enlisted men who have just returned from Germany and Japan to testify before our committee. These witnesses have expressed general satisfaction with the present system of station allowances. In other words, the housing allowance and cost of living allowance. They admitted, however, that the system could be improved. As the subcommittee continues its deliberations it is quite possible that it will recommend a change as substantial as that suggested in the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS).

However, I would like to point out that the present system has certain advantages over those contained in the amendment. First, the current station allowances are adjusted whenever the cost of living increases by 2 percent, or the housing cost increases by 5 percent. However, the costs incurred by the member may change as a result of more than the devaluation of the dollar. For example, some of the factors that are included in the adjustment procedures are the, one, trends in the cost of living and exchange rates; two, the differences in leases available to new arrivals; three, increases in the general cost of living overseas compared to that in the United States, and four, anticipated increases in the cost of housing, utilities, and other expenses. Further, action may be suspended if the dollar is improving, and doubts are resolved in favor of the member. In other words, if the member's compensation is tied only to changes in the exchange rate, he may suffer as a result of such occurrences as a general increase in rents in a particular area.

Much remains to be done, and this is recognized by the Subcommittee on Military Compensation but the service member I think in the long run will be better off if the solution to his problems is addressed within the context of an overall package.

Mr. Chairman, I must oppose this amendment on a procedural ground, even though I support the basic objective of the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NICHOLS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MITCHELL of New York. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS). The intent of the gentleman's amendment is commendable because there are various serious problems being experienced by our servicemen who are stationed abroad. However, as the chairman of the Subcommittee on Military Compensation of the Committee on Armed Services, the gentleman from Alabama (Mr. NICHOLS) has so clearly pointed out, our committee, and other committees, are holding hearings, and the cost-of-living allowance of those stationed overseas is working reasonably well in most areas, but, there are other factors that we are looking into that are even more important, such as traveling expenses and housing costs for junior enlisted men, who have to obtain loans so that they can secure a home to move into, and these factors are being reexamined, because these things occur immediately upon these people reaching their overseas areas and it presents a difficult problem.

As I indicated before, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS) is a good one, but it is a rather piecemeal attempt to solve a very complex problem. As I say, we are in the process of studying this in every detail and I therefore must oppose the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. MATHIS).

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MATHIS) there were—ayes 13, noes 74.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LEDERER. Mr. Chairman, I rise today to caution the Congress against unnecessary delays in the Navy SLEP program to overhaul the fleet of aircraft carriers essential to the defense of the Nation.

The Armed Services Committee measure passed today requires the Secretary of the Navy to submit a report on the Navy's decision to overhaul the first of these carriers in the naval shipyard at Philadelphia, Pa. The Navy's decision was made after lengthy consultation with Members of Congress and the committees concerned. The decision of the Navy that the job can be done cheaper and better in Philadelphia is sound.

I understand that the Secretary of the Navy will submit a report on the SLEP placement to the Congress shortly in response to previous congressional requests. I urge my colleagues not to delay this vital carrier program any more than is needed. While we as Representatives have a right and a duty to oversee such expenditures, we also must act in the overall interests of the Nation. In this case, I believe the decision of the Navy should not be unwarrantedly delayed.

● Mr. GIAIMO. Mr Chairman, the Budget Committee does not generally comment on authorization bills, which do not directly result in providing budget authority. However, because of the special interest of the House in the budget request for national defense, I would like to set forth the budget perspective on this bill.

First, let me state the exact purpose of this bill. H.R. 10929, the defense appropriation authorization bill authorizes the Congress to appropriate funds for fiscal year 1979 for the procurement of aircraft, missiles, naval vessels, tracked combat vehicles, torpedoes and other weapons; all research development, test and evaluation for the Armed Forces; and civil defense.

This bill also prescribes the authorized personnel ceilings for Active and Reserve Forces and for civilian employment. It does not provide funding for these personnel ceilings.

This bill covers only 28 percent of the funding requested by the President for function 050 national defense.

It does not provide budget authority. It simply authorizes the Congress to appropriate funds for procurement and research and development of major weapons systems.

The Members of the House are all too familiar with the difficulties we had over the past few weeks passing our first budget resolution for fiscal year 1979. Many of the difficulties we had revolved around the target for function 050 national defense. We finally approved a target of $128.7 billion for budget authority, which is $300 million higher than the President's request.

Since this bill does not provide budget authority, there is no specific target under the Budget Resolution assigned to the Armed Services Committee. Rather these items are included in the targets assigned to the Appropriations Committee. The House Appropriations Committee, in subdividing its spending targets as required by section 302(b) of the Budget Act will set the budget authority target level for the Defense Subcommittee.

The Budget Committee, of course, is keenly interested in the program levels set by authorization bills, and it fully understands the significant pressures which can be generated for funding once programs are established by law. On the other hand, the committee recognizes that authorization bills generally set program ceilings and authorized appropriations are often below the authorized levels. In fact, in the last 4 years, on the average, final appropriations for the items in this bill have been $1.8 billion below the authorized amount.

However, if appropriations were made as authorized in this bill and no other changes were made in the "non authorized" portion of the Defense budget, the target would be exceeded by $2.1 billion above the comparable estimate in the resolution.

I recognize that some adjustments to these totals will occur, either as a result of House consideration or as a result of conference or during the appropriations process. If proper adjustments are not made, then we will have a significant problem meeting our targets for Defense. However, the proper time for the Budget Committee to address this problem is during consideration of the appropriations bill for fiscal year 1979.●

● Mr. VANIK. Mr. Chairman, as we consider a portion of the defense budget, I would like to discuss some potentially harmful effects of increased defense spending. The Department of Defense Authorization Act, H.R. 10929, would allocate about $37.9 billion for fiscal year 1979 for procurement, research, and development of new weapons. It represents a total increase of $1.05 billion over the defense allocation for fiscal year 1978. Although increased military spending does create new jobs in certain areas of the Nation, primarily the Sun Belt States, some argue that more jobs would be created if the money were directed toward private spending or other Government agencies. Thus, when military spending is increased, many jobs in other areas of the Nation are forgone. I am particularly concerned about this loss of jobs, since Ohio, and many other States, suffer a negative impact from the increased military spending despite shouldering a disproportionate share of the Federal tax burden.

In 1978, the Public Interest Research Group in Michigan (PIRGIM), published an update of "The Empty Pork Barrel," a report which argues that military spending actually decreases employment. The report states:

> Sixty percent of the U.S. public live in states which suffer a net loss of jobs every time the military budget goes up.

According to the report, more jobs are lost than gained due to increased military spending for two reasons. First, because increased military allocations are primarily used to purchase expensive equipment and large quantities of raw materials, they cannot be directed toward the hiring of people. If military allocations were spent in the private sector of the economy, more jobs would be created. In other words, Department of Defense spending goes to mostly capital intensive industry rather than labor-intensive work. Second, other Government agencies and departments have the capacity to hire more people per dollar spent than the Defense Department. Thus, if the money spent for defense were directed toward other areas of Government, more jobs would be created.

The PIRGIM study demonstrated that Ohio ranked fourth, with an average of approximately 136,000 jobs forgone annually between 1970 and 1974, in order of negative impact of military spending. The three States ranking above Ohio in the study were New York, Illinois, and Michigan. For the period studied, military spending was found to have a negative effect on certain geographical areas of the Nation: the New England States, where about 41,500 jobs were forgone, the Middle Atlantic States, where about 392,000 jobs were foregone, the East North Central States, where about 572,000 jobs were forgone, the Great Plains States, where about 56,900 jobs were forgone, and the East South Central States, where about 43,000 jobs were forgone. Overall, the United States experienced a net annual loss of jobs on the average between 1970 and 1974.

Geographically, the States which experienced a net job gain for military spending form a band extending from Maryland, south to Georgia, west to California and north to Washington State. Thus, increased military spending benefits certain areas of the Nation, particularly the Sun Belt, while other areas, especially the industrial Northeast and Midwest, experience a decrease in the total number of available jobs.

The Northeast-Midwest Research Institute and the Coalition of Northeast Governors Policy Center's study on military spending further enforce the finding that some areas benefit more greatly than others. The study indicates that the Northeast and Midwest sections of the country account for about 45 percent of the population while they only account for about 20 percent of the military installations and 17 percent of the wage and salary disbursements.

It is time for a closer look at the nature and effect of defense spending. If it will continue to be directed into certain favored sections of America without economic justification, the base of support may suffer critical erosion.●

● Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, the Hillis amendment is aimed at improving a serious deficiency in CHAMPUS, which has developed since the program was originally enacted in 1966.

The amendment would establish a ceiling for payments to physicians at the 90th percentile of the customary charge made for similar services in the same geographical area instead of at the 75th percentile and would require the customary charge profiles to be updated every 12 months.

After extensive hearings in the Armed Services Committee on Health Care, I am convinced that the remedies provided by this amendment will go far to reestablish CHAMPUS as a viable and effective health care program for military dependents and retired personnel. That development is particularly important at a time when health care in military medical facilities is in extreme difficulty due to a critical shortage of physicians and support services.

We know from experience that when physicians could be paid up to the 90th percentile of customary charges and when fee schedules were more current than at present, that the program was working as Congress intended. That is, the patient paid no more than the share of the cost contained in the cost-sharing formula. Unhappily, at the present time instead of the retired patient paying 25 percent of the bill as was intended by the Congress, the excess cost must also be paid by the patient which sometimes results in sharing 45 to 50 percent of the total bill.

The Armed Services Committee has acted favorably on this legislation. However, due to the urgency of implementing its provisions, I believe it is expedient to include the provisions with the fiscal year 1979 Department of Defense authorization bill.

I urge my colleagues to support this amendment.●

The CHAIRMAN. Are there further amendments?

If not, the question is on the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute, as amended.

The committee amendment in the nature of a substitute as amended, was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule, the Committee rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore (Mr. WRIGHT) having assumed the chair, Mr. ROSTENKOWSKI, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union, reported that that Committee having had under consideration the bill (H.R. 10929) to authorize appropriations during the fiscal year 1979, for procurement of aircraft, missiles, naval vessels, tracked combat vehicles, torpedoes, and other weapons, and research, development, test and evaluation for the Armed Forces, and to prescribe the authorized personnel strength for each active duty component and of the Selected Reserve of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces and of civilian personnel of the Department of Defense, to authorize the military training student loads, and to authorize appropriations for civil defense, and for other purposes, pursuant to House Resolution 1188, he reported the bill back to the House with an amendment adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment to the committee amendment in the nature of a substitute adopted by the Committee of the Whole? If not, the question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and the Speaker pro tempore announced that the ayes appeared to have it.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The vote was taken by electronic device, and there were—yeas 319, nays 67, not voting 48, as follows:

AuCoin	Jeffords	Simon
Baucus	Kasten	Sisk
Bonker	Kazen	Staggers
Breckinridge	Krueger	Teague
Burke, Calif.	Lent	Thornton
Burton, Phillip	Luken	Tucker
Byron	McKay	Ullman
Chisholm	Miller, Calif.	Vander Jagt
Clawson, Del	Moakley	Vanik
Cochran	Nix	Young, Alaska
Dodd	Rodino	Young, Tex.

The Clerk announced the following pairs:

On this vote:

Mr. Flippo for, with Mr. Moakley against.

Mr. Shipley for, with Mr. Miller of California against.

Mr. Ammerman for, with Mrs. Burke of California against.

Mr. Teague for, with Mr. Phillip Burton against.

Mr. Staggers for, with Mrs. Chisholm against.

Until further notice:

Mr. AuCoin with Mr. Baucus.
Mr. Florio with Mr. Garcia.
Mr. Runnels with Mr. Sisk.
Mr. Byron with Mr. Krueger.
Mr. Applegate with Mr. Dodd.
Mr. Ullman with Mr. Breckinridge.
Mr. Vanik with Mr. Del Clawson.
Mr. Alexander with Mr. Downey.
Mr. Kazen with Mr. Bonker.
Mr. McKay with Mr. Nix.
Mr. Rooney with Mr. Rose.
Mr. Simon with Mr. Thornton.

Mr. Archer with Mr. Anderson of Illinois.
Mr. Goodling with Mr. Cochran of Mississippi.
Mr. Jeffords with Mr. Kasten.
Mr. Lent with Mr. Luken.
Mr. Vander Jagt with Mr. Sarasin.

So the bill was passed.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize appropriations for fiscal year 1979 for procurement of aircraft, missiles, naval vessels, tracked combat vehicles, torpedoes, and other weapons and for research, development, test and evaluation for the Armed Forces, to prescribe the authorized personnel strength for each active duty component and the Selected Reserve of each Reserve component of the Armed Forces and for civilian personnel of the Department of Defense, to authorize the military training student loads, to authorize appropriations for civil defense, and for other purposes."

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill just passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

There was no objection.

TRIBUTE TO HON. MELVIN PRICE, CHAIRMAN OF THE COMMITTEE ON ARMED SERVICES, ON PASSAGE OF H.R. 10929

(Mr. BOB WILSON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute.)

Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I just want to say a word or two about our chairman.

I think he did a magnificent job on a very difficult bill this afternoon. He is a very kind, patient, real gentleman; and in the face of what I think were some very snide remarks made about the committee, his point of view prevailed very strongly, much stronger than it did last year.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I just want to compliment him on his leadership of the committee.

As we know, there was a group of dissenting views in the committee report by two or three members of the committee, who said some things that were very unkind about the committee. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on Armed Services has not "run amok." It has not "slipped its moorings." It has not "lost its bearings." It has not "stripped its gear." It has not "gone off its trolley." It has not "flipped its wig."

Mr. Speaker, I would say CARR stripped its gear and ran out of gas. That is what really happened today.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I thank the chairman for what he did.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOB WILSON. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I would just like to pay tribute to our chairman, too.

I think he has done an outstanding job, and certainly the quick way in which the gentleman from Illinois went through this legislative procedure is a tribute to him. We had a substitute amendment out of the way quickly, which was also a tribute not only to his skill but to the affection which all the Members hold for him.

Mr. PRICE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I want to thank the gentleman from California (Mr. BOB WILSON), the gentleman from New York (Mr. STRATTON), every member of our committee, and every Member of the House for their cooperation and help over the past several days.

I think that the work of the committee is rewarding enough for anyone, and I am grateful to the staff of the committee and to everyone who participated in bringing out what I think is a very good bill. I am sure, like all pieces of legislation, our job will be that much easier when we go through the conference process.

REPORT ON PROCEEDINGS AGAINST HANCHO C. KIM

Mr. FLYNT, from the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct, submitted a privileged report (Rept. No. 95-1214) on the proceedings of the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct against Hancho C. Kim, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered to be printed.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, which was ordered to be printed:

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 24, 1978.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I hereby submit the annual compilation of personal financial disclosure statements filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives pursuant to House Rule XLIV, as amended by House Resolution 287, March 2, 1977.

This compilation contains the personal financial disclosure statements filed by all Members of the House subject to House Rule XLIV and includes the financial transactions as reported therein which occurred between October 1, 1977 and December 31, 1977.

House Rule XLIV, pt. A, clause 1, provides that the annual compilation of reports filed with the Clerk be printed as a House Document by June 1, 1978 and by June 1 of each year thereafter. In concurrence with the Committee on Standards of Official Conduct and the Select Committee on Ethics, this initial compilation is submitted accordingly.

With kind regards, I am,

Sincerely,

EDMUND L. HENSHAW, Jr.,
Clerk, House of Representatives.

PERMISSION FOR COMMITTEE ON MERCHANT MARINE AND FISHERIES TO FILE REPORT

Mr. EVANS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Merchant Marine and Fisheries may have until midnight tonight to file a report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. KILDEE). Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

Mr. PRESSLER. Mr. Speaker, due to previous commitments I was unable to be present for the complete consideration of H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act.

Had I been present, I would have voted as follows:

Rollcall No. 335, an amendment by Mr. YOUNG, "no."

Rollcall No. 336, an amendment by Mr. MEEDS, "no."

Rollcall No. 337, to resolve into the Committee of the Whole, "yes."

Rollcall No. 338, an amendment by Mr. SANTINI, "no."

Rollcall No. 339, a motion to recommit, "no."

Rollcall No. 340, on final passage, "yes."

BRZEZINSKI'S WORDS ON RED CHINA

(Mr. RUDD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. RUDD. Mr. Speaker, President Carter's National Security Adviser wrote in Newsweek magazine following President Nixon's 1972 trip to Red China that such a trip would "be short on tangibles and concretes."

He also warned that any closer relations with the Communist dictatorship of Mainland China must also take into consideration "the tangible concerns of our existing friends"—namely, the Republic of China, Japan, the Philippines, Indonesia, Australia, and New Zealand.

Mr. Speaker, the Arizona Republic has brought attention to these former words of Zbigniew Brzezinski, in connection with his own current trip to Peking.

I hope that Mr. Brzezinski and the administration will heed his own early warnings about closer U.S. relations with Red China. I would like to include the Arizona Republic editorial at this point in the RECORD:

ZBIG'S WIDER VIEW

"I rather suspect," wrote Zbigniew Brzezinski in Newsweek magazine for Feb. 14, 1972, "that Mr. Nixon's trip to China will turn out much like a fortune cookie; it will be pleasant, it will hold out promise, but it will be short on tangibles and concretes."

Now, six years later, Brzezinski is representing President Jimmy Carter on a similar trip to Peking. Since he allowed no reporters to go with him, the president's national security adviser can control all information about his mission.

So it is a reasonable assumption that the fortune cookie analogy won't be made this time. Perhaps it would be better to compare the trip to a cream puff.

In commenting on the Nixon trip Brzezinski asked, back in 1972, whether the mission couldn't have been accomplished by the secretary of state. Well, the Carter administration sent Secretary of State Cyrus Vance to Peking last August and he came back saying only the visit had "created more understanding" about the problems in the way of the "normalization" of relations between Red China and the United States.

We look forward to the same sort of a generalized statement from the national security adviser. For much as he may want to make book with the Chinese communists, the geopolitical realities are against him.

In his Newsweek piece Brzezinski wrote: "The point to bear in mind as the President travels to Peking is that the dialogue with the Chinese—historic, long overdue, vital and in ways risky—cannot become a substitute for a wide Pacific policy, one that focuses on the tangible concerns of our existing friends."

Those existing friends are Japan, Nationalist China, the Philippines, Indonesia, Australia and New Zealand. Only a fool would endanger those friendships—with their commercial, political and military implications—for the doubtful gains of normalizing relations with Communist China.

SPECIAL OLYMPICS AND PRISONER REHABILITATION: A CHANCE TO SHOW WE CARE

(Mr. QUIE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, I want to call to the attention of my colleagues a letter they have already received but may not have read. It is about a special athletic event where everybody is a winner and which deserves our strong support.

Some 300 handicapped individuals from the District of Columbia, Maryland, and Virginia gather at the Lorton Correctional Facility on June 24 for the fourth annual special Olympics games. You have received an invitation to a fundraising event for Friday evening, June 23, at Constitution Hall. The featured performer is Ben Vereen, whom most of you know from the broadway hit "Pippin" and more recently as the actor who played the role of Chicken George in the television saga "Roots."

I urge all of my colleagues to take part in this very special performance, the proceeds of which will benefit the handicapped and will help rehabilitate the incarcerated.

Specifically, funds are earmarked for the mentally retarded children of Special Olympics, Inc. The athletic event, created in 1968 by the Joseph P. Kennedy Foundation, has become the largest program of sports-health activities for the handicapped in the world reaching more than 1,000,000 handicapped persons. Special Olympics sets a special goal. The goal is not to win, although each person tries. No time is too slow, no distance is too great, no challenge is too small. No records are ever broken, except those for courage, determination, and sportsmanship. Special Olympics is a program that gives the less fortunate a feeling of glory, satisfaction, and personal worth. It allows the handicapped to show others what they can do.

The handicapped have always been told, "You can't do it." Special Olympics says: "You can do it. All you need is a chance."

The balance of funds will go to support on-going projects to help residents at Lorton become rehabilitated.

Society has spent millions of dollars over the years but has largely failed to correct the offender or provide permanent protection to society. Funds will be used to identify the most effective rehabilitation programs for the incarcerated as they begin returning to their communities as useful citizens.

We in Congress often deal with legislation affecting the handicapped and the incarcerated. Let me say, however, that legislation passed by Congress can only go so far. More needs to be done. The special event on Friday, June 23, is one way in which all of us can help those who are less fortunate.

I urge you to show your strong, enthusiastic support. If we take the lead, others will follow.

JARVIS-GANN IS A WARNING TO GOVERNMENTS EVERYWHERE THAT HIGH TAXES WILL NOT BE TOLERATED

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. KEMP) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, as election day in California rapidly approaches, interest in the Jarvis-Gann initiative throughout the United States grows daily, which is but a manifestation of growing concern.

There is no question about it. State governments everywhere are scared. And no State government is more scared than the California State government.

At a stroke, the Jarvis-Gann amendment would massively cut property taxes in California by holding taxes to 1 percent of assessed valuation. The fear among government officials, of course, is that this will cut their tax revenues by this amount, leaving them with less of the taxpayer's money to squander on pet projects.

As a supporter of the Jarvis-Gann initiation I believe that the issues in the debate have been misrepresented by both supporters and opponents of the amendment, but particularly the opponents.

The principal issue is not really that taxes are too high, but that they are rising steadily and quickly without any action by government to increase tax rates. This is because inflation increases the nominal value of property just as it increases nominal incomes, thereby requiring taxes to be paid on "phantom" or inflated gains. In California many homes have doubled or tripled in market value in just a few years, meaning that taxes have often increased by a similar amount.

Although Jarvis-Gann is aimed at correcting the insidious increase in property taxes, it is actually the income tax which is most to blame for the great increase in total taxation in California. This is because California State income tax rates are steeply graduated, just as New York State and Federal tax rates are. This means that as one's nominal income increases, even though there is no change in purchasing power, taxes go up more than proportionately. At the Federal level, Federal income tax revenues go up 1.6 percent for every 1 percent increase in the consumer price index. A similar ratio holds for California income taxes as well but probably as much or twice as much.

Thus California has been blessed with a bonanza of tax revenues every year which has allowed it to spend money on a myriad of projects which the voters would surely never approve if they required a legislated tax increase. But despite the growth in government spending the State has still managed to run massive surpluses. The result is that California now has more than $4 billion in surplus funds.

I would certainly prefer to see a constitutional amendment in California and New York and even in the United States which would deal with the increase in income taxes rather than property taxes, since I believe the problem is much worse in this area. But in any case, there is no reason why the surplus revenues from the income tax could not be used to offset lost property tax revenues. The fact that the State legislature failed to deal with this problem except under pressure from Jarvis-Gann does not speak well for the leadership of government in California. Something should have been done about this problem long ago, but in California, as at the Federal level, government officials always think they know best how to spend our money.

Actually, the situation is even more perverse than it seems, for it is not necessary for government to have high tax rates in order to get an adequate amount of revenue. As I have often noted before with regard to income tax rates, high marginal tax rates discourage so much work and investment and create so much of an incentive to find ways of avoiding taxation that they actually bring in less revenue than lower rates would. This follows from the simple observation that there are always two tax rates, or prices, which will bring in the same revenue: high rates on a small base or low rates on a large base.

Income tax rates, both in California and on the Federal level, clearly are in the former situation, where a reduction in rates would lead to such an expansion of the tax base that no revenue would be lost. The fact is that property tax rates may be in the same situation. In other words, Jarvis-Gann may not necessarily result in anything close to the massive revenue losses predicted by its opponents.

As noted by Prof. Neil Jacoby of UCLA and Prof. Arthur Laffer of USC, high property tax rates have had a very depressing effect on building in California, not only for new structures but for expansion and improvement of existing structures as well. The result is that Jarvis-Gann will certainly lead to an increase in building and renovation, an expansion of the economy, which will cause an expansion of the tax base, leading thus to higher revenues.

In conclusion, Jarvis-Gann is not the perfect tax reduction proposal, but it's a good proposal which deals with a real problem and deserves support. I would strongly urge all Californians to support the Jarvis-Gann initiative. Furthermore, I would urge all government leaders to pay close attention to the support Jarvis-Gann has acquired and realize that this is not an isolated case, but the leading edge of a taxpayer revolt which is spreading throughout the country. The California State government has responded by putting enormous pressure on businesses and community leaders throughout the State to publicly oppose Jarvis-Gann. If Jarvis-Gann loses it will be because of this pressure and because government officials at all levels have been extremely irresponsible in projecting the consequences of its passage. The fact is that no essential State services will be cut. The State surplus and the expansion of the property tax base ought to leave revenues right about where they are now.

Sooner or later government must learn that it is the servant of the people and not their master. If Jarvis-Gann accomplishes no other purpose perhaps it will make some politicians realize this fact.

The following essay by Jude Wanniski from this morning's Wall Street Journal reiterates many of these points, and I commend it to my colleagues:

THE CALIFORNIA TAX REVOLT

(By Jude Wanniski)

SACRAMENTO.—There is a raw edge to life in California these last days of May, a rising sense of quiet panic as June 6 approaches—Election Day, the day Californians finally come to grips with Proposition 13, the exhilarating adventure in democracy arranged by Howard Jarvis.

The name Jarvis is everywhere. As you travel from one end of the state to the other, you fairly swim in Jarvis, a vast, boiling sea of anxiety and debate. The name, which belongs to a 75-year-old tax crusader, is probably uttered a dozen times a day by every citizen of the state over the age of 10.

If you don't know by now, Mr. Jarvis is cosponsor of a ballot initiative that would limit property taxes to 1% of market value and limit reassessment increases to 2% a year as long as the property isn't sold. The initiative also would require a two-thirds majority in state and local governments to enact new taxes of any kind. The other cosponsor of the measure is Paul Gann, a 65-year-old former real estate salesman. The initiative is known nationally as the Jarvis-Gann amendment, but here in California they simply refer to it as "Jarvis."

Conditions in California are perfect for a tax revolt. First, because of the nature of the tax mechanism in the state, the dollar inflation manufactured in Washington has a pecular impact on California. Second, the political class has failed to understand the flaws in the mechanism and how they automatically produce oppression. Last and most important, there is in California the avenue of the initiative. The people themselves can force their representatives to act more correctly, not out of a sense of obligation, but for sheer political survival.

Here, to begin with, are some numbers. California state and local governments spend roughly $40 billion. Local governments rely chiefly on the property tax, expected to yield $12 billion in the year starting July 1. Should Proposition 13 pass, property tax receipts would drop to about $5 billion. The $7 billion loss has inspired a general hysteria among local public officials and employes, who foresee a wholesale closing of schools and contraction of public services.

DEEP CLOVER

On the other hand, the state is in deep clover. In a "progressive" moment when he was governor, Ronald Reagan scaled the personal income-tax rates up to 11%. In the last several years of inflation, Californians have been propelled into these higher tax brackets, with a river of tax revenues flowing into Sacramento. Even after merry spending, with big raises for themselves and state employes, the legislators saw the surplus grow. With a modicum of frugality, the $4 billion surplus could hit $7 billion in the next year or so.

Had there been no inflation, there would be no problem and no Jarvis. Instead of gushing into Sacramento as inflated revenues, money would have remained in the after-tax incomes of the people, providing greater incentives to work, produce and invest. Instead, the reverse occurred, shrinking the nonproperty tax base and forcing more of the burden of local services on property. At the same time, the Washington-built inflation had a fiendish impact on California's local taxing mechanism.

In California, the state sets the property tax rate and the county tax assessors determine assessed valuation. The state rate has stayed the same, but for several years the assessments have climbed faster than they have anywhere else in the nation. The main reason is that since 1971 the assessor is bound by new state law to use the latest sale price in fixing all neighborhood values. Say a group of 50 homes sold originally for $50,000 and one now sells for $150,000. All other homes are bumped to an equivalent value, and because the assessor has no flexibility on rate, local property revenues soar, to be squandered by local governments on palatial buildings, lavish arts subsidies, bridle paths and, in Los Angeles, buying up railroads.

The problem is most severe in Southern California. Housing prices have been bid sky-high, partly as a result of the influx of well-to-do people who moved to the area to live out their lives on ample savings in sunshine that can't be taxed. At the same time, this process has squeezed the young managers, engineers and other professionals who form the productive base of the area. Their houses, purchased for $50,000, are now worth $150,000—nominally a nice increase. But their after-tax incomes, perhaps $30,000, are whacked another $5,000 in property tax.

Given other fixed expenses, they have little discretionary income left. They live in high-priced homes whose furniture and carpeting are getting shabbier by the day. They eat chicken instead of steak, drink beer instead of scotch. Finally, in disgust, they sell, perhaps moving to Houston, further diminishing the productive base in California.

Jarvis would change all this.

Initiatives are, next to war and revolution, the least efficient political tools. The citizenry, which expects its paid representatives to work things out, would rather be bowling or golfing than debating public finance. The initiative, though, is a wonderful thing to have when the political class systematically fails to do its job.

In California, most of the political leadership of both parties, from Gov. Jerry Brown on down, as well as corporate, banking and civic leadership, has failed utterly in what seems to be a simple political task.

Here the people of California are building enormous surpluses in one bank account at the same time they are being squeezed pitifully on their other accounts. The solution is to shift resources from the one to the other and adjust the taxing mechanism to see it doesn't happen again. The state, though, doesn't want to give up its tax bonanza. Local politicians don't want to lose their property-tax bonanza. All loathe Jarvis because it reminds them that these resources belong not to them but to the people. Indeed, the entire Establishment is arrayed against Jarvis, including the Business Roundtable and the "conservative" newspapers of San Diego. Those in control fear their system is threatened when the people take matters into their own hands.

The only reason Jarvis will not pass in a landslide is that the establishment is frantically peddling the idea that chaos will result if Jarvis passes. The voters must consider the possibility that Gov. Brown, Assembly Speaker Leo McCarthy and the other chief anti-Jarvis leaders will, out of pique, incite chaos by standing back and doing nothing except insist that the people's problems are not the state's. So far, this is precisely the governor's posture, which is why he has had a precipitous decline in popularity.

Mr. Brown would surely be knocked off this fall if he had a strong pro-Jarvis opponent. But the influence of the Establishment is so pervasive that there are none. Among the GOP contenders, former L.A. Police Chief Ed Davis is the most aggressively pro-Jarvis and has been endorsed by Howard himself. But Chief Davis, like Mr. Jarvis an old-school conservative, has yet to learn that Proposition 13 will not force austerity on the state as he pictures it. There is no GOP candidate arguing that Jarvis will mean more, not less, revenue to state and local governments. Prof. Neil Jacoby of the UCLA Business School makes this argument, as does Prof. Arthur Laffer of the USC Business School. Both see Jarvis expanding the tax base.

Mr. Jacoby argues that there will be a building and renovation boom once people can be sure they won't be penalized for adding a new porch to their house or committing funds for a new factory. Not only would this boost the property tax base—helping to offset any direct revenue loss from lower property tax rates—but it would stimulate personal and business income, thus expanding the income tax base.

EARLY SUPPORTER

One of the most impressive public officials in the state is Assembly Minority Leader Paul Priolo. Mr. Priolo for years has understood the nature of the problem and has been shunned in attempts to correct the taxing mechanism. An early supporter of the Jarvis bill, for the correct reasons, he now spends his time trying to get his legislative colleagues to plan for a post-Jarvis transition. His bill, to disburse most of the state surplus to local education boards on a simple formula, would buy a year's time for the legislature to work out new mechanisms. But he is now spurned by those who wish to keep alive the idea that Jarvis means chaos.

The latest Field poll shows Jarvis in the lead, 42 percent to 39 percent. But since then, the Los Angeles County assessor has released the year's new assessments. There were hysterical women all over Los Angeles, reading their new tax bills and calculating they would be forced to rearrange their family lives to much lower standards. Even much of the working press seems to have been won over to Jarvis, moved by the clear injustices of the system and their own property taxes.

If Jarvis passes on June 6, the hysteria will abate and California will be sunny and relaxed again. The political class will be forced to put aside any thought of chaos and retribution and buckle down to a serious transition, listening, it is to be hoped, to Mr. Priolo for a change. Speaker McCarthy, an intelligent and powerful man who has so far played hardball, seems privately ready to soften should Jarvis pass. He knows this is no local matter, that the whole world will be watching this exciting experiment in democracy. California often fancies itself the center of the planet. On June 6, Howard Jarvis and Paul Gann have arranged that it will be.●

ABC NEWS: A SHOCKING CASE OF INCOMPETENCE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. STEIGER) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Speaker, the Pentagon's traditional manpower policies received little meaningful criticism in ABC's, "The American Army: A Shocking State of Readiness" (Thursday, April 20, 1978). Although advertised as a show about "what the Pentagon won't tell you," virtually every issue raised by the show has been the subject of numerous statements emanating from the Pentagon. Indeed, the Pentagon policymakers interviewed by ABC candidly discussed the major problems faced by the American Army. There was no deception, no covering.

Remarkably, this self-advertised "exposé" failed to discuss any significant proposals for change. The show undoubtedly comforted the opponents of reform within the Pentagon, but it did little to elevate the level of debate about our national security or the impact of manpower policies on the average GI. Instead of the penetrating analysis associated with quality documentaries, we were served an old laundry list of problems—hyped by sports jargon about losers—but unaccompanied by meaningful ideas about the causes of military manpower problems or potential solutions.

ABC totally ignored the defects in military manpower management that have been documented before Congress by such nationally recognized experts as Richard Cooper of the Rand Corp. and Martin Binkin of the Brookings Institution. If ABC failed to interview such independent experts on military manpower, then the show represents a shoddy piece of work unworthy of network journalism. If such interviews were held, but were not shown, because the content did not comport with ABC's simplistic jargon, then the network has committed a fraud on the American public.

The Army's managerial difficulties may not present the type of entertainment ABC feels is required for high ratings, but the issues are worthy of serious attention. For example, with no increase in the overall budget, the compensation system could be modified to provide the flexibility needed to focus on high-caliber recruits in a cost-effective manner; mental and medical standards for recruits and for various military occupational specialties—often bear no relationship to job requirements; there has been insufficient attention to the opportunities in service for women; many military positions could be filled by civilians; the recruiting process does not adequately inform the individual about the nature of military service; management of the recruiting force and the overall recruiting system needs to be modernized; the discharge system is not structured to permit proper control of the attrition problem; and military pay and allowances do not adequately account for differing costs of living in different parts of the country and the world. Special attention must be paid to recruiting and retaining forces for the Reserve and National Guard.

These issues are also cited as the source of many problems faced by GI's in the field. Although reform in these areas would address the causes of the problems noted in the ABC show, none of these matters was discussed by ABC. Instead, ABC chose to place the blame on the fact that our soldiers are now volunteers rather than conscripts. ABC provided no basis for this simplistic link between voluntarism and the problems depicted in the show. Rather than create such a link, the program ignored it, raising the non sequitur to an art form.

Much of the program dealt with the morale of our soldiers in Germany, attributing the soldier's plight to the decline in value of the dollar. How is this related to the volunteer force? If anything, the situation would be absolutely disastrous without the pay raises instituted in 1971 to provide GI's with compensation equivalent to their civilian counterparts. Indeed, during the period of conscription in the late sixties, GI poverty was even worse than today. As a result of dependence on the draft, recruit pay was kept at artificially low rates despite years of rapid inflation. For example, from 1936 to 1964, the basic pay of a recruit at the entry level rose a mere $3, from $75 a month in 1946 to $78 a month in 1964. For a recruit, the monthly compensation package in 1964, including allowances, was worth only $133.50. By 1971, the last year of an active draft, tens of thousands of GI families—in the United States as well as abroad—were dependent upon public welfare for survival. As ABC points out, even today's pay rates create hardships in high cost areas; and as a legacy from the draft era, low ranking service members are denied travel and transportation allowances for their families. Today, just as in the draft era, thousands of GI's are either separated from their families or are deeply in debt as a result of paying dependent transportation costs. ABC's attempt to link this problem to the volunteer force is not only foolish, but it detracts attention from the major compensation reforms that have been proposed to deal with such problems.

ABC showed a number of interviews to underscore the "low morale" of GI's in Germany. Pressed by the low value of the dollar, isolated from their families, and bored with garrison life, the picture is not encouraging. For black soldiers, faced with racial discrimination, the situation is even less appealing. But was it any better during the draft? By all measures, the situation was worse. One of the best means of gaging the caliber and morale of our force is in disciplinary statistics. Since the end of the draft, there has been dramatic improvement in numbers of AWOL's, desertions, crimes of violence, serious drug offenses, and courts martial.

Like ABC news, many Pentagon leaders prefer to stick their heads in the sand and state that the problems are attributable to the recruits. But, would the situation improve if we reinstituted the draft? How would that take care of the problems of finances, isolation, and garrison duties? So long as persons in a position of leadership feel that these matters can be addressed by a return to conscription, little reform can be expected.

ABC stated that—

After five years of voluntary enlistment, the cost is rising . . .

As with other shoddy reporting in this show, no facts and figures were presented, either because the network made an assumption based upon ignorance, or because it was decided to ignore facts contrary to their bias.

The active duty portion of the defense budget has decreased every year following the initial investment in the volunteer force; that figure is easy to find—for anyone willing to look for it. Inflation has increased faster than the rate of pay at the recruit level over the same period. At the same time, significant savings have been achieved. The active Army now operates at a net annual savings of $81 million in fiscal year 1978 compared to manning the same units under a 2-year draft system.

To cite these savings is not to ignore the great potential for increased economies in the training process and in the reserve programs; rather, it is to emphasize that the issue of cost is a matter of management, not a question of the volunteer composition of the Army.

The idea that we could achieve substantial savings through a return to the draft is illusory. Out of our $120 billion defense budget, if we returned to the draft right now, the savings would only be less than $300 million. For the Army alone, the savings would only be $3 million. Even if we slashed recruit pay to the minimum wage—a step that would spell disaster for GI's in Europe—the savings for the Army would only be $1.3 billion.

ABC asserted that the volunteer force has "created new" problems:

Today there are more poor people in the Army, not less. Today's recruits come increasingly from the ranks of the unemployed.

How did they prove these assertions? First, they noted that there is high unemployment among young people, especially minorities. Second, they interviewed recruits. Defense Department studies, provided to Congress, show that 74 percent of all volunteers were either working or in school when they enlisted. These well-known studies have been presented to Congress on numerous occasions. ABC's failure to discuss these data reflects either ignorance of the subject matter or a conscious decision to disregard data that failed to meet the network's preconceptions.

The Gates Commission findings imply an unemployment elasticity of about 0.15. Dr. Richard Cooper in his Rand study on the AVF found that high unemployment rates has allowed the AVF to set higher enlistment standards. If there is any danger, he said, it is that high unemployment may cause the services to "set unrealistically and unnecessarily high quality standards for the longer run, based on their quality experience during this period, rather than on what actual job requirements may dictate."

ABC provided no evidence to prove that there are "more poor people" in the Army today than there were during the draft era. On the contrary, it has been shown that the middle of the economic spectrum is represented in almost identical proportions under the AVF as it was in the conscripted Army.

The myth that the volunteer force is an Army of the poor has been disproved in every serious study of the subject. In 1975, the Army found that 14 percent of its recruits came from families with income greater than $20,000, and 34 percent came from families with incomes from $11,000 to $20,000, figures roughly comparable to income groups in the Nation as a whole. In a later study by Richard Cooper of Rand, the following information was developed about the socioeconomic characteristics of persons entering the Army:

Rather than rely on data that would be contrary to their thesis, ABC chose to prove its points by interviews—that "80 percent of a group of volunteer recruits at Fort Dix" told ABC "stories like these." Two of the stories involved individuals who joined the Army, because they had trouble finding jobs on the outside. The third said:

I joined the Army because I thought it would be the most enjoyable experience and the best education that I could—figured that I could receive.

How does the latter statement prove that "there are more poor people in the Army"? How does it prove that there is a significant increase in the number of previously employed in the Army? What percent of the 80 percent who told ABC "stories like these" joined the Army, because it would be an "enjoyable experience and the best education" rather than simply because they had no other alternatives? It is a sad day for broadcast journalism when newscasters become so preoccupied with preconceived notions that they fail to even listen to the content of their interviews.

When a substantial portion of the people joining the Army do so, because they welcome the experience and the training, it is simply false and misleading to imply that the Army is repository for the problem of youth unemployment.

ABC cited a 1977 Senate Armed Services Committee report for the proposition that "little better than half of today's Army recruits have high school diplomas." Again, ABC is off base. In fiscal year 1971, 67 percent of Army recruits had high school diplomas. For the first 3 months of fiscal year 1978, 75 percent of all enlistees have had high school diplomas—and we have not yet reached the peak high school recruiting months of May, June, and July.

ABC correctly notes that attrition rates are higher than in the draft Army. But they are incorrect in stating that this "has cost us an additional $193 million for an all volunteer Army, so far." Inexplicably, the network overlooked the fact that soldiers are now obligated for a longer term of service than during the draft. Even with the increased attrition, this has meant that the average length of a tour of service has increased by 4 months per recruit. This has resulted in annual savings for the Army. The $193 million cited by ABC does not represent a cost of the volunteer force—rather, it is an estimate of the further savings that could be achieved by further reductions in the rate of attrition. The Army is unable to account for where this figure came from.

As ABC notes, there has been some drop in the number of recruits rated in the upper percentiles by military testing over the last 2 years. But does this support ABC's thesis that this is a problem caused by the volunteer force? A quarter of the force in fiscal year 1971 was in the lowest mental category, category IV, as compared to only 11 percent today. Percentages of the total force for the two times are as follows: Fiscal year 1971—category I, 5 percent; category II, 27 percent; category III, 44 percent; category IV, 24 percent; Fiscal year 1978 first quarter—category I, 5 percent; category I, 28 percent; category III, 55 percent category IV, 12 percent.

Taking a pot shot at costs, Wordham asserts that the "recruitment and training (of each soldier) has cost the American taxpayer nearly $6,000 apiece for each volunteer. That is almost what it would have cost to attend a first-rate Ivy League college for 1 year." If we we to revert to the draft, it would cost $4,750 to select, process, and train each draftee. If there are unnecessary expenses, it is a matter to be resolved by improved management, not by erroneously attributing the costs to the volunteer force.

ABC highlighted a number of problems facing our Army in Europe—boredom in garrison units, preoccupation with personnel problems, the dilemma of having dependents in the midst of a potential battlefield, equipment shortages and malfunctions, and inadequate training time. By contrast, the show noted the comparatively higher readiness of our forces in Korea. Korea is manned by the same volunteer Army. Their recruitment and basic training is no different from that of the soldiers sent to Germany. If the Army in Korea is ready, and the Army in Germany is not, that tells us something about the comparative management of the two operations. If there are defects, they are not attributable to the volunteers. They can be traced to the manpower policies applied to our forces in Europe.

The situation in Europe is not good—but it is appreciably better than it was in the sixties during the period of conscription.●

POPE PAUL'S INVOCATION AT THE MEMORIAL MASS FOR ALDO MORO

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the American delegation representing President Carter at the May 13 memorial service for former Italian Prime Minister Aldo Moro, I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues in the House of Representatives an English translation of Pope Paul's invocation which was forwarded to me by the Honorable Richard N. Gardner, U.S. Ambassador to Italy.

Aldo Moro was a noble and compassionate exponent of freedom's ideals, and the Pope's moving prayer at the solemn rite on behalf of this great man follows:

THE POPE'S INVOCATION

Following is the text of the prayer written personally by the Holy Father and said by Him at the end of the solemn rite for On. Aldo Moro:

"And now our lips, closed as if by an enormous obstacle, similar to the heavy stone rolled at the entrance of the sepulchre of Christ, become open to express the 'De profundis,' that is the cry and the tears of the unutterable grief with which this tragedy chokes our voice.

"Lord, hear us!

"And who can hear our lament, if not You once again, O God of life and death? You have not heard our Supplication for the safety of Aldo Moro, of this kind, gentle, wise, innocent and friendly man; but You, O Lord, have not abandoned his immortal soul, marked by his Faith in Christ, who is Resurrection and Life. For him, for him.

"Lord, hear us!

"O God, Father of mercy, let not the communion be interrupted that, even in the darkness of death, still intercedes between the Dead who departed from this temporal existence and we who are still alive on this day with a sun that is inexorably going down. The program of our being redeemed is not vain: our flesh will be resurrected, our life will be eternal! O! Let our faith be right from now equal to this promised reality. We shall see again Aldo and all those who live in Christ, blessed in the infinite God!

"Lord, hear us!

"And in the meantime, O Lord, make our heart, appeased by the virtue of your Cross, forgive the unjust and deadly outrage inflicted on this very dear man and on all those who shared the same cruel fate; make us all acquire from the pure sudarium of his noble memory the surviving heritage of his straightforward conscience, of his human and cordial example, of his devotion to the civil and spiritual redemption of our beloved Italian Nation.

"Lord, hear us!"

After having said this prayer, the Pope went on:

"And now, before the end of this ceremony, in which we have prayed for the eternal rest of this brother of ours, we raise our arms to bless all those present in this church and those who, having been unable to find place within its walls, have remained outside in the square and also all those who, even though far away, are present in spirit: in particular, we intend to embrace with our fatherly gesture also those who bear anguish and grief in their hearts for some relative, victim of the same savage violence. For everyone we invoke the comforting assistance of the Lord, bearer of peace and hope."●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Wisconsin (Mr. ASPIN) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ASPIN. Mr. Speaker, because of the Oregon primary election on May 23 I was unable to be present for rollcall vote Nos. 330, 335, 336, 339, and 340 on H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act. Had I been present I would have have cast my votes as follows:

Rollcall No. 330 "yea."
Rollcall No. 335 "nay."
Rollcall No. 336 "nay."
Rollcall No. 339 "nay."
Rollcall No. 340 "yea."●

CITIZENS' POSTAL RATE RELIEF ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Michigan (Mr. FORD) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, last Friday, May 19, the U.S. Postal Service Governors, by a vote of 4 to 2, accepted the recommended decision of the Postal Rate Commission, which means that first class postal rates will be increased from 13 to 15 cents, effective May 29. In doing so the Governors, while expressing reservations of the Commission's recommendations, passed up an opportunity to express its displeasure with the Commission by not either rejecting their recommendations or accepting them under protest.

While a committee of the Board of Governors recommended protesting the rejection of a citizens rate, the Governors as a whole turned their backs:

On half of the members of the Rate Commission—although the Commission Chairman ultimately voted against the citizen rate, he did so not on the basis that it was not a sound idea, but rather that sufficient evidence had not been submitted in the short time allowed to fully support the concept,

On the former Postmaster General Bailer,

On President Carter, and

On this Congressman.

Last summer, June 1 to be exact, I addressed my colleagues on the alarming increase in the cost of mailing letters, on the inordinate share of the Postal Service's operating expenses borne by the individual citizen and on the need for protecting the American citizen from a level of postal rates that threatens his traditional freedom of expression.

In referring to the vital communication needs filled by our mail system, I mentioned the thousands of letters we receive daily from our constituents—letters from persons who are writing their Congressman "as their court of last appeal."

At the time I did not realize how prophetic this description would turn out to be. Now that the Postal Rate Commission has turned a deaf ear to the citizen rate proposal with the Governors' acquiescence and moved to deny individuals their right to communicate by mail at a reasonable cost, it is clearly up to the legislative branch to serve as the citizen's court of last resort.

I am, therefore, reintroducing my bill, the Citizens' Postal Rate Relief Act, H.R. 12844. Since its original introduction and designation as H.R. 7537, it has been revised and is now much more easily administered.

My bill provides a 13-cent first class postal rate for personal letter mail. It restricts eligibility to private individuals. It protects the Postal Service against misuse by providing a fine of $500 for each piece of mail sent by anyone other than a private individual. Any revenue shortfall would not be made up with revenue from other classes of mail.

The new version of the bill eliminates the section of the original version that would have required adjustments of the personal rate by relating it to the Government's cost-of-living index. I believe this makes the revised bill much easier to administer.

Instead of the adjustment procedure, the revised bill suggests a simple formula for maintaining a differential between personal mail and regular first class. In the future, the level of the personal mail rate could not exceed 80 percent of the rate established for regular first class.

Originally, my motivation was concern over rapidly rising postal rates. I now wish the revised bill to express my sense of outrage over the Postal Rate Commission's rejection of the 13-cent personal rate and 16-cent regular first class rate requested by the Postal Service and their recommendation and decision for an across-the-board 15-cent rate for all first class mail.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that when it created the Postal Rate Commission, Congress intended a vigilant regulatory agency that would stand up to powerful lobbying groups for business mail users—an agency that would begin showing some interest in lifting from the shoulders of individual mail users the heavy burden of paying the difference between actual operating costs and the preferential rates enjoyed by business.

Instead, I am outraged to find that we have put our trust in a group of appointed officials who apparently perceive their role as protecting the cut-rate postage prices given to business—a group that, in effect, is telling the American citizen: look out for yourself, because we are here to take care of business mailers.

I trust that my many colleagues who already have indicated their support for a 13-cent rate for individuals sending personal mail by serving as cosponsors of my bill will come forward again. This time they will have the added satisfaction of helping to right the injustice done by the Postal Rate Commission.

My confidence that the legislative branch will prove more responsive than the Commission and the Governors to the needs of the people also is bolstered by Representative HANLEY's assurance that his Subcommittee on Postal Operations and Services will schedule hearings on my revised bill as soon as possible.

As I said last June, the one true and meaningful means for the American people to communicate must be available to them at a price that is reasonable and fair.

This revised bill will accomplish that goal, and I urge my fellow members to to join with me in cosponsoring it.

Mr. Speaker, one last word to my colleagues. This week we shall begin our district work week. Next Monday, during our stays in our district, first class postage will again escalate. At that time, while public utility companies will be able to send their bills to consumers at the 13-cent presorted rate, private citizens will have to mail their payments back at the increased 15-cent rate. I for one, do not wish to face my constituents and say that I have done nothing to prevent this and allow yet another increase in their constantly rising cost of living.

The bill follows:

H.R. 12844

A bill to amend title 39, United States Code, to establish a reduced rate of postage for certain mail matter of private individuals

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "Citizens' Postal Rate Relief Act of 1978".

SEC. 2.(a) Subchapter II of chapters 36 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new section:

"§ 3629. Reduced rate for certain mail matter of individuals

"(a) Notwithstanding the provisions of this subchapter or of subchapter III of this chapter, the rate of postage established under such subchapters for qualified mail matter (as defined in subsection (d) of this section) shall be established in accordance with subsection (b) of this section.

"(b)(1) Until such time as an adjustment is made under paragraph (2) of this subsection, the rate referred to in subsection (a) of this section shall be 13 cents for the first ounce of each piece of mail matter and 11 cents for each additional ounce or fraction of an ounce.

"(2) If the rates for the class of mail that is maintained under section 3623(d) of this title for the transmission of ordinary letters sealed against inspection are adjusted under subchapter II or subchapter III of this Chapter, the Postal Service shall adjust the rates for qualified mail matter as defined in subsection (d) of this section so that the rates for such mail matter shall in no event exceed 80 percent of the rates for such class, rounded to the nearest whole cent.

"(c)(1) Except as authorized by this section, no person shall mail any matter at the rates prescribed pursuant to subsection (b) of this section.

"(2) The Postal Service may fine any violator of paragraph (1) of this subsection an amount it deems reasonable but not to exceed $500 for each piece of mail matter so mailed.

"(3) The Postal Service shall provide an alleged violator with written notice of the decision to fine and the charges upon which it is based. The Postal Service may, and upon timely request by the alleged violator shall, order a hearing on the charges pursuant to sections 554–555 of title 5, United States Code.

"(4) The decision of the Postal Service to fine a violator, whether or not pursuant to a hearing under subsection (c) of this section, shall be final and conclusive unless it is appealed to any court of appeals of the United States within 15 days after service of the decision upon the violator. The court shall review the decision, in accordance with section 706 of title 5, and chapter 158 and section 2112 of title 28, except that the facts underlying a decision to fine shall not be subject to trial de novo by the court. Issues which became final and conclusive because no appeal was taken to a court of appeals, and issues which were raised or might have been raised in a court of appeals, may not be raised as a defense to a suit by the Postal Service for collection of a fine.

"(d) For purposes of this section, the term 'qualified mail matter' means domestic letter mail—

"(1) of the class that is maintained under section 3623(d) of this title for the transmission of ordinary letters sealed against inspection;

"(2) prepared in accordance with such reasonable mail preparation requirements as the Postal Service may prescribe by regulation; and

"(3) sent by an individual.

For purposes of this subsection, the term "individual" does not include a corporation, company, business, association, partnership, professional entity, proprietorship, institution, or governmental unit or any similar entity."

(b) The table of sections for subchapter II of chapter 36 of title 39, United States Code, is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new item:

"3629. Reduced rate for certain mail matter of individuals".

SEC. 3. Section 2401(c) and section 3627 of title 39, United States Code, are amended by striking out "and 3626" in section 2401(c) and inserting in lieu thereof "3626, and 3629" and by striking out "or 3626" in section 3627 and inserting in lieu thereof "3626, or 3629".

SEC. 4. The amendments made by the foregoing provisions of this Act shall apply to any qualified mail matter (as defined in section 3629 of title 39, United States Code, as added by section 2 of this Act) which is mailed on or after the effective date of such regulations as are prescribed pursuant to subsection (d)(2) of such section 3629, but not later than 60 days after the date of enactment of this Act.●

A VETERAN IS A VETERAN

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Texas (Mr. ROBERTS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the Committee on Veterans' Affairs, I read with interest the reprint of a Washington Post editorial in the May 19, 1978, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. The newspaper is exercised about "inadequacies of the GI bill" and applauds 11 Members of Congress who are Vietnam era veterans for banding together as "legislative advocates" for these veterans.

Those of us who deal directly with veterans' affairs have given up trying to enlighten the Washington Post. Its editorial writers prefer fancy to fact and, I suppose, the prose that drifts up from their pipedreams is more entertaining to their readers than cold, hard facts. Unfortunately, those of us who legislate cannot indulge in flights of fancy. I assume the Vietnam veterans in Congress who were the subject of the editorial are also interested in facts.

All veterans' organizations supported the present system of educational benefits for Vietnam era veterans as established in the Veterans Education Improvements Act passed in November 1977. With this new law, the American people made available to the married veteran with one child in excess of $30,000 to complete 5 years of education—$18,990 monthly educational assistance checks, a maximum of $12,500 in loans. This assistance is scaled up or down comparably for single veterans and those with more than two dependents. The Congress felt this was a generous amount for an individual who may have served as little as 18 months in military service.

Most veterans who have suffered a service-connected disability are entitled to the full cost of tuition, books and fees for education or training, in addition to subsistence payments based on the number of his dependents.

The American Legion numbers 700,000 Vietnam era veterans among its membership and R. E. Lyngh, director of the Legion's National Veterans Affairs and Rehabilitation Commission made the following statement about the program:

The present GI Bill program is the best of the three programs for World War II, Korean and Vietnam veterans. Vietnam veterans receive benefits under the present program that were never given to earlier veterans. For example, 45 months of training as against 36 months for World War II; the entitlement to benefits while completing high school level work without loss of any of the total 45 months entitlement; tutorial assistance to help do college level work; a liberal loan program; entitlement to benefits prior to discharge.

The Veterans of Foreign Wars has 500,000 Vietnam era veterans as members. Mr. Al Poteet, assistant director of this organization's National Legislative Service, in testimony before the House Veterans' Affairs Committee, said:

I can guarantee you, Mr. Chairman, that as a Vietnam veteran who has and who is still utilizing the GI Bill, this VA educational program is reasonable and affords veterans a golden opportunity to attain their educational objectives whatever they may be.

The argument is advanced that because most committee members are not Vietnam-era veterans, they cannot legislate intelligently for them. A moment's reflection reminds us that World War I veterans in Congress passed the first GI bill for World War II veterans who, then as Members of Congress, enacted the Korean GI bill.

Mr. Speaker, there is no one in a better position to refute this argument than the legislative director of the Paralyzed Veterans of America, Mr. Lawrence W. Roffee, Jr. In a letter to "TIGER" TEAGUE who is chairman of our Subcommittee on Education and Training, Mr. Roffee said:

You have been criticized for being insensitive to Vietnam veterans. I personally know, and PVA as an organization knows, that you have been an outstanding leader in doing everything possible for disabled and Vietnam veterans. You have always been very sensitive to the problems of these groups of veterans.

Mr. Speaker, the record makes it abundantly clear that Vietnam-era veterans have had their say in every forum. They participate in all veterans' affairs. Their opinions are listened to attentively. Members of Congress who are Vietnam-era veterans are urged to share with this committee any and all views they may have on veterans legislation. Our hearings are open to them. I have no doubts about the sincerity of their concerns.

As for the Washington Post and its new-found interest in veterans' affairs, Mr. Speaker, I am not so sure. I hesitate to second-guess another's motives but could there be, I ask, a better way to dilute the influence of veterans organizations than to divide and conquer?

In years past a veteran was a veteran. It was taken for granted that equal service was an entitlement to equal benefits. Whether one was in frontline combat or at a typewriter in the rear echelon, the Government used its military personnel according to the demands of war. But now one hears special demands being made for special service. Shall we go on to provide a special program for those who were in actual combat? Will the infantry scout get more than the artilleryman? Will the pilot be entitled to more benefits than the man who fueled his plane? These distinctions could go onto infinity and absurdity.

All of us concerned about veterans must put aside these divisions and return to the ties that unite us. The surest way to destroy our system of veterans benefits is to pick it apart from within.

Only veterans themselves, Mr. Speaker, can prevent this by insisting to those who set themselves up as champions of special groups, "A veteran is a veteran."●

PROMPT ACTION NEEDED ON KIM DONG JO TESTIMONY

(Mr. KOSTMAYER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. KOSTMAYER. Mr. Speaker, this morning the Committee on International Relations approved a resolution expressing the sense of the Congress that all nonmilitary aid to the Government of South Korea be cut off unless that government compels its former Ambassador to the United States, Kim Dong Jo, to testify before a committee of this House on the so-called Korean bribery scandal.

I hope that the House will act favorably on the resolution. Each day the American people become more convinced that we are being less than diligent in bringing this matter to light. The Carter administration should support the resolution, rather than oppose it with a lot of legal mumbo-jumbo from the State Department.

The administration should not protect those who are guilty. There is no reason why full compliance should not be forthcoming from the Korean Government. The State Department's dire warnings of another Korean War or of former American Ambassadors being forced to testify about alleged bribery by American officials simply do not hold water. In fact, such revelations might be helpful.

If the Congress and the leadership are serious about the commitment made to Mr. Jaworski and to the American people, then we must act promptly and forcefully, and the administration must do likewise.

IMPROVEMENTS NEED TO BE MADE IN NAVAL SHIPBUILDING PROGRAM

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. EILBERG) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to vote for final passage of the Department of Defense authorization for fiscal year 1979 because of my belief that America must maintain a strong national defense and that this bill aids in that goal.

However, I wish to strongly voice my serious reservation about the provision contained in section 811(b) which calls for further cost-analysis studies before aircraft carriers in the service life extension program can be overhauled, converted or repaired.

Most immediately affected by this provision is the aircraft carrier U.S.S. Saratoga. As I informed my colleagues during the floor debate on Tuesday, the Navy originally assigned the overhaul of the Saratoga to the Philadelphia Naval Shipyard.

There has been growing criticism of the chaos in the Navy shipbuilding program and of the large cost overruns which have been incurred. This is an area obviously where improvements need to be made.

Objective evaluation of all criteria relating to the Saratoga assignment shows that—

The Philadelphia Naval Shipyard is the best equipped on the east coast to meet the SLEP requirements;

The shipyard has an outstanding on-time completion record for the jobs it has performed;

The Philadelphia Naval Yard has already completed the planning process required for such a major overhaul; and

The shipyard has the most advanced job safety equipment of any yard on the east coast.

The clear conclusions of these facts is that the Philadelphia Naval Yard can do the job most effectively and in the most cost-efficient manner.

Therefore, although I will vote for final passage of H.R. 10929, Mr. Chairman, I do so only with the strongest reservation about section 811.●

MORE SUPPORT FOR CONGRESSIONAL VETO OF FTC RULES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. LEVITAS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. LEVITAS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw to your attention and that of my colleagues the strong support that congressional control over bureaucratic rules and regulations has in this House. To date, over 200 Members of the House have cosponsored bills to provide for a congressional veto of administrative rules and regulations. The public has long supported this concept of having elected officials be able to control agency rules adopted by unelected bureaucrats. Now Congress is beginning to catch up with the public.

The support for congressional control over bureaucratic regulations was again clearly demonstrated by the House when we rejected the conference report on H.R. 3816, the FTC Act amendments, simply because it did not include the House-adopted amendment providing for congressional veto of FTC regulations. I am proud that the House held its position on the FTC Act, and I trust that the House will continue to hold fast until the Senate and the administration see the wisdom of this provision in the FTC bill.

A significant, new voice has recently been added to those who support congressional control over agency rules. I refer to the distinguished Lee Loevinger whose background and experience in Government, as well as in the private practice of law, makes him a knowledgeable and persuasive proponent of the congressional veto of regulations concept. Judge Loevinger's service in the executive branch includes 3 years as Assistant Attorney General in charge of the Antitrust Division at the Department of Justice under the Kennedy administration. He served as a Commissioner to the Federal Communications Commission for 5 years thereafter. His career in Government began as a staff attorney with the National Labor Relations Board.

Judge Loevinger sat as a member of the Minnesota Supreme Court for 2 years. In the legislative branch, he was special counsel to the Senate Small Business Committee for a number of years. As an attorney in private practice, Judge Loevinger has handled many cases involving the FTC and other executive agencies in court. In addition, he was a professor of jurisprudence at the University of Minnesota Law School and a professorial lecturer at American University. He was a member of the U.S. Administrative Conference.

Mr. Speaker, Judge Loevinger has written to me to express his strong support of the congressional veto provision in the FTC bill, and I commend his letter to my colleagues. As Judge Loevinger points out in his letter, the FTC, by maintaining that it is not subject to executive or congressional control, operates with all the independence of the judiciary with the added power to legislate. We cannot let this free-wheeling situation continue. We must take steps to insure that the bureaucracy is sensitized and accountable by providing for a congressional veto over its rules. The letter follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C.
May 8, 1978.

Hon. ELLIOTT LEVITAS,
House of Representatives, Congress of the United States, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LEVITAS: The Antitrust and Trade Regulation Report in a recent issue reports that you are the leader of a group in the House of Representatives which is insisting on the right of Congressional veto for FTC Trade Regulation Rules.

I am a lawyer engaged in private practice who has had many years experience with the FTC and has in the past had a number of years experience as a government lawyer, both in the Department of Justice and in administrative agencies. Based on many years of experience I simply wish to convey to you an expression of my support for your position.

It is paradoxical and anomalous that the FTC and other administrative agencies have objected to being subject to orders issued by the White House, even on such noncontroversial subjects as writing regulations in plain English. The objection has been that the agencies are the creatures of Congress and, therefore, not subject to control by the Executive. However, now that Congress proposes to exercise direct control, the FTC comes in and says that this is an infringement of its independence. The net effect of this position is that the FTC (and, presumably, other administrative agencies) is a free floating independent lawmaking authority which is not answerable to anyone. If its several objections are correct, the FTC is not subject to control by the Executive or by Congress and it is not answerable to any electorate. This would give it all of the independence of the judiciary but with the power, not exercised by the judiciary, to legislate. I submit that this is an illogical paradox and a monstrosity.

In all candor, I must admit to considerable doubt that the Congressional veto will be exercised often or effectively. However, its mere existence may have some salutary effect in restraining the FTC and its staff. In recent years the FTC and its staff have become one of the least restrained, and, sometimes, least responsible, agencies in Washington. This limited and reasonable step toward providing a warranted restraint on the legislative action of the FTC appears to be entirely reasonable and I hope that you and the House of Representatives will adhere to the position which you have taken.

Sincerely yours,

LEE LOEVINGER.

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO VOTES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Speaker, due to other commitments I was absent from five important rollcall votes on Thursday, May 18, and Friday, May 19, 1978. The rollcalls concerned the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act of 1978, H.R. 39.

As a member of the Interior Committee, the Alaska Lands Subcommittee, and a cosponsor of the legislation, I regret that I was unable to be present. I would like to announce how I would have voted had I been present:

Rollcall No. 335, I would have voted "no".

Rollcall No. 336, I would have voted "no".

Rollcall No. 338, I would have voted "no".

Rollcall No. 339, I would have voted "no".

Rollcall No. 340, I would have voted "aye". ●

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. MOTTL) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, May 19, 1978, I had numerous important appointments with constituents in my Parma congressional office, otherwise I would have been present on the House floor. Had I been present I would have voted "yea" on rollcall No. 340, final passage of the bill H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act. I realize the importance of this ecological legislation.

As the record shows, I did vote against two amendments that would have dramatically cut the size of the land that was to be set aside for parks or wilderness. If my vote would have been essential to pass the bill, I would have been present to vote for H.R. 39. ●

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows to:

SENATE ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled bill of the Senate of the following title:

S. 2370. An act to remove the limitation on the amount authorized to be appropriated under the Volunteers in the National Forests Act of 1972.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the House of the following titles, which were thereupon signed by the Speaker:

H.R. 9005. An act making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of said District for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 11662. An act to provide for the establishment of the Lowell National Historical Park in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and for other purposes.

BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT

Mr. THOMPSON, from the Committee on House Administration, reported that that committee did not this day present to the President, for his approval, bills of the House of the following title:

H.R. 9005. Making appropriations for the government of the District of Columbia and other activities chargeable in whole or in part against the revenues of said District for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978, and for other purposes; and

H.R. 11662. To provide for the establishment of the Lowell National Historical Park in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and for other purposes.

ADJOURNMENT

Mr. EVANS of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 7 o'clock p.m.), the House adjourned until tomorrow, Thursday, May 25, 1978, at 10 o'clock a.m.

AMENDMENTS

Under clause 6 of rule XXIII, proposed amendments were submitted as follows:

H.R. 11983

By Mr. WIGGINS:

In section 2, insert the following new paragraph "(6)" to proposed section 501 of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971:

"(6) The term 'qualified campaign expense' means an expense—

"(A) incurred—

"(i) by a candidate to further his election

"(ii) by authorized committees of the candidate to further the candidate."

In section 2, insert the following new paragraph "(7)" to the proposed section 501 of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971:

"(7) the term 'expenditure' has the same meaning as defined in section 301 of the Act except that for the purposes of this title, the term expenditure does not include:

(a) any costs incurred by a candidate or candidate's principal campaign committee in connection with the solicitation of contributions by the candidate or principal campaign committee

(b) the costs in preparing any political advertising or broadcasts except direct charges for airtime or direct charges for advertising space."

In section 2, add the following new subsection at the end of proposed section 502 of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971:

"(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of this Act, no person shall receive any funds under this Act if, in the election, he or she is the candidate of both major parties."

In section 2, strike paragraph "(3)" of proposed section 504(a) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971.

In section 2, insert the following new paragraph after paragraph (5) of proposed section 504(a) of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971:

"(6) Notwithstanding any other provision of this subsection, no candidate is entitled to the payment of any amount under this section which, when added to the total amount of contributions received by him and his authorized committees and any other payments made to him under this title for his general election campaign, exceeds the amount of the expenditure limitation applicable to him for that campaign under section 320(b)(2).

In section 2, insert the following new proposed section 512:

"UNLAWFUL USE OF PAYMENTS

"SEC. 512. Unlawful Use of Payments.

"It shall be unlawful for any person who receives payment under this chapter or to whom any portion of such payment is transferred, knowingly and willfully to use, or authorize the use of, such payment or such portion for any purpose other than for the specific purposes authorized by this title."

In section 2, redesignate proposed sections 512 and 513 of the Federal Election Campaign Act of 1971 as proposed sections 516 and 517 respectively.

In section 2, insert the following new proposed section 513.

"FALSE STATEMENTS

"SEC. 513. False Statements.

"It shall be unlawful for any person knowingly and willfully with intent to deceive to (a) furnish any false, fictitious, or fradulent evidence, books, or sworn material testimony to the Commission under this title or to (b) include in any evidence, books, or information so furnished any misrepresentation of a material fact, or to falsify or conceal any evidence, books, or information relevant to a certification by the Commission or an examination and audit by the Commission under section 508."

In section 2, insert the following new proposed section 515.

"PENALTY FOR VIOLATIONS

"SEC. 515. Penalty for Violations.

"Any knowing and willful violation of any provision of this chapter is punishable by a fine of not more than $25,000, or imprisonment for not more than one year, or both."

And in section 2 strike (c) of proposed section 506.

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

SALUTE TO MSGR. LOUIS A. MARTORELLA IN CELEBRATION OF HIS 40 YEARS IN SERVICE TO GOD

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, June 4, there will be a celebration of love in the Bronx, N.Y. Foremost, it will be a celebration of the love of man for his God, and that love is divinely inspired. It will be a celebration of affection and respect for a leader among churchmen and servants of God. It will be a genuine outpouring of admiration for one very special man among men. Bronxites, friends, and parishioneers alike, will celebrate the life and vocation of Msgr. Louis A. Martorella on the very beautiful occasion of his 40th anniversary in the holy priesthood.

The festivities will begin at 4:30 p.m. when Monsignor Martorella will offer a Mass of Thanksgiving in holy celebration at Our Lady of Mount Carmel Chruch, 187th Street and Belmont Avenue, Bronx. A gala reception and dinner will follow so that the many people who have had their lives touched by his example can share the happiness and significance of this day with him.

A native New Yorker, Monsignor Martorella was born in the heart of New York City, the borough of Manhattan, on September 3, 1911. He, like so many other distinguished Americans, is the son of immigrant parents, Mary Barone and Louis Anthony Martorella, from Sicily. He received his primary education at Public School 158, 77th Street and York Avenue in Manhattan, and went on to DeWitt Clinton High School, Bronx. He was then to attend Fordham University. Cathedral College prepared him for the very exacting and yet so special discipline and privilege of studying for the priesthood. And young Louis continued on his formal path to the calling of God's vocation at St. Joseph's Seminary at Dunwoodie, Yonkers, N.Y. The Culmination of study and holy prepartion was his ordination as an Apostle of Christ and Prince of the Church on June 11, 1938 at St. Patrick's Cathedral. But his work was only to begin.

Significantly, he was first to serve as a model to the flock in the important work of the parish priest. He was to serve his church in following years at Our Lady of Peace, East 62d Street, Manhattan; Saint Anthony's, Richardson Avenue, Bronx, and Our Lady of Mount Carmel in Poughkeepsie, N.Y. His personal attributes and abilities supported him as pastor of the first Italian-American Auxiliary. In 1964, his talents on behalf of the Lord were to lead him in elevation to domestic prelate the right reverend monsignor, as recommended by his Eminence, the late and beloved Francis Cardinal Spellman, Archbishop of New York.

It is truly a momentous occasion when a leader in God's service assumes the awesome responsibility of pastorship, directing part of His province and providing the way to the salvation of souls, which was Louis Martorella's sacred reason d'etre. Monsignor Martorella pastored in East Harlem from 1958 to 1966. Nineteen hundred and sixty-six brought him to Staten Island as pastor of the Church of the Assumption until 1969. From October 1969 until October 1972, Pastor Martorella was to give his loving leadership and example to the Van Ness community of the Bronx at St. Dominic Church. And very happily and meaningfully for all who know and love him there, Monsignor Martorella remains in his devoted service, begun in 1972, as the pastor of Our Lady of Mount Carmel Church in the familiar Belmont area—a parish and neighborhood which is so near and dear to me in the Bronx. This parish numbers 20,000 strong, and has the largest, 900 students, parochial school in New York.

Louis Martorella believed in civic duty. He knew of the necessity to organize and to lead, in order to render full human services to the people of the communities and neighborhoods he valued, and to be of assistance to those in need. Importantly, he was the founder of the Council of Belmont Organizations, known as COBO, which has become a fountain of development and progress for the community. Recognizing the special needs of the elderly in our society, he founded the Mount Carmel Senior Citizens Center. Monsignor Martorella also capably serves his borough on the Bronx Borough President Advisory Committee.

The Columbia Association of the New York City Police Department and the Columbus-ESCA Alliance of Italian-American Business Professionals and Elected Officials enjoy his guidance and inspiration as their spiritual director.

An activist, prompted by church organizational concerns as well, Monsignor Martorella is now serving a 3-year appointment by Cardinal Cooke on the Archdiocesan Priests Retirement Board. He recently completed another special appointment by the cardinal to the Interparish Committee of the New York Archdiocese.

Yes; we are paying tribute today to a man who helps people be better people. We are saluting a leader who enables people to live out days of their lives as best they can. In that form, they are true to themselves, a credit to their community, and an important contributing factor to the success of God's service and His work here on Earth.

I implore him, on behalf of all his friends and admirers, to continue in all his good works, with good health God willing, and never to go too far away from our neighborhoods and communities where he is widely loved and respected. I further ask and trust that he will permit us to partake of his talents and wisdom for a long time to come. I take great personal pride in being among the wealth of his dear friends, and one who has encouraged him in his community endeavors and accomplishments.

Warmest and heartiest congratulations to you, Monsignor Martorella, on your 40th anniversary in the holy priesthood. And may God bless you and keep you always.●

VOTING REPRESENTATION MEASURE

HON. WALTER E. FAUNTROY

OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. FAUNTROY. Mr. Speaker, following the floor debate on House Joint Resolution 554, the District of Columbia full voting representation measure, one of my constituents who was in the House gallery recorded her impressions of the proceedings in a poem. I believe this poem captures the hope and, indeed, the feelings of the District of Columbia community on this matter. The poem follows:

While I sat in the gallery in the Capitol today
I watched one of God's messengers and I started to pray

Lord please let his resolution past
I'm terribly excited Lord please do it fast

My breath was cut short anxiety pains in my chest
As I watched his colleagues put 554 to a test.

I watched this representative for God and man
Step forward to deliberate his legislative plan

He reminded me of Martin Luther King
His speech was to let all freedom ring

He asked for respect from every nation
By giving the District full voter representation

I looked in that pit what a heavenly sight
As his colleagues shook his hands and urged him to fight

When the voting was over God I watched his face wet with tears
He was thankful for your encouragement all of these years

Now we are waiting for the Senate to give its final touch
By voting yes for legislation that we need so much.

Let it ratify victory, it's a beautiful plan
To make men equal in this God blessed land . . . America.

(To Congressman WALTER FAUNTROY and the United States Congress and Senate from Mrs. Elaine Johns.)●

FISCAL YEAR 1979 DEFENSE AUTHORIZATION: WHAT IT COSTS AND WHAT IT BUYS

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Chairman, once again the annual defense authorization rite is upon us. The figures may change, almost always in an upward direction, but the underlying assumptions, attitudes, and inducements to spend on national defense remain the same.

This year there are a few interesting variations on the usually perennial theme that American military spending is the only key to earthly security and salvation. The authorization bill is $2.4 billion above the President's request and $3.4 billion above the House's version of the first budget resolution for fiscal year 1979.

Also this year for the first time in several years a group of dissident committee members, outraged by the arbitrariness and excessiveness of the committee bill, have devised a substitute bill, which would call up the President's initial request as the baseline for authorization. Apparently, the committee's action was even more flagrantly irresponsible this year than in past years. One Member characterized the committee bill as "the most pork-laden" in recent history. Another member, who is usually sympatheic to Pentagon demands, thought the committee "ran amok" this time around. A third member refers to the bill as "the Christmas tree bill." Among other goodies, the bill authorizes $8.1 million for a private Gulfstream executive jet for the Marine Corps Commandant. It also offers a virtual blank check to the Lake Placid Olympic organizing committee to provide the Pentagon with funds to shovel snow and provide security at the 1980 Olympics in upstate New York. Apparently, this authorization won support after a senior committee member convinced his colleagues that his district, which includes the site of the 1980 Olympics badly needs Pentagon assistance. Since the Defense Department seems to have its hand in so many domestic projects and social events, I am tempted to request that it lend its helpful hand to the cities of Detroit and Highland Park, in my own district, to help eliminate unemployment and assist in the local crime prevention and urban security effort.

In a more serious vein, however, as flagrantly irresponsible as these pork-barrel projects are, far more serious are the misguided and dangerous assumptions that lie behind the defense authorization request. We have become inured of late to the notion that whereas the Russians are currently outspending us on military matters, and because the Russians seem to be having a rather successful time in their support of armed struggles in Third World countries, it is simply a matter of national reason, honor, and security to raise sharply the level of funds going to military research, development, and production. The current Defense Authorization bill is the perfect embodiment of this dubious logic, particularly its request of $2.1 billion for a new super-class nuclear carrier, which has been opposed by the former President, is opposed by President Carter, and was rejected last year by both Houses of Congress.

The convenient assumption behind this current authorization bill is that it, along with the new nuclear carrier, will furnish us with the national security we need in the years ahead. Let us examine this assumption. What are we buying with this new $2.1 billion Nimitz-class carrier, or for that matter with the whole authorization bill of $37.9 billion? What is this new carrier actually going to cost us in the lifetime of its mission?

What does this additional nuclear carrier actually provide in terms of force structures and military missions? And why are the underlying assumptions about force structures and missions, which this carrier represents, warranted at all? These questions ought to be asked of every weapon authorization and appropriation, but unfortunately are generally not? What are we buying, and for what reason? What will it be costing American taxpayers not only this year but in future years?

For answers to these questions I consulted with Dr. Earl Ravenal, a former high official in the Department of Defense, a leading expert on defense and foreign policy, and a professor at Johns Hopkins and Georgetown Universities. This is his breakdown of the costs of the Nimitz-class carrier that will be incurred over the years in order to enable it to fulfill its mission:

$2.1 billion for the ship itself;

$3 billion for its complement of 90 aircraft of various types (most of which are for the defense of the carrier itself);

$3 billion for 6 escort ships for the defense of the carrier;

$1.5 billion for various replenishment and support vessels; and

$1.5 billion for its shore facilities.

Total: $11.1 billion just for the hardware itself.

But this is not all of the cost:

$11.1 billion for the hardware;

$22.6 billion to operate the carrier over its 35-year life; and $66 billion for 2 more carriers, which are necessary, one is reserve and one in overhaul.

Grand total: $100 billion.

A $2.1 billion authorization for a new super-class nuclear carrier can cost us as much as $100 billion. Unfortunately, we do not think of weapons systems in terms of force structures and missions, even though this is the name of the national security game. I suspect we are not inclined to this mode of thinking because the fiscal and other implications of our rather casual incrementalist decisions on national defense would blow our cover and confront us with the incredible implications of the decisions that we make.

I will leave aside for the time being the connection of the spending called for in the current defense authorization bill, on the one hand, and our Nation's security or even our defense against Russian moves in the world, on the other. Whether we like it or not, recent Russian successes in the Third World are centrally related to the sides they chose in the struggles and other political factors, not to how many nuclear carriers we have.

The best information available to me indicates that in terms of our military rivalry with the Soviet Union, we remain far ahead in numbers and firepower. For example, one estimate shows America as having 9,000 strategic and 22,000 tactical nuclear warheads—as compared to 4,500 strategic and 7,000 tactical on the Russian side. We remain ahead by several years in terms of nuclear technologies. Put in another way, we have enough weaponry now to kill every Russian 36 times, and every person on Earth 12 times. Is this not enough deterrence?

I oppose the defense authorization bill for these reasons. Coincidentally, this week the United Nations special session on disarmament convened, which will exist for 5 weeks. The nations of the world will spend over $400 billion this year on armaments, the equivalent of $1 million on guns, tanks, missiles, and bombs each and every minute of the day. The United States ranks first in the selling of arms. As one of the congressional advisers to the U.N. disarmament session, I plan to participate as much as possible in meeting with other delegates and addressing the issues of arms control and disarmament. The U.N. session is an opportunity, which may not happen again, for the world community to turn away from militarism and avert the catastrophe of nuclear war. It is worthwhile juxtaposing the defense authorization bill for fiscal year 1979 with the dialog in New York on arms control. I would respectfully suggest that the future of the world, depends more on what happens at the U.N. disarmament session than on the flagrantly irresponsible add-ons of weapons upon weapons that go into each year's defense authorization bill. Military spending, of the scale that we countenance, offers no hope at all.●

FOR THE BIRDS

HON. FORTNEY H. (PETE) STARK

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, this Thursday the 15th annual Leonard J. Waxdeck Bird Calling Contest will be conducted at Piedmont High School in Piedmont, Calif.

In these times of crisis when the world seems preoccupied with violence and strife, this unique event celebrates gentler pursuits. Students have worked long and hard to master the etherial flutescale of the veery, the variations on themes of the wood and hermit thrushes, the familiar trills of the goldfinch, bobolink, black-capped chickadee and, not to be ignored, the tappings, calls, and flight songs of sapsuckers and flickers. The familiar calls of the virtuoso songster, the song sparrow, will ring in Piedmont

High calling to mind the lively picture and joyful sounds of a May morning.

This contest is an exceptionally fine way to encourage young people to discover and explore woodland, field, and shoreline and to become familiar with their feathered residents. I salute those who participate and those who make it possible. This is an event which is truly for the birds.●

TERRORISM AND SAMI ESMAIL

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, on Monday, May 22, a briefing was held for Members of Congress and staff aides on the trial of Sami Esmail, a U.S. citizen, in Israel. A presentation was made by three members of the National Committee to Defend the Human Rights of Sami Esmail and by Esmail's defense attorney, Felicia Langer.

Sami Esmail was born in Brooklyn, N.Y., in 1954. In 1960, his family returned to the West Bank region of Jordan, now under the control of Israel. Esmail was educated in a Quaker school in the town of Ramallah. He returned to the United States in 1972 for university education. He is currently working toward a masters degree at Michigan State University in electrical engineering. To continue the sketch of events, Esmail was arrested upon his arrival in Israel on December 21, 1977; on December 25, he met with a U.S. consular official while still in detention. On December 26 and 27, he wrote and signed various documents in English and Hebrew admitting that he had traveled to Libya for 2 weeks in 1976 and attended a training camp of the Marxist-Leninist and terrorist Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP). He has been tried on charges of belonging to the PFLP, an organization outlawed in Israel for its terrorist acts; a verdict is expected early in June.

Prof. Robert Barr led off the talk. Barr, a member of the engineering department at Michigan State University, said he was acquainted with Esmail, that Esmail had not acted terroristically in his presence and that Esmail was a bright student. Barr, who had attended the Esmail trial, concluded an uninterrupted half hour of personal testimonials with the statement he was "sickened and outraged" by the charges that Esmail was a member of a terrorist group "because he's not an ordinary student * * * he had a .76 grade average"

Professor Barr is apparently unaware that most of the members of the Baader-Mainhof Gang, Red Brigades, Weather Underground, and the like have attended college, that some terrorists have higher degrees or are members of professions including PFLP leader George Habash, a medical doctor like Ernesto "Che" Guevara. The fact that a person has education in no way precludes their also being a member of a terrorist organization.

Reporting on Esmail's defense, the MSU professor said that Esmail had actually gone to Libya in August 1976 "to see about a job when he got his Ph. D." He admitted that at that time, Esmail's Ph. D. was "still a long way in the future." In fact at this time he is still working toward a masters degree.

Felicia Langer, Esmail's defense attorney, provided additional information. She stated that Esmail repudiated the nine-page confession in which he admitted being a member of the of the PFLP, having sold the PFLP magazine in Michigan, and having taken training with the group in Libya. According to Miss Langer, Esmail's trip to Libya was organized by the Libyan Arab Socialist Party (the ruling party in Colonel Qaddafi's dictatorship) through an unnamed friend in East Lansing. Langer did not find it unusual for a 22-year-old still 5 to 6 years away from his Ph. D. to travel to Libya to look for a future job. There was no mention of the leading role played by Libya in providing bases for international terrorist groups like the so-called Carlos network and the militant terrorist groups of the Palestine Liberation Organization's Rejectionist Front led by Habash's PLFP.

Professor Barr had said that the Esmail confession could not have been written by Sami Esmail, because it referred to the PFLP as a terrorist organization. Said Barr:

Sami would never refer to them as terrorists.

A member of the audience asked Attorney Langer whether she, personally, would characterize the PFLP as terrorist.

Ms. Langer then commenced a magnificent demonstration of how not to answer an embarrassing question. My opinion is not important; it is Sami's case that is important. Palestinians are human beings with rights to be safeguarded, and so on. Langer's questioner was persistent and again asked her to please state on the record whether or not she believed the PFLP was a terrorist group. After more statements of the I am not on trial variety she said:

No, the whole organization is not terrorist. I am not blaming or stigmatizing organizations.

In an outburst of increasing emotion, Langer denounced Israel's recent incursion into the Fatahland region of southern Lebanon and said that that was worse than what Palestinian groups or individuals are doing. She excused acts of terrorism, recent acts including the bus hijacking and barbaric machine-gunning of motorists in Israel and on Saturday the thwarted massacre attempt at Orly Airport in France, as a result of the occupation. Whether she meant Israeli control of the West Bank or whether she meant existence of the State of Israel as an occupation of Palestine was unclear.

I asked Ms. Langer why she, as a person born in Poland, who emigrated to Israel in the early 1950's as a young woman, and who was a member of the Central Committee of RADAH, the Communist Party in Israel, had not chosen to live in the Soviet Union rather than Israel. Langer's response was another highly emotional outburst. She said she and her family and her husband's family "were saved from the holocaust by the Soviet Union. We owe our lives to the Soviet Union." She said her childhood was spent in the Soviet Union during the Second World War, and reiterated that she owed them her life. She did not answer why she had gone to Israel if she owed so much to the U.S.S.R.

When I asked her whether she, as a survivor of the Nazi holocaust, thought that the Communist holocaust that was still continuing in Cambodia, Angola, Ethiopia, and other countries was also an atrocity, Ms. Langer walked out. The panel of "human rights for Sami Esmail" activists then decided the question was "out of order."

I would note that Langer, Robert Barr, and the two women from the Esmail support group, Meg Jacobson and Barb Tiebolt, made a great point over the fact that Esmail's indictment included actions that had taken place outside of Israel—taking training in a PFLP camp, selling PFLP literature, organizing support for the PLO and the like. Esmail grew up on the Jordanian West Bank and from 1967 to 1972 when he came to the United States to study, that region was under Israeli control. Therefore, it is unlikely that he was ignorant of the fact that membership in the PFLP is illegal in Israel, as is taking training in a terrorist camp in Libya. Esmail voluntarily entered Israel, thus placing himself under their jurisdiction. It seems the height of hypocrisy for Langer to object to the "extraterritoriality" of the offense of training in a PFLP camp and then entering Israel when her beloved Soviet Union exercises "extraterritoriality," including the kidnaping of anti-Communists and refugees to the U.S.S.R. for trial followed by execution or enslavement.

Another complaint made by the Esmail supporters was that they believe the FBI had provided the Israeli officials with information that Esmail was making a sudden trip to that country. Esmail says he suddenly left for Israel (in the middle of the MSU exam week), because he received a phone call that his father was very ill. His father indeed was ill and died early in January. They also state that the FBI had questioned Esmail about his trip to Libya in October 1977, a year after the event. They also admitted he had told the FBI that indeed he had been in Libya and that he had refused "to answer who arranged the trip or who went with him." They said that like Terry Fleener, another of Langer's clients recently convicted of being a member of and courier for the PFLP terrorists and who also is a U.S. citizen, Esmail was being "persecuted."

When I asked whether they objected in the abstract to the FBI telling an allied government that a terrorist who was a U.S. citizen was going to their country, they said they had no position on any question other than that Esmail is innocent.

As the meeting broke up, various supporters of Esmail asked the staffers present to help put pressure on the administration and on Congress to demand that Esmail be immediately released to return to the United States prior to the verdict.

The National Committee To Defend the Rights of Sami Esmail distributed information packets at the meeting including lists of endorsers. They included Saul Landau, the replacement to KBG agent Orlando Letelier at the Institute for Policy Studies' Transitional Institute, who in 1976 wrote to the chief of the Americas division of the Cuban Communist Party Central Committee that he felt it was time to become a full-time "propagandist" for revolution in the United States; George Murphy of the Afro-American newspaper chain and an identified member of the Communist Party, U.S.A.; Morton Halperin, organizer of efforts to smash the U.S. domestic and foreign intelligence agencies; Angela Davis of the Communist Party, U.S.A. Central Committee and a leader of the CPUSA's front, the National Alliance Against Racist and Political Repression (NAARPR); Leonard Weinglass of the CPUSA-front National Lawyers Guild who has been sent as an observer of trials of terrorists in Iran and recently defended members of the Symbionese Liberation Army; and a number of others who have been active in supporting the Vietcong, PLO, and similar terrorist "liberation movements."

The considerable internal contradictions in the presentation of the Esmail case, taken with Felicia Langer's emotional defense of the Soviet Union and long record of defense work for arrested terrorists in Israel, gives me the strong impression that the National Committee To Defend the Human Rights of Sami Esmail is more interested in making sure that a PFLP member escapes jail in Israel rather than in human rights.●

MEMORIAL DAY 1978

HON. CHRISTOPHER J. DODD

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. DODD. Mr. Speaker, this week communities across our Nation are preparing for the approaching Memorial Day celebrations. It is appropriate that we pause to pay tribute to our servicemen who have fought so gallantly for our Nation.

Since Memorial Day began to honor the soldiers who fell during the Civil War, approximately 736,000. American servicemen have lost their lives in succeeding conflicts. I call your attention to the fact that 2,446 American servicemen died during the Spanish-American War; World War I cost us 116,516 American servicemen's lives; 405,399 American servicemen perished during World War II; 54,246 American servicemen died during the Korean war. At the close of the conflict in Southeast Asia the death toll was 56,962. We must also remember that countless more servicemen were listed as MIA's or unaccounted for at the close of these conflicts.

Mr. Speaker, the statistics I have just quoted are indeed staggering. These losses are felt by all Americans.

On Memorial Day I hope that our Nation's leaders will not only remember the Americans who have died in war, but will open their hearts and minds to the present concerns of their survivors and comrades. We can ill afford to forget the sacrifices our veterans and their families have made for our country. We must not forget our obligations to assist our veterans in finding employment, obtaining medical, continuing their education, and finding housing. Memorial Day is an opportunity to heed these concerns.

Memorial Day is an appropriate time to reflect on the fact that the United States is not engaged in conflict with other nations. We have paid a tremendous price for peace. The peace we enjoy today has not been easy to come by. It may not be easy to retain.●

ROCKFORD, ILL., SCHOOLCHILDREN COMMENT ON FREE ENTERPRISE AND PRIVATE PROPERTY

HON. JOHN B. ANDERSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have been reading some essays about free enterprise which I would like to commend to my colleagues. While revealing to us their perspective of adult life, a group of seventh and eighth grade schoolchildren will often sweep aside the curtain of subjectivity obscuring our view of ourselves. Just such a group of students, from the schools in Rockford, Ill., were asked to write about "Why It's Important to Preserve the Right of Free Enterprise and Private Property Ownership." A few examples from these 13 and 14 year olds' essays will demonstrate, far better than my words, their strong sense of certain fundamental assumptions in our society. Rick Landgren, the seventh grader who won first place, said:

Local Rockford businessmen provide services and products for the people of Rockford. We have a better chance of having better services and higher quality products provided for us this way, than if we have to depend on businesses that are not locally owned.

Vicki Vince, the seventh grader who acheived second place, wrote:

Life's ambitions can be fulfilled. One can own his own business and work towards his own goals. Free enterprise encourages creativeness.

Linda Hippler, the eighth grader who was awarded first place, commented:

Without free enterprise, many rights are eliminated. The individual's right to earn the most money according to his ability and talent is destroyed. The right for business to compete with one another, abolished. For Americans, the purpose and desire to live is lessened.

Julie Ross, the winner of second place in the eighth grade contest, concluded:

Americans have had the freedom to become successful in their own businesses, and thus, feel a pride in their work. It is this pride that has made us the superior nation that we are. However, if the government interferes, this pride will be lost.

We must prove that we are able to control our lives and our businesses in such a way that government will not need to control them for us.

These words draw us back to the fundamental principles on which we base our society and our lives. The ability to return to basic principles is essential in a life where complexities build geometrically, jumbling our perspective. I would like to commend these students both on their awards and on their deep commitment, interest and involvement in a better future for America.●

BIG BROTHER

HON. OLIN E. TEAGUE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. TEAGUE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I wish to include an editorial from the May 11, 1978, edition of the Duncanville Suburban, of Duncanville, Tex., concerning the proposed directives of the Department of Agriculture with respect to the sale of so-called junk food in school buildings and school cafeterias.

I would agree that this food is not nutritious, but have we at last reached the point where the Federal Government is going to tell us what to eat.

Editorial follows:

LIVING GREEN

Have you heard about the latest in federal meddling in connection with our school systems? Big brother, this time in the form of the U.S. Department of Agriculture, wants to prohibit the sale of candy, soda water, frozen deserts and chewing gum on school premises until after the last lunch period. Their stand is being taken on a public law that gives them authority to prohibit the sale in schools of food items that the department determines to be of little nutritional value.

Well, now, we will have to admit there is little nutritional value in the items on the proposed list, but we just don't think it's up to the feds to tell us, or our children, what we can and can't eat. Such regulation is reserved, in our opinion, for the parents. And, if school officials choose to eliminate such foods from campus, that's fine, too. But the feds should not be able to come to Duncanville—or send word—that certain foods cannot be sold on campus during a specified time.

Something tells me that the federal lunch program just isn't getting the reception expected. Maybe too many of the so-called poor who supposedly can't afford good meals, are spending their money on junk. Certainly that doesn't make for a healthy diet, but don't each of us have the right to decide whether or not we eat good food or junk food? Should the federal government have the right to deny anyone the right of choice in such matters?

Oh, the junk food regulations are not all that serious, but they are just one more link in the ever growing chain of federal meddling in matters that are not federal business.

The ban is merely proposed at this stage and comments are invited by USDA. Comments may be sent to Margaret O'K. Glavin, acting director, school programs division.

LONG ISLANDERS BACK SALT TALKS

HON. THOMAS J. DOWNEY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. Speaker, this week the United Nations begins a month-long special session on disarmament. Meanwhile, the Carter administration SALT negotiators are continuing significant arms control talks with the Soviets at Geneva.

Some Members of Congress, and defense industry spokesmen, would have us believe that these two steps toward arms control will put us in an inferior military position with the Russians.

The American people see through the smoke and support arms control because they know that the costly and destabilizing weapons race must be stopped. I would like to insert into the RECORD a recent poll taken by Long Island's Newsday newspaper. The Newsday poll, surveying an area with a significant defense industry, clearly shows that Long Islanders are in favor of our SALT efforts and other attempts to put a lid on nuclear weapons.

SIXTY PERCENT SUPPORT AN ACCORD ON LIMITATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

(By Bernie Bookbinder)

As the current strategic arms limitation talks between the United States and the Soviet Union appear to be nearing their conclusion, Long Islanders solidly support ratification of the agreement that emerges.

Asked by LI Poll interviewers if they thought "it is in the best interest of the United States to sign a strategic arms limitation agreement with the Russians," 60 per cent of the random, representative sample of 526 Nassau and Suffolk telephone subscribers replied that it was, 34 per cent said that it wasn't and 6 per cent were undecided.

Responses to other questions turned up seeming contradictions, however, and suggested that some of the people who backed arms limitation, particularly those with strong anti-Communist feelings, were less then fully committed to SALT.

Professor Stephen Cole, a sociologist at the State University at Stony Brook, found when he analyzed responses to the basic arms limitation question that people who were better informed about the SALT discussions were more likely to support ratification. This was determined through a question aimed at finding out how familiar Long Islanders were with the talks and their purpose.

Those interviewed were asked if the talks were (1) an attempt to reach a European troop reduction agreement with the Russians, (2) an attempt to reach an agreement with the Russians on a ceiling on salt prices, or (3) an attempt to reach an agreement with the Russians on limitation of nuclear weapons. Seventy-one per cent correctly said that the talks dealt with nuclear weapons, while 3 per cent said troop reductions, 3 per cent said salt prices and 23 per cent said they didn't know the answer.

When the results were tabulated Cole found that among those who answered the question correctly, 62 per cent felt that the agreement was in the best interest of the United States, 33 per cent felt that it wasn't, and 5 per cent had no opinion, while among those who hadn't known what the SALT talks were about, 52 per cent said that they were in the U.S. interest, 38 per cent said they weren't and 10 per cent had no opinion.

In dealing with feelings about SALT, the poll was interested in the effect of attitudes about the relative military strengths of the United States and the Soviet Union.

When interviewers asked whether the United States was militarily more powerful than the Soviet Union, less powerful or equally powerful, 22 percent of the sample said "more powerful," 27 percent said "less powerful," 47 percent said "equally powerful," and 4 percent said they didn't know.

Analysis determined that, as might be expected, those who said that the United States was more powerful than the Soviet Union were more likely to support an arms limitation agreement than those who thought the Soviets were more powerful than the United States. Cole found that the people most in favor of an agreement were those who thought that the two nations were equally powerful.

As reported in yesterday's article, 44 percent of the sample thought that the United States should spend more money on defense than it does now, 19 percent said that it should spend less, 34 percent said that there should be no change, and 3 percent were undecided. When these responses were tabulated with attitudes toward SALT, it was found that those who favored reducing defense expenditures were more likely to back a SALT agreement than those who favored boosting defense spending and those who thought the present spending level should be maintained.

Aside from opposing arms limitation because they thought that the United States was militarily inferior to the Soviet Union and had to catch up, some people might be against SALT because they thought that the Soviets were not trustworthy. When Long Islanders were asked whether they agreed or disagreed that "the Russians can't be trusted to abide by an arms limitation agreement," a substantial proportion (70 percent) agreed, while 23 percent disagreed and 7 percent had no opinion. Those who thought the Russians couldn't be trusted were more likely to oppose an agreement than those who didn't feel that way. Among those who agreed that the Russians were not trustworthy, only 52 percent supported an arms limitation agreement, while among those who disagreed, 81 percent supported such an agreement.

Since there has been some feeling that detente with the Soviets should be linked to a liberalization of Soviet treatment of dissidents, those polled were asked whether or not they agreed that "the United States should refuse to sign an arms limitation agreement with the Russians unless they agree to recognize the basic human rights of their own citizens." Fully 63 per cent of Long Islanders agreed with the statement, while 32 per cent disagreed, and 5 per cent were undecided.

The responses to this question seem to contradict those given to the question of whether the United States should sign a SALT agreement with the Soviet Union. This contradiction, Cole said, indicates that not all of those who initially said that they favored SALT were equally committed to arms limitation and detente and that, when they were given the opportunity to justify withdrawing their support, they might do so. A further analysis of the data showed that the Long Islanders who changed their minds about SALT (when it was linked to Soviet human rights policies) were those who, in general, had strongly negative attitudes toward Communism and the Soviets. For example, those who believe that "it is the duty of the United States to prevent the Communists from taking over the world" were far more likely than those who didn't feel that way to think that the United States should refuse to sign a SALT agreement unless the Russians agree to respect human rights.

Finally, there has been some controversy over whether U.S.-Soviet relations have improved or worsened under President Carter. When the poll asked Long Islanders what they thought had taken place over the past year, the result was a virtual standoff: 17 per cent said that relations had gotten better, 18 per cent said that they had gotten worse, 62 per cent said that they were unchanged, and 3 per cent had no opinion.●

● Mr. STARK. Mr. Speaker, due to a prior commitment in my district I was absent for rollcall No. 336, Alaskan wilderness, on Thursday, May 18 and I missed all votes on Friday, May 19 when the House of Representatives concluded consideration on H.R. 39. Had I been present I would have voted "nay" on rollcall No. 336, an amendment to cut in half the wilderness acreage proposed for our national interest lands in Alaska. Had I been present on May 19, I would have voted "nay" on rollcall No. 338, an amendment that requires the President to submit a proposal to Congress by

October 1, 1981, for a procedure for evaluating applications by individuals wishing to carry out mineral exploration or extraction on conservation system lands. Had I been present I would have voted "nay" on rollcall No. 339 to recommit the bill to the Committees on Interior and Insular Affairs and Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and "yea" on rollcall No. 340, final passage of the bill.●

REDUCING INFLATION

HON. MAX BAUCUS

OF MONTANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. Speaker, inflation is among the most serious problems this Nation faces. The President has announced action he intends to take to counter price increases. But his efforts will not help unless Congress makes a strong commitment to reducing inflation.

The most recent statistics show prices increasing at an annual rate of 10 percent. Since 1975, we have had steady inflation of at least 6 percent.

This inflation erodes the standard of living for those who live on fixed incomes. It constantly creates imbalances and tensions in the society if some groups benefit and some lose from inflation. It inhibits business investment and growth by making it almost impossible for businessmen to predict future costs and prices.

We in Congress can take the lead in fighting inflation by voting for responsible spending and revenue measures, encouraging the growth of industrial productivity and paying attention to the Government regulatory process that provides inflationary pressure.

Deficit spending invariably leads to inflation. Our national economy still suffers from the 1975 recession, and some deficit spending may be necessary to maintain business and employment recovery.

But the $60 billion deficit proposed by the President this year is simply too large. Our House Budget Committee has approved a budget reducing the President's deficit. I support a smaller deficit and will oppose efforts to increase outlays. As we vote on spending measures in the coming months, we must consider the impact each will have on the budget deficit and resultant inflation.

Once inflation begins, it tends to sustain itself via the wage price spiral. The budget deficits run in the late 1960's in spite of low unemployment led to the unacceptable inflation we have now.

As the employment situation improves, the budget should be in surplus. As unemployment recedes, incomes, profits and tax revenues rise while unemployment-related expenditures fall. These natural tendencies should lead to a balanced budget, but historically they have not. Instead, Federal spending has increased dramatically in prosperous times.

I asked a successful amendment to the Full Employment Act which will require the President to submit a surplus budget when unemployment is low. Additionally, I will soon introduce the full employment Budget Surplus Act to provide further assurance that this Nation attacks its deficit spending and national debt problems.

It is important that we consider the inflationary impacts of Government regulations; these can be staggering. For example, housing has been affected by inflation such that many families can no longer afford their own homes. Shockingly, a congressional panel found that Federal regulations added $5,000 to the average cost of homes in an Oregon community.

Similarly, the increasing flood of Federal redtape has been an enormous burden for businessmen that has increased costs and forced the closing of many enterprises in Montana and elsewhere.

Most of these regulations come from executive agencies and departments which operate virtually unconstrained by congressional or judiciary oversight.

I cosponsored the Administrative Rulemaking Reform Act to provide additional opportunity for public participation in agency rulemaking and create opportunities for congressional and judicial review. I would urge this House to seriously consider that proposal. Additionally, we must consider the inflationary impact of all bills we pass. It would make sense to require "inflationary impact" estimates for major proposals.

Mr. Speaker and fellow colleagues, recent polls show that Americans regard inflation as this Nation's primary economic problem. As elected representatives, we have an obligation to pursue policies to combat inflationary pressure. We must meet that obligation.●

A TRIBUTE TO JOSEPH P. SHERIDAN

HON. JAMES J. FLORIO

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. FLORIO. Mr. Speaker, in memory of Mr. Joseph P. Sheridan of Gloucester City, N.J., I would like to enter the following statement. Joe Sheridan passed away on November 16, 1977.

During his lifetime, Joe Sheridan compiled an outstanding record in both civic affairs and public office. For five consecutive terms, Mr. Sheridan served as member of the Common Council of Gloucester City from January 1, 1962 to December 31, 1976.

As a councilman, Joe spearheaded several projects for the youth of his city. He was a leader in developing programs to build football fields, baseball fields, basketball courts, tennis courts, and playgrounds throughout Gloucester City.

Besides his elected responsibilities as councilman, Joe Sheridan was a member of the Camden County Democratic Committee, the Gloucester City Democrat Executive Committee, and a member of the Gloucester City Welfare Board.

He was a veteran of World War II, a charter member and president of the Gloucester City Sportsmen's Club and a member of the Gloucester Catholic Fathers Club, and Townsend C. Young VFW Post 3620 and the Gloucester City American Legion Post 135. Employed by Ragens Transportation Co., Joe was a member of Teamsters Local 676.

Joe Sheridan's lifetime career is a shining example of one man's dedication to his city, county, State, and its citizens within. Every position of responsibility he held was utilized to its fullest potential. He worked with untiring zeal and devotion and proved himself a capable leader with genuine concern for those he served.

His family and friends can be proud of this man's record. He will be sadly missed by those who loved him, knew him, and had the privilege of working with him.●

THE STATE HOSPITAL—HOW CAN IT SERVE?

HON. ALBERT H. QUIE

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. QUIE. Mr. Speaker, recently, we have seen a deserved emphasis placed on the need for more considerate approaches to treatment of mental disorders. Dr. Francis Tyce of the Rochester State Hospital in Rochester, Minn., has prepared a paper which was presented at the convention of the American Psychiatric Association in Atlanta earlier this month. Dr. Tyce has outlined what he feels are the services and qualities necessary for a mental health facility to best fulfill its purpose of helping the mentally and emotionally ill. Because it gives a very comprehensive view, I would like to share the paper with my colleagues. It reads as follows:

THE STATE HOSPITAL AS A CENTRE FOR MENTAL HEALTH AND A LEAST RESTRICTIVE ALTERNATIVE IN THE TREATMENT OF SOCIAL DYSFUNCTION

The socially dysfunctioning individual is one markedly out of phase with the society in which he lives. His dysfunction can be protean; mental illness, neurosis, marital or family problems, problems in functioning in living as a child, adolescent, adult, or aged person. His dysfunction can be caused by vocational problems, illegal behavior, rebelliousness against the system in which he lives; or by abuse of chemicals, alcohol; developmental disabilities, learning disorders, helplessness in the problem of adjusting to the life experience, loneliness, rejection, alienation by others of different racial and ethnic origin. This list is far from complete.

If a state hospital is to attempt to deal with some of these problems, what qualities should it possess, or try to develop, to assist those people I have called socially dysfunctioning?

The state hospital—

1. Should be visible to the community it serves. They should know where it is.

2. Should be accessible. Easy of access—on a good transportation pattern.

3. Must be available. 24 hours a day—7 days a week. A good hotel can be very visible, a skyscraper in the middle of the traffic pattern, but if it is closed, it is useless, it is not available. It is a hollow promise.

4. It must be penetrable, devoid of restrictive policies, and easily penetrated by consumers, relatives, visitors, media, other community facilities, and all sub units within the hospital should be easily penetrable also.

5. It must be credible. Those who work in the hospital and those who use it should believe in it.

6. The hospital must be cooperative, finding it easier to say yes than no in its relationship with the community, and the community facilities it works with.

7. The hospital must be Sensitive, attuned to all small cries from the community.

8. It must be Responsive, that is, willing to act.

9. It must be Flexible, willing to adapt.

10. It must be Changeable, that is, willing to give up old ideas.

11. It must be Creative, that is, willing to be imaginative.

12. It must be Courageous, willing to accept challenge and not regard timidity as a safer and desirable goal.

13. It must be Accountable to its consumers, its staff, its community, and its central authority.

If the hospital has the physical qualities of visibility, accessibility, availability, penetrability, and has developed credibility, and if it continuously strives to be cooperative, sensitive to the community needs for the treatment of its socially dysfunctioning, and most importantly responsive to these needs, and is willing to be flexible, changeable, then creative and courageous in trying to meet these needs, what programs might it develop for the socially dysfunctioning person?

For the mentally and emotionally ill, a psychiatric service should contain the following elements:

I. a. An inpatient adult psychiatric service in mixed male, female open units which are regionalized—that is each unit individually serves a certain fixed geographic area in the hospital's total receiving areas. These geographic sub areas should contain a community mental health center. Traffic between the inpatient unit and the area and community agencies it serves should be open, encouraged, reciprocal and continuous.

b. A Day Hospital for patients who need not stay in hospital at night.

c. A Day Nursery attached to the Day Hospital. Since most patients in a Day Hospital program are women and married, they need somewhere to leave their preschool children while they use the Day Hospital. The Day Nursery is available to patients who use other services on the hospital campus, staff people who have a family crisis and to volunteers who work regularly at the hospital and cannot find or afford regular baby sitting.

d. A Night Hospital. Unlike the Day Hospital which will be a separate entity—each psychiatric unit can function as its own night hospital.

e. Adolescent in-patient services with an accredited school program supervised and staffed by the local school district.

f. Out-Patient Services. Again each psychiatric unit should provide out-patient services to those who need it after previous hospitalization. Thus continuity of care is provided by the team that looked after the patient in hospital.

II. For the socially dysfunctioning who are chemically dependent, the following programs are needed:

a. A Detoxification service for those chemically intoxicated.

b. A Chemically Dependency Unit closely associated with the Detoxification Unit so passage from it to the treatment unit is easy and expected.

c. Night programs for the still working alcoholic.

d. Diversionary programs designed in conjunction with local judges so treatment rather than punishment is an alternative which can be chosen by the chemically dependent law breaker.

e. Half-Way Houses for those who can now work in the community, but still need supervised living arrangements.

f. Programs for the families of the chemically dependent so they can develop understanding and support in his efforts to obtain sobriety.

III. Residential care for the developmentally disabled—both long term programs designed in conjunction with the local school district, and respite care for shorter periods of time. Here the resident lives at home and can be admitted for short periods when the parents need assistance in learning to program for him at home, or when there is parental illness, a family crisis, or simply a need for a parental vacation.

IV. A Geriatric Service for the dysfunctioning aged person, living alone, or with family, or in a nursing home. Admission should be made easy, and close cooperation and swift assistance given. This will persuade both nursing homes and family to take the patient back when they have the assurance of good followup care.

V. Residential Care for the Criminal Offender—another group of socially dysfunctioning people both young and adult. The State Hospital has had long experience in helping to create and design new programs. It is sensitive also the effects of total institutionalization and has a lot to offer in helping to set up programs in community corrections.

VI. Special programs—the State Hospital might help to set up programs for state-wide needs, for children services, forensic services, and special diagnostic and treatment services.

VII. For all these programs a strong medical service is a vital necessity, for even if we are willing to question the medical model, the consumer is not. He is still old fashioned—when he comes to a hospital campus he expects good medical care.

VIII. Vocational and Rehabilitation Services. Years ago in Phase I in the history of state hospitals, the hospital may have provided good medical care and benign custody. With the advent of new drugs and new techniques, the hospital moved to Phase II or the removal of symptoms and revolving admissions. Now in Phase III we know good medical care, removal of symptoms is not enough, without vocational counseling, and habilitation, and rehabilitation that makes certain the patient on discharge is vocationally independent and self-supporting.

Thus the state hospital may respond to local, regional and state-wide needs and create a diversity of programs. But to do this it needs money and personnel. I doubt any state hospital has ever had, or will have, enough money. The hospital should therefore have a basic unchanging commitment that it will strive to give away all, or as much as it can, of its operation back to community control, community funding, and community programming. If completely successful the "hospital" image disappears, the diveristy of programs remain, and the campus becomes a regional resource for the socially dysfunctioning person.

Personnel in state hospital systems is equally as scarce as money, but here we can substitute ingenuity, and historically state hospitals have demonstrated ingenuity. If personnel time in patient contact can be increased, then their usefulness expands. The commitment should be that all clinically trained personnel, psychiatrists, psychologists, social workers, nurses, rehabilitation workers etc. should remain in positions of direct patient care. If the director of the hospital is a psychiatrist, he should have clinical responsibility for one psychiatric unit. To maintain highly trained professionals in administrative work only is to waste their expertise and leads to program design without continuing experience, and communication by memoranda—a time consuming, self deceiving relatively inaccurate method of communication.

Responsibility and authority to act and to participate in treatment planning should be forced down and down, through all staff levels down to and including the patient and his family.

Why should the psychiatrist spend time compiling the psychiatric history? This should be done by the patient's primary nurse with the patient writing his own developmental history and autobiography which is then included as part of the psychiatric history. Who knows his developmental history better than the patient? The psychiatrist can read it later. The patient's autobiography should include his list of the problems that have brought him into the hospital and his ideas for their solution. To make the best use of time, remember that confrontation with the patient and his problems should be direct and speedy. Transference develops rapidly when time is short.

All interviewing with patient, patient and relatives, patient and community resources should be interviewing shared with the patient's primary nurse and other team members who will work with the patient. Single interviewing between patient and psychiatrist means that information gained has to be passed on often incompletely to other staff after the interview, and time is thus wasted.

I have yet to meet a patient who will not discuss his problems frankly with a number of people in the room, when he realizes all are interested in helping him. This does not obviate single staff to patient psychotherapeutic treatment sessions when it is indicated.

Discharge summaries can be written by the head nurse or unit director, read and countersigned by the unit psychiatrist, freeing more of his time for patient contact and teaching on his own unit.

The work of recreational therapists can be greatly expanded by inviting young people or resident volunteers, to live in the units with patients, in exchange for room and board. They can devise one-to-one or group activities for patients during the empty times when staffing is lowest—the evenings and weekends.

HOSPITAL INTERFACE WITH THE COMMUNITY:

The hospital should be seen as an important ally in the communities' attempts at social engineering and social planning. Sound trusting relationships must be built between hospital, law enforcement, courts, media and citizen groups all of whom are prime movers in community action and can support or deter new programs for the socially dysfunctioning person.

What happens to a state hospital if it becomes a centre for mental health?

It is predictable that:

1. Hospital census will go down.
2. Admissions will go up.
3. The % of voluntary admissions where people seek treatment volitionally will go up.
4. Outpatient visits will increase.

To have said at the beginning of this paper that I was describing a particular hospital would have been presumptuous, to have described as existing, what actually does not exist would have been delusionary.

I'm sure I have described nothing that is not familiar to you who work in state hospitals across the country, but if some aspects are unfamiliar, the operating policies and the program activities described all exist on the campus of the state hospital where I work which I hope make it with other cooperative but autonomous programs based on the campus a center for mental health and a least restrictive alternative in the treatment of the socially dysfunctioning individual in souteastern Minnesota.●

THE INABILITY TO PROTECT OURSELVES

HON. DAVID L. CORNWELL

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. CORNWELL. Mr. Speaker the ever increasing threat of attack on United States soil by those who would enjoy our destruction is a thought we all find to be deplorable. I find the probable inability of this great Nation to protect its populace in the face of such a threat to be inexcusable.

Today this body will be considering measures which would more adequately protect our citizens in the event of war. I make reference to H.R. 10929, the Department of Defense Appropriation Act for fiscal year 1979, and more specifically title VII of the bill which pertains to civil defense.

The May 21 edition of the Washington Post's Parade Magazine carried as its cover story an article by Michael Satchell which discusses the comparative status of this country's civil defense capabilities. I strongly urge my colleagues to study carefully the article which follows:

WHY THE U.S. WORRIES ABOUT NEGLECTED CIVIL DEFENSE

(By Michael Satchell)

WASHINGTON, D.C.—It's called "Mutual Assured Destruction"—or MAD for short. Conventional wisdom has it that war between the United States and the Soviet Union is impossible because each side knows it would be destroyed in the holocaust of a nuclear exchange. Right?

Wrong.

From the Pentagon to the White House to the halls of Congress, there is mounting concern that the scales of nuclear balance may be tipping the scales steadily in favor of the Soviets.

The reason: a massive, continuing civil defense buildup in Russia to protect not only Kremlin leaders but the Russian population and its industry. Intelligence experts estimate the USSR has invested $65 billion in the last decade in an ambitious program to ensure national survival in a nuclear war.

This country has spent a comparatively paltry $898 million on civil defense during the past 10 years, and Bardyl Tirana, head of the Pentagon's Defense Civil Preparedness Agency (DCPA), candidly admits: "We have no civil defense program, merely the apparatus to start one. When you look at civil defense in the United States, you find the emperor has no clothes."

To many Americans, the subject of civil defense is a bore, but contemplate this scenario concocted for next year by Pentagon doomsday planners. The events envisioned happen over a two- to three-month period, starting next spring.

DOOMSDAY SCENARIO

War breaks out in the Middle East and Soviet "volunteers" join the Arab forces . . . in Germany, Soviets block access on the Berlin autobahn and NATO forces are mobilized . . . conventional air and ground battles break out and NATO forces are pushed back . . . the U.S. responds with tactical nuclear strikes on Soviet offensive positions in Europe and they reply in kind . . . the fighting escalates and within days the two superpowers are on the brink of all-out nuclear war.

Should the worst happen, Tirana estimates that up to 145 million Americans would be killed or lethally dosed with radiation—even given a couple of months lead time to throw together some kind of civil defense shelter and evacuation program.

But the Soviets, with their superior civil defense, would lose less than 10 million, several experts estimate.

In the case of a surprise attack on the U.S. by the Soviets—that is, with only two or three days' advance warning—the casualty gap could be even more glaring.

Maj. Gen. George Keegan, who retired last year as head of Air Force intelligence, believes that an unexpected nuclear strike could kill 160 million Americans, while our return salvo would kill 5 million Russians.

"This is how far Soviet civil defense preparations have progressed," Keegan says. "In a nuclear war today, we as a nation would die. The Soviet Union would survive. Their cities would be destroyed, but basically their leadership, control apparatus and urban population would survive."

ASK CARTER FOR DOUBLE

Concern over the ominous buildup of Soviet civil defense has been expressed on several key fronts recently. Both the National Security Council and the Department of Defense have just completed secret studies, and Defense Secretary Harold Brown has recommended to President Carter that civil defense spending be more than doubled to $230 million a year.

Brown reportedly told the President that such a sum could buy a modest population relocation and fallout shelter program that could cut expected U.S. casualties in nuclear war from four-fifths of the population to about one-half.

Lt. Gen. Samuel V. Wilson, head of the Pentagon's Defense Intelligence Agency, told a Congressional committee in recently released secret testimony that Soviet civil defense in another five to six years could alter the strategic military balance between the two nations.

President Carter, who wants reduced Soviet civil defense spending as part of an arms limitation agreement, has reinstituted White House nuclear evacuation rehearsals—a practice ignored since the Cuban missile crisis.

National Security Adviser Zbigniew Brzezinski and his secretary—playing the roles of President and Mrs. Carter—tested the procedures in an unannounced drill one night, catching the Secret Service napping and finding the whole evacuation machinery extremely rusty.

It took 45 minutes to get "President" Brzezinski out of the White House and aboard the National Airborne Command Post Boeing 747 stationed a 10-minute helicopter ride away at Andrews Air Force Base.

Subsequent mock alerts have polished the plan, and President Carter—anxious to underscore his interest in nuclear readiness—has flown aboard his airborne command post, taken a nine-hour sail on a nuclear submarine, visited the Strategic Air Command headquarters in Nebraska and several emergency command posts around Washington.

While preparations for the safety of the President, his family and government leaders may be up to snuff, plans for the rest of the country are woefully inadequate. A comparison with the Soviets underlines just how much.

Take the respective civil defense bosses. America's Bardyl Tirana is a lawyer by training whose job was staging the Presidential inaugural activities before Carter appointed him to head the DCPA in April 1977. Although he may be an able administrator, Tirana admitted when he was tabbed for the DCPA job that he knew next to nothing about civil defense.

The Soviet program is headed by Alexander Altunin, a four-star general in the Soviet army. He commands a civil defense military force on equal footing with their army, navy and air force. In Russia, there are several civil defense academies much like West Point and Annapolis, and General Altunin has dozens of regiments of troops whose entire training and duty are devoted to civil defense.

Tirana heads an agency of 600 federal employees who coordinate civil defense activities with about 5500 state and local workers—their primary focus being more on natural disasters, such as fires and floods, rather than on nuclear attack. This year's DCPA budget is about $91 million, most of it spent to simply maintain a framework upon which a civil defense program could be built.

In the USSR, according to Harriet Fast Scott, an expert on Soviet civil defense, Altunin runs a program with 100,000 active-duty military personnel involved every day in civil defense, and Soviet spending is currently running at about $1 billion a year, 10 times what the U.S. spends.

Soviet civil defense courses and training are compulsory up to the age of 60. Children are introduced to the subject in second grade and study it throughout their academic careers. Adults are required to complete 40 hours of study.

Throughout the country, the government has erected model training villages of bombed-out buildings, downed power lines and other debris where civilians practice firefighting, rescue, medical aid and restoring public services. They also are taught how to build emergency shelters and they learn decontamination procedures to combat fallout.

Gen. George S. Brown, chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, estimated in his 1978 message to Congress that the Soviets have enough hardened blast shelters to protect 10 to 20 percent of the work force from all but a direct hit.

PREARRANGED SHELTERS

In the event of imminent attack, Russian industrial workers would go underground and the rest of the urban population would head for prearranged relocation areas in small towns and villages.

There is evidence that these are more than paper plans. The Soviet press has carried stories about city families actually traveling to their assigned relocation areas to meet the families with whom they would live.

During the past 15 years the Soviets have dispersed their industry throughout the country instead of creating Russian equivalents of Chicago, Detroit or Pittsburgh that provide easy, inviting targets during a nuclear war.

Additionally, much of their industrial equipment and machinery has been "hardened" by using permanent protective canopies, structures and sandbagging techniques.

MACHINERY IS KEY FACTOR

The Boeing Company of Seattle did actual blast tests using Soviet industrial hardening techniques and found that while a factory roof may be blown off, more than half the machinery remained usable—a key factor if a nation is to struggle back to its economic feet after a nuclear knockdown.

Another key element of the Soviets' overall defensive plan is the stockpiling of enough food in huge underground storage depots to feed their population for at least a year.

All of this information has been gathered by Western military and intelligence experts from such sources as Soviet publications, interviews with defectors and emigrés, and from reconnaissance satellites. But what it means is open to interpretation.

Some believe it to be nothing more than a paper plan, a grandiose program that would—given the notorious inefficiency of the Soviet system and bureaucracy—fall apart if ever put to a true test.

Others see it as irrefutable evidence that the Soviets are planning for an Armageddon in which their losses would be acceptable, thus encouraging them to attack first and win.

What really matters is not whether the Soviets can win a nuclear war, but whether they believe they can—a supposition likely to be reinforced if they compare their civil defense program with ours. With the rough balance of nuclear weaponry, civil defense today could make the difference.

Our own DCPA was recently described in a Congressional report as "the orphan of the Department of Defense," and its threadbare program reflects this lowly status.

The agency, for example, has eight regional command centers, but only six are underground and blast-proof.

And though DCPA has more fallout shelter spaces nationwide than there are people, they are not all in the right place—meaning some areas have far more spaces than needed and others not enough.

Stockpiling the large public shelters has been largely discontinued. Much of the $150 million worth of food once stored in the shelters has spoiled and either been used as pig fodder or sent overseas before it became too rancid. Drugs, medical supplies and Geiger counters have been removed from the shelters for fear of theft.

Relocating urban populations to the countryside—which is DCPA's strategy for the future—isn't feasible in such areas as the Boston-New York-Washington corridor, the Chicago-Detroit complex and the state of California, most of which are prime target areas for attack.

Planners wonder if—in an unregimented society such as ours—an orderly mass evacuation can be accomplished with the threat of nuclear attack only days or hours away. Will troops desert? Will police officers, bus and train drivers and other vital workers report to their posts or simply take their families and join the exodus?

Says Tirana: "You do your best to protect the entire nation, although you know the chances for relocation working in some areas are better than in others. You have to do more than get people out of town. You have to have the ability to support the relocated population until the crisis has passed. And who knows how long that will be?"

If President Carter and Congress approve the Pentagon's request for increasing the civil defense budget in order to begin planning a relocation program, it will represent only a modest effort designed to save maybe half the population. It will not pay any attention to protecting industry.

That's about the cheapest program money can buy. A top-of-the-line program, planners say, would cost $12 billion, or about $50 per person, and protect 93 percent of the population in a nuclear attack. That's a little over one-tenth of this year's total U.S. defense budget of $117 billion.

FRACTION OF SOVIET OUTLAY

While $12 billion is a considerable expenditure, it is much less than the $65 billion spent since 1968 by the Soviets and only twice the anticipated cost of Washington, D.C.'s, planned 100-mile subway system, most of which will be paid for by the federal government.

Though several federal agencies are responsible for civil defense, the DCPA is the principal one, and Tirana is a worried, frustrated man.

"The law says we shall have a civil defense program and protect the people, but we are not doing it," he says. "I just wish the Executive and the Congress would make a decision, because right now we are not prepared."

Just how unprepared can best be summed up by Tirana's reply when asked what he would do with his wife and two children if a nuclear attack were imminent.

After a long, thoughtful pause, he replied: "I don't know. I guess I'd tell my wife to get in the car and start driving. To where, I don't know." ●

THE WORKING PEOPLE ARE THE SCAPEGOATS

HON. BARBER B. CONABLE, JR.

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, a little over a week ago, the President announced that he would revise his recommendations to the Congress on taxes to scale down his proposed reduction from $24.5 billion in fiscal year 1979 to $15 billion for that period. His three-paragraph statement is as vague as to the reasons for this abrupt policy change as is his overall political philosophy.

What makes this latest policy waffle of the President most incredible is that he has repeatedly stated he wouldn't take such action and his key advisers have continually pleaded for a tax cut of the size recommended by the President in order to assure economic expansion. As late as the day of the surprise announcement, Secretary of Commerce Krebs was reported to be calling for the President's tax package saying: "It is no time to waffle on taxes."

The previous week, in a speech to the National Press Club, the President's chief economic adviser, Charles L. Schultze, made a ringing endorsement of the President's tax program—particularly the size of the tax cut—and linked it to the administration's growing concern about inflation. The following excerpts from that speech underlined the administration's position as of May 2. Of course on May 12, it had changed completely. First, the administration on May 2:

We need a tax cut and we need a sizeable one. Without it, the recovery will be in serious danger of faltering next year."

We estimate that failure to enact the President's tax program would cost the economy almost 1 million jobs by the end of 1979, and unemployment might therefore be rising again next year.

. . . Abandoning the tax cut might have a small effect on inflation. But that slight improvement would come at an enormous cost—a million jobs, and $40 billion in cost output by late 1979.

The downward insensitivity of the rate of wage and price inflation to moderate increases in the level of unemployment and idle capacity is the very essence of our nation's most troubling economic problem. If a modest increase in the current economic slack—as might be produced by cutting back or delaying the tax cut—could yield a prompt and significant reduction in the inflation rate, then such a course might well recommend itself. But the World isn't built that way, and the gains would be far outstripped by the costs.

Ten days later on May 12, the administration did another flip-flop by announcing that it would scale back its tax recommendations by $10 billion. The same administration spokesman, CEA Chairman Schultze in briefing the press:

We do not believe, . . . that this action will increase the rate of unemployment above our earlier forecasts.

This change would slightly reduce the projected rate of growth but only by a small amount. But, it would do it.

He also indicated that if the economy continues "to behave as it appears to be moving, no further changes will be needed" but that he could not rule out "further changes if there are more radical changes in the economy" in the future. Thus it seems that the only thing that is constant about the administration's economic policy is change—from one week to the next.

I have recited this history to illustrate what should be obvious—that the President has no economic or tax policy and that, accordingly, the Congress should put no more weight on his most current views than it was prepared to prior to the latest waffle. Most importantly, we must look to the impact of the latest administration proposal, what would it mean, who would it affect and how?

If we assume that $10.5 billion of the $15 billion total tax cut—70 percent—goes to individuals it would mean an average reduction of $3 per return per week. Yet inflation over the 2-year period since the last tax cut has increased taxes on individuals alone by $15 billion or $4.30 per return per week. The President's plan is not to cut taxes but only slow the rate of tax increases.

The apparent justification for reducing the size of the tax cut is to have a smaller deficit. While that goal is laudatory, it should be apparent that this can be accomplished more satisfactorily by reducing spending than by not having a larger tax cut. Yet, the administration adamantly refuses this route since it would obviously damage its already shaky relations with special interest political constituencies on whom it relies for political support.

The only real loser in the President's proposal are taxpaying working people whose incomes are already overtaxed by a Democratic-controlled executive branch and Congress.

In my view, we should cut taxes by at least $25 billion and reduce spending accordingly to achieve the budget deficit level projected by the Budget Committee. Why are working people always the scapegoats and nonworking people the beneficiaries of this administration's economic policies? The time has come for the taxpayers of this country to protest against an administration and a Democratic Congress who considers them pawns in an economic and political chess game. ●

PERSONAL STATEMENT

HON. AL ULLMAN

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. ULLMAN. Mr. Speaker, because of two long-scheduled engagements in Oregon, I was absent from Washington the latter half of Thursday, May 18, and all day Friday, May 19. I missed several votes on H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act of 1978.

Had I been in attendance, Mr. Speaker, I would have voted in favor of H.R. 39 as passed by the House and would have opposed all other substitutes.

Thank you very much for this opportunity to clarify my position on this important legislation. ●

THE FIRST AMENDMENT AND THE CHAINS

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, I and 74 other Members of the House have joined in introducing a piece of legislation that has sparked a great deal of interest within the newspaper industry.

That bill, H.R. 12395, the Local Independent Newspaper Act of 1978, simply provides the means by which publishers of locally owned and operated newspapers can finance the heavy burden of estate taxes without forced sale of the newspaper property.

This threat of sale because of taxes is a principal factor in the decision by many independent newspaper owners to sell their properties to newspaper chains. The large chains, most public corporations capable of financing purchases through the issuance of stock, have been likened to scavengers awaiting the first signs of uncertainty and concern by publishers before swooping down with generous merger and acquisition offers.

Ever since I first voiced concern about the trend toward concentration within the communications industry, and proposed this modest piece of legislation, I have encountered two questions which cause hesitation even among publishers who would like some protection from forced sale. Those questions revolve around concern that congressional action would somehow jeopardize the first amendment protections of the Constitution, and, secondly, that singling out one element of the economy might be resented by the business community.

I have countered these concerns by noting that this legislation has no regulatory aspects whatsoever and that the press as an institution is unique in its social implications and has been singled out by the framers of the Constitution to play a unique and important role in keeping constructive public access to the facts and a forum for diverse opinion alive in our governmental process.

Absentee ownership of newspapers is on the rise. With it there is a loss in the sociopolitical role of the local newspaper—a loss that can only diminish the newspaper's function as envisioned by the framers and protected by the first amendment.

Chief Justice Burger recently called attention to the applicability of first amendment provisions to the giant media conglomerates in an important comment on the trend within the communications industry—a comment not lost on the giants.

And on May 17 of this year, the respected and articulate former editorial page editor of the New York Times, John B. Oakes, also commented on this trend in giving the Washington Journalism Center's Frank E. Gannett Memorial Lecture.

Mr. Speaker, I commend Mr. Oakes' speech to the attention of all my colleagues. The speech follows:

SPEECH BY JOHN B. OAKES

Most of you in this room tonight—being in one way or another connected with the press, or with government, or even with both—will surely agree with the late Justice Black of the Supreme Court of the United States who, nearly forty years ago, viewed "the guarantee of the First Amendment as the foundation upon which our government structure rests and without which it could not continue to endure."

Some of you in this room will agree that freedom of the press as guaranteed by that same First Amendment, has in recent years been under an insidious attack frequently in the courts, sometimes in the legislatures—an attack which finds its wellspring in an underlying public attitude toward the press, of mistrust resentment and fear.

But I doubt that very many of you in this room will agree with me at this moment—though I hope you will at the end of my talk—when I say that I think a good deal of the fault for this situation in which press freedom is under attack—and a great deal of the cure for it—lies in the hands of the press itself.

The issue of freedom of the press is of course as old as our country, dating all the way back to 1690 when the very first American news-letter, not far behind its English counterparts, was born in Boston. It was known as "Publick Occurrences," lasted only one issue, and was immediately suppressed by the royal governor of Massachusetts because that one issue included a couple of early if primitive examples of investigative journalism: an account of the corruption of Indians by the colonists and the seduction of his daughter-in-law by the King of France—two forms of human endeavor, corruption and seduction, that are not totally foreign to our investigative press today. But "Publick Occurrences," as the outraged governor noted, had been published "without the least. . . . countenance of authority," and so it ended almost before it began. The next newspaper to appear a few years later had better luck, lasting until the Revolution, because it carried under its logo the telling phrase "Published by authority," which doubtless improved its fortunes and certainly stultified its contents.

Eventually adopted, press freedom—the right to publish anything one pleased "without countenance of authority" was taken for granted, and exercised to the fullest—though not yet written into law. When it was, a few years later with adoption of the First Amendment, it was couched in broad but negative terms, that "Congress shall make no law. . . . abridging the freedom. . . . of the press . . ." It carried with it no guarantee that publishers and editors would act responsibly or with restraint, no guarantee even that the press should be a free marketplace for ideas and opinions or a forum for debate.

However, the rationale for a guaranty of press freedom would seem to rest on the assumption that the discussion of public affairs and the expression of opinion would be the primary function of the press—at least that was the function that required the special protection. The Supreme Court has repeatedly emphasized its belief that the First Amendment's major purpose was "to protect the free discussion of governmental affairs."

And it may have been this postulate that Alexander Hamilton had in mind when, in the last but one of the Federalist papers, at the height of the debate in New York over adoption of a Constitution that then contained no Bill of Rights, he wrote of the press: ". . . its necessity, whatever fine declaration may be inserted in any constitution respecting it, must altogether depend on public opinion and on the general spirit of the people and of the government."

I think it's something that the embattled press ought to have very much in mind today, as it defends itself on First Amendment grounds against perceived attempts of courts or legislatures to erode its freedom. We need to remember that it is the "general spirit of the people" on which, as Hamilton pointed out, the basic guarantees must ultimately depend.

And this is the issue I want to discuss with you this evening: the relationship of the press to the "General spirit of the people"—what it portends and what can be done about it.

The American press has changed completely in character, in structure and even, to a considerable extent, in purpose not only over the past two hundred years, when the First Amendment was written into the Constitution, but over the past twenty years; and it is changing at an accelerated pace every day.

It isn't the press alone that is changing. It is the audience, too. With a change in character and in audience has come a change in public attitudes toward the press, a weakening in that public understanding and support of the First Amendment in "the general spirit of the people," that is the rock on which its protective power ultimately rests. Unless we establish a new relationship between press and public, we are eventually going to see the basic Constitutional guaranty outmoded in the public mind, and therefore, because the courts do indeed eventually follow the election returns, weakened by courts or legislature if not ultimately destroyed.

Hardly a hundred years ago, we were in the golden age of personal journalism. It took little capital to start a newspaper, little readership to keep it alive. What it did take was a strong, articulate editor who had a distinct point of view and was willing and able to express himself with force and cogency. This was the era of the partisan personalities of American journalism, whose names—Greeley, Bennett, Dana, Pulitzer—were synonymous with their newspapers.

As industrialization developed, education broadened, and means of communication improved, the limited audience to whom the editors of the 19th century were addressing their message, changed both qualitatively and quantitatively. Publishers and editors discovered that the new mass audience was interested in a wider spectrum of news and information than had been the norm for the relatively rarefied elite of earlier decades, a point Adoph Ochs demonstrated in two ways when, to save his tottering newspaper at the turn of the century, he broadened and deepened its content and at the same time lowered its price.

The old-style, highly competitive personal journalism began to give way to the journal of information; and throughout this century, through two world wars and on to the present day, American newspapers, reflecting and at the same time stimulating existing trends in American industrial society, have increasingly moved toward a kind of standardization and away from the peculiar and often erratic individualism that had once been their characteristic.

They have also become Big Business, a development that has already had and will doubtless continue to have a subtly adverse effect on both public and judicial perception of the First Amendment's protection of press freedom. What has happened, especially in the last 20 years, is that there has been a massive concentration of control of larger and larger numbers of newspapers in fewer and fewer top managerial hands; huge corporate conglomerates are replacing private or individual ownership; and along with this trend there has been a corresponding reduction of competition to the point where less than 50 of the 1550 cities of this country with daily papers have two or more under competing ownership.

It's easy to say that these developments have been inevitable, paralleling similar developments in many other areas of commerce and industry; but it is just because the free working of the press, both print and electronic, is of such peculiar importance in our democratic society that the consequences of this kind of evolution take on a special significance, threatening to undermine Constitutional protections that we now take for granted.

Press freedom is not something to be taken for granted simply because that one phrase was written as an afterthought into the Constitution. In much of the world—and not only in Communist countries—it is not even accepted in principle; and in most of the rest of the world, where it is in fact accepted in principle, it is rejected in practice. In many areas the press is considered to be properly a creature of the state rather than its critic; and many millions of people who theoretically believe in freedom as we understand it have been forced to learn to live without it. It is easily undermined; and I think that we of the American press would be living in a fool's paradise if we believed that we could continue to enjoy public support for our Constitutional protection under the First Amendment, if we forgot our implied responsibilities under it. By allowing our credibility to be eroded or destroyed.

The First Amendment as it applies to the press is clearly designed to protect a public rather than a vested interest; our Constitutionally protected purpose is essentially one of public service rather than private profit.

Only a few days ago, the Chief Justice of the United States wrote a concurring opinion in which he went out of his way to state, in effect. that he could see little if any distinction between the First Amendment rights of a newspaper corporation and those of any other kind of corporation. It is clear that Mr. Justice Burger believes that the Constitutional guarantee of freedom of the press does not necessarily involve protection of the press as a unique kind of institution requiring the special institutional protection that Mr. Justice Stewart, for example, attributes to it. The point is important not only because Mr. Burger is Chief Justice, but because he has put his finger on a Constitutionally tender spot in the anatomy of huge press corporations.

While he spoke against "limiting the First Amendment rights of corporations as such", Mr. Burger seemed at the same time to be suggesting a reinterpretation of First Amendment protections in light of—and here I quote—"the evolution of traditional newspapers into modern corporate conglomerates in which the daily dissemination of news by print is no longer the major part of the whole enterprise. . . ."

The converse of Mr. Justice Burger's opinion implicit in this recent Massachusetts case fits, I believe, a growing public perception of press conglomerates replete with built-in conflicts of interest. I think this perception may lead to a questioning of the need for special protection of the press as such, under a First Amendment that was in fact designed to ensure the free flow of information and opinion, and not the accretion of corporate power.

As the capital investment required to produce and publish newspapers has increased, three distinct but related economic developments have taken place, affecting the industry and its relationship to the public; the formation of "media conglomerates" linking under one ownership a wide variety of large enterprises; the establishment of enormous newspaper and broadcasting chains; and the development of both conglomerates and chains into publicly-held stock corporations. When to the already great power of a quasi-monopoly in a given city is added the greater strength of chain ownership, some troublesome questions of public policy are inevitably raised.

While many chains operate in such a way as to leave editorial independence in the hands of individual components, and use their vast resources to upgrade their papers—as has happened in a large number of cases already—this is not true of all chains and there is no guarantee that it will always be true of any. The potential threat of centralized, remote control, of concentrated economic and editorial power, is always there.

The late Justice Black, considered to be the most "absolutist" of all justices of the Supreme Court on freedom of the press issues, warned as long ago as 1945 that the First Amendment "rests on the assumption that the widest possible dissemination of information from diverse and antagonistic sources is essential to the welfare of the public." I think it's not too great a temptation to read for "diverse and antagonistic sources," the substitution of diverse and competitive ownership.

The ten largest newspaper chains control one-third of the country's total readership—20 out of 61 million. And the big chains are getting bigger, as our hosts of tonight have so recently and dramatically demonstrated.

As the mad race within the communications industry toward bigger combinations and conglomeration goes on, we are going to see intensified moves to extend anti-trust and other kinds of restrictive legislation, which will of course be fought on "free press" grounds, much as the efforts to break up industrial trusts and combines early in this century were also fought—and with the probability of just as little success.

As recently as 15 or 20 years ago, no newspaper shares were traded on the stock market. Today there are at least a dozen, including some of the largest newspaper corporations, controlling in all about 20% of national circulation. There are perfectly sound economic reasons for this trend, but there are also inherent dangers.

Most people who buy publicly-offered shares in this industry do so as a straightforward business investment, no different from investing in a shoe company or a soap company. Is it unreasonable to suppose that stockholders or even directors who have no interest in or connection with the press other than as a financial investment will exercise more pressure to improve bottom line than top quality, whenever the two conflict?

What essentially worries critics of the growing concentration of power in the news industry in the hands of relatively few communications companies—publicly and privately held—is that the more concentrated power becomes, the more likely it is to move the focus of print journalism away from its original goals and purposes into becoming a mere money-machine, as has happened in the television industry. It is this potential threat that inevitable colors the public perception of the press as an independent institution.

That perception is further altered—and not for the good—when the press lobbies for special privileges and exemptions from, for example, the anti-trust laws—as it did in connection with the Failing Newspaper Act a few years ago, and from the child labor laws and a good many years before that. To use the battle cry of "Freedom of the Press" as a shield on every possible occasion for special economic benefits is to debase the currency of freedom whose integrity we desperately need to preserve.

Meanwhile, the newspaper audience has been changing, and we have to face the fact that, relatively speaking, it has also been declining, especially among younger readers. The reason? It's too simplistic to blame it all on TV—though TV has undoubtedly given them a taste for the "quick fix" in news rather than for in-depth reporting. More deep-seated causes may be found in the new mobility of the American family and its resultant loss of deep-seated roots; the growth of leisure time and of affluence, affording in both respects a wider choice of interests to compete with the daily newspaper; but above all, the loss of credibility in all institutions, including the press.

These are among the factors that have affected in varying degrees the responsiveness of the American reader to the daily newspaper and have already led to profound changes in the attitudes and content of newspapers themselves. These changes have been taking place in a society that seems increasingly to be turning in to itself, more interested in problem-evasion than in problem solving, more concerned with style than with substance, more self-indulgent than self-critical.

Newspapers are now desperately trying to recapture the attention of their readers, as broadcasting has always done to its viewers and listeners by supplying, in Henry Geller's felicitous phrase, "chewing gum for the eyes." The press is now moving in that direction, emphasizing "chewing gum for the brain." Service-oriented journalism is the word today, to grab the reader who, it is confidently believed, is more interested in "what will it do for me?" than in "what do I need to know?"

In the effort to win back readership in the suburbs, among youth, from the TV audience, American newspapers have been shifting their emphasis away from what the editor thought the reader ought to have, to what they now believe the readers want. The press has been increasingly catering to shallowest taste, increasingly forgetful of its constitutional obligation to inform the democracy. However, so long as the shift of focus is made not at the expense of traditional news values, so long as it does not inhibit the expression of the most unorthodox opinion, it may not do too much harm and may temporarily help weak newspapers to survive.

But to the degree that it tends to downgrade those traditional mainstays of news and opinion which the First Amendment was obviously designed to protect, just to that extent, it seems to me, American journalism is weakening its moral if not its legal claim on the public to that special status it has rightly held in our society.

As a matter of fact, a survey taken early this year showed that readers are more interested in every category of so-called "hard" news than American editors give them credit for; and so it seems to me that both the practical and philosophical ends of journalism would be better served by concentrating our efforts on improving our coverage and our analysis of the great trends of our society—social, economic and political—than by trying to combat TV on its own grounds in the race for mass audiences. Unfortunately, there is a Gresham's Law for the press as well as for economics: bad programming, bad news policy, tends to drive out good—not always successfully, thank God, but often enough to raise concern over the advent of least-common-denominator journalism.

The press unfortunately stands exceptionally low in the eyes of the public today. In a listing of 20 professions and occupations, a Harris poll taken only a few months ago showed that the press—or, more exactly, the people "running" the press, meaning presumably the top editors, managers, publishers—stood 16th in public esteem, followed only by law firms, Congress, organized labor and advertising agencies in that order. Such measurements as this suggest that the widespread reports are true that "they hate you out there," as Louis Banks so delicately put it in a recent article in the Atlantic. Banks was talking about the mistrust, the fear, even the hatred of business executives toward the press; other have observed that similar feelings are prevalent in far broader segments of American society, more so than in many years, a feeling that simply cannot be dismissed by the post-Vietnam and post-Watergate cliches about the messenger bearing bad news. The feeling goes, I believe, far deeper than that, A "public antipathy toward the press" as the respected ombudsman of the Post, Charlie Seib, put it not long ago.

Last January, the Times of London was briefly shut down because one of the printers' unions within the plant refused to permit publication of one issue containing an article highly critical of the union. In a magnificent editorial discussing the problem, the Times of London had this to say:

"Those who wish to maintain the freedom of a nation must stand behind the editorial freedom of the press, even though they know that it will sometimes be abused and often be wrong in its judgments. Those in the press who want to maintain its freedom must also try to raise the standard of its news reporting, its sense of responsibility, its willingness to report all sides and its essential fairness. Only a fair press will retain the public confidence that is needed by a free press."

Once the American public loses faith in the press as an institution of prime importance to the democratic process, the most fundamental protection of the press—far greater than that embodied in the First Amendment—will have been lost. I think there are ominous symptoms today that we of the press are indeed in danger of losing that public confidence.

The growing number of attacks on press freedom in the courts is, I believe, a reflection of that development in the public mind. The tidal wave of gag rules, of subpoenas, of efforts to force revelation of confidential sources, and now the new vogue of closing off pre-trial hearings, are all part of this trend, which is clearly subversive of First Amendment guarantees and must be resisted as much in the public interest as in the press' interest.

But I think the institutionalized press would place itself in a better position to fight the real encroachments on its freedom if it acknowledged, more readily than it is now prone to do, that when competing constitutional rights collide—as often happens especially between First and Sixth Amendments—it is not necessarily true that the press in every case must prevail. I don't think we are very convincing when we take—as we tend to do—an even more absolutist position than Justice Black would have done, by regarding the First Amendment as automatically overriding every other provision of the Constitution, not to mention common sense.

The press certainly has an obligation to fight every attempt by executive, legislature or judiciary to prevent it from scrutinizing these three branches of government—and all three branches attempt it from time to time; but we cannot expect to retain public confidence, the ultimate bastion of our liberty, if we are perceived to be arrogant and insincere in the lip-service we sometimes give to the conflicting constitutional rights of others, or none too concerned about maintaining the most rigid standards to protect and preserve our own integrity and independence.

As confidence in all institutions has been weakened, as our society has at the same time grown more complex, more broadly sophisticated and less trustful; and as newspaper management has tended to move steadily away from the personally directed journalism of an individual editor and toward the impersonality of the corporate structure, the newspaper's direct relationship to the public has inevitably become more distant; and the public understanding of the connection between press liberty and public liberty has become most dangerously blurred.

A great deal has been heard in recent years about the right of newspapers' access to the records, documents and files of government. But although we newspapermen are generally highly articulate on the public's right of access to government, as we should be, we are not usually quite so strong on the public's right of access to ourselves.

Governmentally enforced access to the press is not the answer. Far from it. To force a newspaper to publish an item is no less an infringement on its freedom than to forbid it from publishing one, as the Supreme Court has pointed out. In a number of West European countries, there is a mandatory right of reply, under which newspapers are required to publish corrections—in some cases, I am told, even if the "correction" is itself incorrect. This is hardly what we need here. Nevertheless, the public demand for greater accessibility to the press is not to be laughed off—and I believe that in one form or another, the threat of governmentally enforced access will remain, just as long as there is a public perception that newspapers tend to operate less in the public interest than in their own interest. We need to cut away from our characteristic arrogance, and to open ourselves much more than has been the custom in the past to accessibility by the public as well as accountability to it.

It was in fact with this basic thought of opening up the newspaper to a fuller and freer exchange of ideas that I introduced the concept of an OP Ed page to the Times a few years ago, establishing it in the Editorial Department as a kind of public forum, affording greater scope for access to the columns of our newspaper, and in greater depth, than was possible in our "Letters to the Editor" or anywhere else. This was certainly not the first Op Ed page—the old New York World had a very famous one a half-century ago—but it was, I think, the first to be established with the specific motivation of opening up the paper to the public on so wide and broad a base.

I think we have have to take much firmer steps than we have taken to make ourselves voluntarily more accountable to the public. The other day an Idaho newspaper, the Lewiston Tribune, created a sensation by giving an entire page to a self-examination, publicly looking into possible conflict-of-interest situations among members of its own staff from publisher to part-time reporter. An editor of the Tribune observed, "The impressive thing is not that the Tribune wrote a story about itself but that the piece so startled our fellow journalists." He was more modest than accurate because it is no small feat to list for the benefit of a newspaper's readers the connections, both civic and financial, of its publisher, directors, editors and reporters, exposing precisely where potential conflicts of interests might be concealed in its news or editorial coverage. Why shouldn't other newspapers follow this excellent precedent, also giving far greater coverage to matters affecting the newspaper industry itself, including especially anything that looks as though a conflict-of-interest question could be raised about ownership, management, directors—and news, editorial and business staffs.

Only about twenty newspapers have established ombudsmen, a valuable device for linking the individual newspaper with the individual reader whose daily complaints of inaccuracy, bias, unfairness, vindictiveness, or simple error might otherwise go unheeded and unanswered—and in many newspapers throughout this country, often or usually do.

The establishment of a News Council a few years ago seems to me to have been another sensible way to open better channels of communication between press and public—without in any way infringing or remotely threatening to impinge on freedoms of the press. Modeled after the successful British Press Council, the American News Council has no compulsory powers at all—nor should it have. It acts simply as a means of receiving complaints from individuals or groups who feel they have been unjustly treated in the press and have failed to obtain any redress or satisfaction from the offending newspaper. All the News Council does is to act as an objective, disinterested judge, make its findings and hope that the subject newspaper will accept them and publish them. It has already proved to be a useful buffer between press and public as well as a means of offering an outlet for public frustration with the press.

When the News Council was first established about five years ago, it was greeted with extreme hostility by much of the working press. It's a hopeful sign of maturity on the part of the press itself that the News Council is now beginning to gain wider and broader acceptance, funded now—in part—by some of the most highly regarded names in American journalism.

In a sense, the American newspaper is an unregulated public utility, and that's the way we want it to be maintained—unregulated, unlicensed and free. But this is an era when every value is being reexamined and every right is under question, even the Constitutional protection of freedom of the press. In defending itself from that attack, it seems to me the press has to be accountable to something more than our own business offices and our stockholders; we have to be accountable in the narrowest sense, and first of all, to our own consciences, of course; but in the broadest sense to the public interest as we see it.

I am not saying that the First Amendment establishes virtue as a criterion for management, editors and reporters. It clearly doesn't—fortunately for us. What I am saying is that given the special and privileged position of newspapers under the Constitution, it is vital that public confidence in the credibility of the press be maintained and strengthened. Its erosion is a threat to that freedom, because, as Hamilton so clearly warned us, it is on the "General spirit of the People" that freedom of the press in the longest run depends.

EXPLANATION OF MISSED VOTES ON H.R. 39

HON. JOHN CONYERS, JR.

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. CONYERS. Mr. Speaker, I was unavoidably absent from the floor during House consideration of H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act of 1978. As a strong supporter of one of the most important conservation measures ever before the Congress, I am pleased that the House has so overwhelmingly approved it, and I would like to indicate how I would have voted on the bill and key amendments:

Rollcall No. 330, the rule, "yes";

Rollcall No. 335, an amendment by Mr. YOUNG, "no";

Rollcall No. 336, an amendment by Mr. MEEDS, "no";

Rollcall No. 338, an amendment by Mr. SANTINI, "no";

Rollcall No. 339, motion to recommit, "no"; and Rollcall No. 340, final passage, "yes." ●

MAKING IMPORT SENSE

HON. JAMES ABDNOR

OF SOUTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. ABDNOR. Mr. Speaker, on a number of occasions during the past 2 years, I have spoken out on the urgent need for Congress to close 14 glaring loopholes and inconsistencies in the 1964 Meat Import Act.

I am pleased the House Ways and Means Subcommittee on Trade is now reviewing the problems attendant to this act. My testimony before them on Monday of this week follows:

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Subcommittee, it is ironic that we are finally getting together to talk about remedying the flaws in the Meat Import Act of 1964.

It is ironic for a couple of reasons: First, cattle prices have improved so that amendments in the law are not as urgent to cattlemen at the moment as they were. Secondly, it has recently been suggested that the import quotas be raised to hold down meat prices, and the existing law provides for just the reverse. If the anguished cries of cattlemen had been heeded, the law would have been changed years ago to deal more rationally with the cattle production cycle.

In any event, I am glad we are now discussing the problem, and I want to thank the Chairman for the opportunity to appear before the Subcommittee.

The primary point I wish to make is that, while cattle prices are now improving, they had a long way to improve to reach break even levels. Cattlemen suffered tremendous economic losses during the years prices were depressed, and the Congress failed to act in any decisive way to aid them. We did pass emergency credit legislation, but allowing cattlemen to go more deeply in debt is not my idea of relief.

It is obvious that cattlemen are a tiny minority of the electorate, and they are practically the only ones who are more concerned about livestock prices than about retail meat prices. Protecting the rights of minorities is a basic precept upon which our nation is based, however, and action designed to arbitrarily reduce meat prices at this time would constitute economic discrimination of the grossest sort.

Even Mr. Bosworth of the Council on Wage and Price Stability acknowledged on national television that cattlemen must be allowed to recoup their losses. In light of the political realities, though, pressure will continue to be applied; and I urge in the strongest possible terms that the Members of the Subcommittee resist the temptation to hit cattlemen just as they are about to get up. To do so might be a politically attractive alternative to many Members of Congress, but it would be totally defenseless to anyone with a sense of fairness.

What, then, can be done to rationalize the Meat Import Act in a fashion which serves the best interests of consumers and is at the same time equitable to the cattlemen?

First, the most obvious and least controversial step that should be taken is to make the quota formula countercyclical so that meat imports are increased when domestic production is decreased and vice versa. This change is included in most of the legislative proposals, including my own bill, H.R. 12239, and should have the support of producers and consumers alike.

Second, all livestock and meat products should be covered. These products all compete to a greater or lesser degree with each other, and the exclusion of some of them invites circumvention of the law. The importation of livestock may not be an issue of major concern nationally, but it is of great concern in my state and certain other areas where disorderly marketings from Canada and Mexico adversely affect local markets. Additionally, imported cattle should not be counted as domestic production for purposes of calculating import quotas.

Third, imported meat products should be labeled as such to their ultimate consumers. It is my understanding that consumer groups support this suggestion, consistent with their view that consumers are entitled to full and factual information on the products they buy.

Finally, the institution of a countercyclical formula should maintain meat import levels at the present time, since domestic production is in a period of reduction. I believe the base quota should be reduced somewhat, however, to help ensure that producers are able to recover their costs of production. Producers cannot operate at a loss over the long run, and they will continue to be driven out of business if they cannot obtain an adequate return.

Producers are beginning to recover from the critical financial straits they have faced, but their recovery must not be aborted. Although it is the producer who suffers from inadequate returns in the short run, over the longer term consumers wil also pay as producers are driven out of business, production falls, and retail meat prices rise.

Meat imports are certainly not the only cause of the difficulties faced by cattlemen, but rationalization of the Meat Import Act will be of real assistance to them in periods of depressed prices. The improvements which have been proposed will also be of benefit to consumers in times of higher prices and in maintaining our domestic production over the long run.

Mr. Chairman, I urge enactment of H.R. 12239 and thank you for your consideration.●

WORLD TRADE WEEK, MAY 24, 1978

HON. BALTASAR CORRADA

OF PUERTO RICO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. CORRADA. Mr. Speaker, despite its observance over the past 50 years, the importance of World Trade Week, May 21-27, is especially visible this year.

Last year's record trade deficit of $26.7 billion has once again summoned up the specter of protectionism. I am a firm believer in "fair" trade, a phrase which promotes free trade while recognizing the need for a degree of protectionism.

While trade negotiations are an essential vehicle for the creation of a healthy international trade system, at the core of our current trade difficulties is our lack of a national export policy. The lowering of a foreign tariff on U.S. exports will not be beneficial if American manufacturers cannot export their products. According to the Department of Commerce, 92 percent of American manufacturers are not selling their products overseas.

The need for an integrated national export policy is clear, not only insofar as it concerns dissemination of information, but also providing firms with technical assistance in export promotion, export financing, and export distribution. The importance of such an export policy transcends a desire to engage in fair trade; it contributes to a healthy domestic economy, by increasing sales and creating jobs.●

THE TAX CUT PROPOSAL

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to insert my Washington Report for May 24, 1978, into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

THE TAX CUT PROPOSAL

American economic policy is gradually changing in response to an uncommon phenomenon: growing public disenchantment with a large tax cut if the result would be to increase the federal deficit.

The President has agreed to trim the size of his $25 billion tax reduction package to $19.4 billion and to postpone its effective date three months to next January 1. The effect of the cutback and the postponement would be to reduce the federal deficit by $7 billion to $53 billion next year. This economic policy shift is the first major consequence of the President's judgment that inflation has become the nation's dominant economic problem.

In large measure the President's action was an acceptance of the inevitable. In taking it he acceded to a new feeling in the country and the recent changes in economic conditions, principally the improved employment picture and the troublesome acceleration of inflation. He was also mindful of House and Senate proposals for a smaller tax cut and a smaller federal deficit. He also took note of the many liberal and conservative economists, both in and out of government, who argued that the Administration should back away from its first plan.

The reasoning behind the President's move is clear. The large tax cut was intended to keep the economy from spinning into a recession later this year, but the economy is now performing too well to benefit from substantial stimulus. The President's basic economic decisions were made last winter, but economic conditions have changed markedly since that time and the economic policy-setting machinery has not responded quickly enough. Undoubtedly a different tax strategy will cause political trouble for the President, but a chief executive must be prepared to adjust his course of action when the economic realities demand it. One of the economic realities—capacity problems in some industries—makes a smaller federal deficit all the more necessary.

The Federal Reserve Board has had a hand in shaping the President's new policy. As inflation crept steadily upward, the Board threatened to raise interest rates unless fiscal restraint was shown. Because the Board had brought about a half-point rise in short-term interest rates since William Miller took office as Chairman in March, the threat was not idle. The President's action, however, should encourage the Board to keep interest rates down. It is apparent that the President and Mr Miller are working together in matters of economic policy. Such co-operation between the chief executive and the head of the nation's central bank is unusual and signals a welcome departure from the way things have been done in the recent past.

The new Administration proposal would strengthen the anti-inflation program because a growing federal deficit is widely regarded as inflationary. I applaud the new direction in fiscal policy. Spending restraint and a smaller federal deficit must be primary targets. But the policy should be implemented cautiously, and there should be an effort to pursue initiatives that would directly reduce inflation. For example, tax cuts for business must provide incentives for the production of capital goods, which would help to increase industrial capacity and productivity and thus would lessen inflationary pressure.

It should be noted that there is an element of mystery in the current economic news. Recent data on retail sales, housing starts and orders of capital goods have been reassuring, but they do not account for the gains that have been occurring in employment. Even though the Gross National Product actually fell during the first three months of this year, new jobs have been created at a record rate. Some reasons for this curious trend may be the jobs-creation programs of the federal government and the underlying strength of the economy, both of which may have been underestimated.

The President continues to hope that his tax cut proposal will be balanced with revenue-raising tax reforms, but Congress has not shown much interest in most of the reforms he has suggested. My own view is that the President would be wiser to leave tax reform until next year. Although several of his reforms are quite respectable and do merit serious consideration, the path to true tax reform is blocked by many obstacles and the need for changes in the tax code remains secondary to the need for a tax cut.

The prospects for the President's tax cut package are uncertain. It appears to me that the details of the final bill—the size of the cuts for businesses and individuals, the modification of deductions and shelters and the potential reduction of social security taxes—will probably be in flux at least until September.●

INVESTMENT CREDIT FOR POULTRY STRUCTURES

HON. J. J. PICKLE

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. PICKLE. Mr. Speaker, I am today introducing a bill that would put an end to extensive tax litigation that has resulted from problems with the Internal Revenue Service attempt to deny the investment tax credit to structures designed and used for the housing, raising, or feeding of poultry or their produce. These structures that are designed for the raising of poultry and their produce should have been included in the investment tax credit.

When the investment credit was restored in the Revenue Act of 1971, the Senate Finance Committee in its accompanying report attempted to make clear that the credit was intended to apply to special purpose agricultural structures by giving the example of a unitary system for raising hogs. It was the intention of Congress to make clear that under the investment credit as restored, such earlier revenue rulings as Rev. Rul. 66–329, 1966–2 C.B. 16, relating to structures for raising hogs, and the reference to poultry houses in Rev. Rul. 66–89, 1966–1 C.B. 7 would no longer be applicable.

Despite this clear statement in the 1971 committee report, the Internal Revenue Service nevertheless in numerous cases has denied the credit to special purpose agricultural structures or enclosures for raising poultry for food or egg production which have uses and physical attribues indistinguishable from the unitary system for raising hogs. The U.S. Tax Court has correctly sustained the taxpayers and allowed the credit in the case of these poultry structures.

Seven years after the restoration of the credit it is time to end the effort by the Service to deny the credit in these cases contrary to the clear intent of Congress as expressed in the 1971 committee report and affirmed by the Tax Court.

Continued litigation is expensive and volved. This needless expenditure of time and money prompts the provision in the bill to make it effective for all taxable years ending on or after August 15, 1971. A comparable controversy over the application of the investment credit to motion picture films was ended by a provision in section 804 of the Tax Reform Act of 1976 that was made retroactive, and there is even more reason to do so in the present case because of the smaller amount involved and the relatively greater burden of the expense of litigation.●

PAY CUT

HON. ANDREW JACOBS, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Speaker, here is why inflation is winning: Sacrifice is in the vocal cords not the pocketbook.

Like the church board that adopted a resolution against other people's drinking, personal economic restraint is usually for the other person.

For example, Arthur Burns, former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers, economically advised yesterday that the President and all high officials of the Federal Government voluntarily take 10 percent pay cuts as examples against inflation.

Dr. Burns' advice would suggest that he is holier than thou or even piouser than people.

But the record indicates that Dr. Burns refused to take his own economic medicine when he was a high official of the Federal Government. He testified that he personally did not take a pay cut because Richard Nixon, who appointed Burns, would not take a pay cut either. At the time, Burns had just accepted a 41-percent and Nixon a 100-percent pay increase from the taxpayers. That was in 1969 when inflation was beginning its romp in the garden of American dreams.

By 1975 Dr. Burns, serving as chairman of the Federal Reserve Board, was still preaching voluntary pay cuts for high officials. And he was still refusing to practice what he preached. One might even say he declined to serve the way he sermonized.

George Bernard Shaw wrote:

To do good is noble: to advise others to do good is also noble—

And much less trouble.●

A TRIBUTE TO THE LATE PRESIDENT JOHN F. KENNEDY ON THE 61ST ANNIVERSARY OF HIS BIRTH

HON. JOHN G. FARY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. FARY. Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of my distinguished colleagues that May 29 marks the 61st anniversary of the birth of the late President John F. Kennedy, who without a doubt, ranks as one of the finest Chief Executives this country has ever known.

John Kennedy's record of accomplishments, sense of national purpose, and commitment to democratic principles are praised and respected not only by our own people, but by people the world over, for he did much more than pay mere lipservice to the concept of "liberty and justice for all".

Under his brief, but progressive, administration, this country experienced the kind of leadership needed in an era when prompt and decisive action was called for. Bringing a well seasoned staff to Washington, he geared its operations to the most efficient handling of complex problems. He pushed himself and his staff unmercifully, but his brilliant mind and hard work made his administration highly effective.

Only once did John Kennedy's administrative and decisionmaking machinery break down and the result was the Cuban "Bay of Pigs" fiasco at the beginning of his term in office in April of 1961. It was his decision to let loose on Castro's Cuba an ill-prepared, inadequate expedition of Cuban exiles trained and equipped in the United States and Kennedy accepted full responsibility for the failure of the invasion.

Later, in May of 1961, the President created by Executive order the establishment of the Peace Corps and in August authorized the formation of the Alliance for Progress to aid in the economic development of Latin America. He also met with Soviet Premier Khrushchev in Vienna to discuss a number of problems but in the wake of the Cuban affair, these talks were largely unproductive. Tension accelerated between the two superpowers when East Germany, with Soviet support, constructed a wall to shut off West Berlin from Communist East Berlin. The President's response to this was to increase the U.S. troop commitment in Europe and 2 years later, in an effort to dramatize American support, delivered his historic 'Ich bin ein Berliner"—"I am a Berliner"—speech at the wall.

In October of 1962, a major crisis arose over Cuba because aerial reconnaissance photographs clearly showed that the Soviet Union had placed intermediate-range missiles in Cuba capable of striking the U.S. mainland. In a emergency telecast to the Nation, the President announced that he had ordered a blockade around Cuba and demanded that the Russians remove their offensive weapons. Tension mounted and war was a very real possibility but the Russians blinked first and agreed to withdraw their missiles.

The President now sought a new understanding in Soviet-American relations and in 1963 signed the first arms control agreement with the Soviet Union and Britain, banning above ground nuclear testing. In addiiton, he also agreed to the installation of a hot line between the White House and the Kremlin.

Domestically, the President's New Frontier program was partially successful in Congress, which passed legislation in the fields of higher education, urban renewal, a higher minimum wage, relief of economically distressed areas, liberalization of social security procedures and benefits, and improvement of water quality. Civil rights and tax-reduction measures he recommended were enacted after his death.

John Kennedy's most notable efforts were in the field of civil rights. He appointed many blacks to Federal posts, legally ended religious and racial discrimination in housing built or purchased with Federal funds, strengthened equal job opportunity in Government contract work, and pushed for an extensive program of registration of black voters.

To foster school integration, the President was forced to send U.S. marshals and troops to Oxford, Miss., to insure enrollment of James H. Meredith, the University of Mississippi's first black student. Federal forces were also sent to the University of Alabama for similar reasons.

John Kennedy's personal popularity was immense and, no doubt, he would have run for reelection in 1964. With election year politics in mind, the President decided on a short speaking trip to Texas, where his popularity was suffering. Arriving in Dallas on the fateful morning of November 22, 1963, the President and his entourage proceeded by motorcade into the city when an assassin's bullet cut short his young life. Words can never express the sorrow and grief this Nation felt as a result of this senseless and cruel act.

Mr. Speaker, John Kennedy will be remembered as the young President who brought a youthful flair to American politics and was able to capture the imagination of our young people. But more importantly, he will be remembered as a brave and bold reformer in a period desperate for reforms long overdue. In view of this, I am truly honored to pay tribute to such an inspiring leader. John Kennedy will never be forgotten.●

RAE SHERMAN

HON. HENRY A. WAXMAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. WAXMAN. Mr. Speaker, it is with the greatest pleasure that I wish to extend my heartiest congratulations to Mrs. Rae Sherman of Hollywood, who on May 27 will celebrate her 101st birthday. I am sure all my colleagues join me in sharing our greetings to her and her family on this joyful occasion, as well as our hope for Mrs. Sherman's continued health and vigor.●

THE NEED FOR MORE NUTRITION RESEARCH

HON. FREDERICK W. RICHMOND

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. RICHMOND. Mr. Speaker, the need for a comprehensive nutrition research and education plan is long past due. The May 23 edition of the Washington Post carried an editorial by Daniel S. Greenberg on the reasons behind our failure to analyze our nutritional problems and seek realistic solutions to them.

This failure is dramatized by the fact that only $125 million is spent annually on nutritional studies by the Federal Government, compared to a total research budget of $28 billion. In justification, the National Institutes of Health try to claim that studies on the "Specific Effects on Auditory Far Fields in Animals" qualify as nutrition research.

I believe Congress must resist this pressure from our entrenched and self-centered bureaucracy and from those in the food industry who would rather rely on controlled advertising than unpredictable science for shaping food preferences. We should immediately work toward increasing our commitment to nutrition as one of the best forms of preventive medicine we have.

I commend Mr. Greenberg's article to my colleagues:

NUTRITION, STEPCHILD OF THE MEDICAL SCIENCES

A lot of "what's left?" exasperation has been provoked by the recent inclusion of commonplace hamburger on an already long and bewildering list of suspected carcinogens in the food supply. But the real, and long-neglected, issue in this and other food-safety alarms is the threadbare condition of the nutritional sciences in the vast and otherwise generally well-financed array of American research activities.

Given the paucity of serious nutritional research, and the limited efforts to expand it, the inevitable outcome has been scattered bits of reliable information, crank advice, ignorant shouts and alarms, and profit-seeking quackery. The relationship between nutrition and health is unarguably as important to personal and public well-being as anything can be. But, in view of the record of recent years, the public cannot blame for responding with skepticism to the confusing din of nutritional contention.

Despite the deluge of food advice aimed at us, the reality is that very little is reliably known about the relationship between nutrition and health. In fact, after surveying the field and consulting scores of nutrition experts, the General Accounting Office concluded in a recent report that with "the present state of nutrition knowledge, it is not possible to say what constitutes an adequate diet."

It can be argued, of course, that mankind managed to get on reasonably well for eons before the advent of the nutritional sciences. But since World War II, the diet of the American population has radically altered in favor of processed, fabricated and supplemented foods, so that an estimated 75 percent of our average caloric intake now comes out of factories—surely a monumental and research-worthy change in biological history.

Nevertheless, as Ross Hall, professor of biochemistry at McMaster University, Ontario, has pointed out, "The science of nutrition has essentially stagnated since the early 1950's when the last vitamin to be discovered was announced."

Why is this so? Why, out of total research-and-development expenditures of over $28 billion this year, does the federal government spend—by generous estimate—only about $125 million on nutritional studies? And that latter figure represents a big and recent jump, mainly in grudging response to congressional pressure.

Why does the National Cancer Institute spend less than $10 million a year on nutritional research—out of a total budget of over $800 million—when diet is believed to be a causative element in perhaps half of all cancers?

And, to get down to fine detail, why is it that only 16 of 40 or more known essential nutrients are covered in the government's widely touted "recommended daily allowances" (RDAs), and that many of the RDAs, according to a report by the White House science office, "are based on limited data and need to be modified in the future"?

The answers aren't difficult to find.

Nutrition ranks low in the prestige pecking order of the medical sciences, which traditionally have been preoccupied with the heroics of disease-crisis management, rather than the mundane business of crisis avoidance. The medical curriculum pays little or no attention to nutrition. It is disease oriented, rather than health oriented. Nutrition is a low-status field, the work of high school dieticians, unworthy of university professors.

The $3-billion-a-year National Institutes of Health epitomizes elite, Nobel-level science, and has little patience for public and congressional efforts to prod it into expanding nutritional studies, which, it must be acknowledged, are relatively dull and laborious feed-and-measure exercises. Experienced in resisting Congress' "disease of the month" pressures, NIH is deft at telling Congress that it has already anticipated the legislators' wishes.

Thus, when George McGovern (D-S.D.) last year wanted to know why NIH is neglecting nutritional research, the NIH leadership responded with a computer printout listing $80 million worth of projects "relative to nutrition." Among them were the "Biological Effects of Environmental Radiation" and "Specific Effects on Auditory Far Fields in Animals"—which left the senator justifiably puzzled. McGovern, who has been diligently dogging the issue, will grill the NIH chiefs again at hearings next month.

Finally, there are the farming and food-processing industries, which well know that public emotions about food and health are volatile. They would rather rely on controlled advertising than unpredictable science for shaping food preferences, and, to the extent possible, seek to dampen any free-wheeling inquiries into nutrition. One effective device is to buy up the consulting services of academe's nutrition specialists, thus steering these relatively scarce talents into uncontroversial paths, and, rendering them ineligible, in this era of conflict-of-interest purism, to take part in independent, government-sponsored studies.

The White House science office recently reviewed the state of the nutritional sciences and concluded that "research gaps . . . are profound. . . . Food sciences research is still in its infancy. Support has lagged well behind the extensive changes in food production. . . . The result is that we understand little about the effects of these changes on human diets and health."

So, don't blame the hamburger alarmists, who, after all, were performing a public service. (Would it have been preferable for them to suppress their findings?) Rather, exasperation should be directed toward a government whose sense of research priorities is often deplorable.●

OPPOSITION TO GUN CONTROLS

HON. IKE SKELTON

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. SKELTON. Mr. Speaker, recent attempts by several Government agencies to silently slip antigun regulations on the books, contrary to the express mandate of Congress, lead me to reiterate my opposition to gun control and to speak out on behalf of the many people in the Fourth Congressional District of Missouri who find pleasure in owning and using firearms for hunting, competition, and collection.

Throughout my career as a public official, I have consistently opposed proposed gun controls and firmly believe in the American right to keep and bear firearms. This conviction is not only based on the commonly accepted belief that the second amendment to the U.S. Constitution guarantees citizens the right to own firearms, it is reinforced by statistics which show that gun controls have proven to be of no consequence in significantly reducing violent crime. As a matter of fact, recent studies indicate that States which do have some form of gun registration experience higher homicide rates than jurisdictions with no such restrictions. This is true not only in the United States, but also abroad. A study conducted in England concluded that the use of firearms in crimes was actually less frequent when there were no gun controls.

As consumers and taxpayers, all of us are aware of the effect that inflation has on our wallets. It is, of course, indisputable that excessive Government spending by an ever-expanding bureaucracy is a contributing factor to the growth of inflation. In light of this, can we possibly justify the money and machinery that would be necessary to register the 6 million firearms which appear on the civilian market annually? Could we economically register the 140 million weapons already in civilian hands? My answer to these questions is no.

Finally, I would like to point out one ramification of proposed gun controls that garners very little attention—the effect that increased restrictions would have on the small businessperson; the firearms dealers, gunsmiths, and stockcrafters who make a living by providing necessary services to gun buffs. On May 4 of this year, Mr. Rex Davis, director of the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms, stated in his testimony before the House Judiciary Subcommittee on Crime, that of the approximately 153,000 licensed retail gun dealers in America, 23,000 go out of business each year. While Mr. Davis did not elaborate on the reasons for this high attrition rate, one cannot avoid questioning the effect that the numerous Federal, State, and local regulations and forms had on the businessperson's decision to close up shop. At a time when nearly everyone recognizes the crying need to free our small businesses from excessive bureaucratic redtape, can we afford to implement a gun registration system that will only add to their burdens?

Mr. Speaker, many people in the fourth congressional district of Missouri are concerned about recent attempts by the bureaucracy to limit their access to firearms. Recently, I asked a sampling of people in my district to respond to a questionnaire. Among other things, I asked their opinion on the question, "Should the Government restrict the ownership or possession of handguns?" I was not surprised at the results: 71.6 percent of those responding said no. I am in full agreement with their sentiments and hope to continue to merit the confidence of my constituents by monitoring the activities of regulatory agencies which attempt to restrict the ownership of firearms, and by supporting legislation which would punish criminals rather than law-abiding citizens who enjoy firearms for recreation or occupation.●

HON. JAMES R. MANN

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased with the decisive action taken by the House in overwhelmingly approving H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act of 1978. I have visited the great and beautiful State of Alaska, and am convinced of the national importance of preserving these pristine wilderness lands for the people of America. Truly, as the bill's proponents say, this is our "last great first chance."

As the RECORD will show, I was present and voting on Thursday, May 18, to oppose two key amendments to H.R. 39 which would have slashed the Alaskan acreage to be accorded protection—the Meeds substitute and the Young State selection amendment. Due to my participation in the First Annual Peter W. Rodino Institute of Criminal Justice, however, I was absent on Friday, May 10, 1978, and unavoidably missed four votes concerning the Alaska Lands Act. Had I been present, I would have voted: "aye" on rollcall No. 337, that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House for further consideration of H.R. 39; "aye" on rollcall No. 338, an amendment to H.R. 39 requiring the President to submit a proposal to Congress by 1981 for the evaluation of applications to carry out mineral exploration or extraction on conservation system lands; "nay" on rollcall No. 339, a motion to recommit H.R. 39 to the Committees on Interior and Merchant Marine; and resoundingly "aye" on rollcall No. 340, final passage of H.R. 39.●

BOTH THE CARTER ENERGY PLAN AND THE SO-CALLED COMPROMISE ENERGY BILL WILL MEAN SHARPLY HIGHER PRICES FOR CONSUMERS IN NEW YORK STATE AND AROUND THE COUNTRY

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, last year President Carter proposed a program to resolve the country's energy ills. He called it the national energy program.

The American people heard him and read the details of that program. They then called it something else. They called it the biggest and most unnecessary tax increase in our history—a quarter of a trillion dollars in new taxes between 1978 and 1985. All of that on the backs of people who know they are already taxed to much.

There is little wonder—in light of the six new energy taxes proposed by the President and in light of what the people felt about those new taxes, their minimal impact upon demand, and their failure to increase domestic supply—why the Congress refused to rubber stamp that program. Congress looked at the President's proposal and the combined $220 billion to $275 billion price tag, and said let us take a more careful look.

Quite frankly, there was hope in many quarters that Congress would write an energy bill which would assure adequate supply without increases in taxes in imports, and in consequent consumer prices. Unfortunately, it looks like Congress has failed in that task. The so-called compromise energy bill—now in what looks like its final stages in the joint House-Senate conference committee—is not much better than what the President proposed. In some ways, it may be worse.

I think its worth a moment of our time to contrast the two.

TAX ASPECTS OF THE PRESIDENT'S ENERGY PROGRAM

The President proposed six new taxes.

The first is the crude oil equalization tax—COET. The tax would be imposed in 1978 at a level of $3.50 per barrel on domestically produced crude oil—raising the price to the consumer in the process. It would rise again in 1979 and again in 1980, until it equaled the difference between the artificial controlled price and the real world market price.

The second is the standby gasoline tax. Beginning in 1979 a standby gasoline tax would go into effect if specific nationwide gasoline consumption targets were not met. For each 1 percent that consumption exceeds the target level, the tax would be increase 5 cents per gallon. The cumulative amount of the tax could not exceed 50 cents per gallon—on top of the current per gallon costs, including existing taxes. To avoid triggering the tax, nationwide gasoline consumption would have to decline 10 percent from 1977 levels by 1985, something which is not about to happen if we have an economic recovery.

The third is a new industrial use tax, imposed on all industrial using petroleum or natural gas as a fuel. For oil, the tax would begin at 90 cents a barrel in 1979 and would increase to $3 per barrel by 1985—on top of other per barrel taxes. For natural gas the tax would vary with the user's cost and would be calculated to equalize on a Btu basis the cost of oil and natural gas. This would have a dramatic impact—a depressing, negative one—on industry in New York State. I will return to this point.

The fourth is a new tax on utilities. Similar to the industrial use tax, this tax would begin in 1983. For oil the tax would be a flat $1.50 per barrel—once again on top of all other per barrel taxes, and for natural gas the tax would again be the difference between the individual utility's cost of natural gas and the cost of an equivalent amount of oil. For utilities, the tax would be fully effective in 1988.

The fifth new tax is the proposed gas guzzler tax. It would be imposed on both automobiles and light-duty trucks that failed to meet previously mandated congressional standards. In 1978 the tax would range from $52 to $449, depending on the car's gas mileage, but by 1985, the range would be from $67 to $2,488. That is a tax of two-and-a-half thousand dollars per car.

The last proposed tax is an increase in an existing one, the motorboat and general aviation fuel tax. The current 7 cents per gallon tax on fuel for general aviation would be raised to 11 cents. The additional 4 cents, unlike the present 7 cents, would not be earmarked for the Airport and Airway Trust Fund, from which improvements are made for civil aviation. The additional 4 cents would go into the general revenues. The current 2 cents per gallon tax on motorboat fuels would be doubled.

Now, what do we get for all these new taxes? What do the people receive in exchange for them? Do they accomplish the President's stated goal of reducing demand, of reducing consumption? Do they accomplish his unstated goal of bringing in billions more for the Treasury's coffers? Let us deal with these, one by one.

IMPACT OF CARTER ENERGY PROGRAM

The first thing we would get from enactment of the President's energy message would be the additional $220 to $275 billion in taxes. Actually, we do not get that; we lose it. Uncle Sam gets it.

The second thing we would get would be a jump in the inflation rate. While estimates of the exact inflationary impact of the program vary, they range up to an additional 1.4 percent per year by 1980. It could be much higher than that during the 1980 to 1985 period.

The third thing we would get would be sharp increases in the cost of heating our homes, running our cars, driving the machinery in our plants, and lighting, and so forth. And we would get increases in prices for goods made in the plants and factories having to pay for these higher costs by passing along the costs in the form of higher prices for finished products.

Then we get the additional bureaucracy. One hundred and forty more pages in the Internal Revenue Code. An additional 1,100 tax collectors. And $15 million more in administrative costs.

There are some circumstances under which the American people might be willing to bear these burdens. But all those circumstances rest upon a common denominator—meeting the program's stated goals; in short, reducing America's dependence on energy.

Would the President's program meet the President's goal. The answer is "No." For example, reports issued by the Congressional Budget Office, the General Accounting Office, and the Office of Technology Assessment have concluded that the crude oil equalization tax would save slightly less than 1 percent of oil consumption in 1982. Yet the COET would cost the American people $85 billion between 1978 and 1985. We are being asked—the Carter program would demand—a payment of $85 million in order to reduce demand by 1 percent. Clearly, this goal fails.

The Congressional Budget Office has also estimated that the savings in oil imports from businesses and utilities buying coal rather than oil—as the President's program would require—would be 25 percent less in 1985 than the administration has projected. That goal fails.

I might add that the impact of these reports is most strongly felt when one considers what these offices are—they are groups which would normally be assumed to support the President's plan. The Congressional Budget Office is an arm of the 2-to-1 Democratically controlled Congress. The General Accounting Office is the investigative arm of the Congress and reports directly to it and its leadership. And the Office of Technology Assessment is an office of that Congress.

But the area where the program fails most miserably is in its handling of the tax aspects of the plan.

We all recall how the President assured Congress and the people that they need not fear this tax burden because it would be rebated, that it would be given back to them. Everyone assumed—wrongly so—that the additional taxes they paid would come back to them, presumably in the form of tax reductions or tax credits.

It is becoming increasingly evident that those who pay these taxes will never see those dollars again. The Treasury Department has even admitted now that the energy program would hit hardest at middle-income taxpayers. By 1985, those making between $10,000 and $20,000 per year would have their taxes raised anywhere from 3.1 percent to 4.7 percent over present levels.

And where would this money go? No one knows exactly, but we have some fairly concrete glimpses. Energy Secretary Schlesinger has already said that the Government would keep about $7 billion for itself; in other words, keep it. And would the rest of it go back to the taxpayers? Not by a long shot. The President intends to use these dollars to finance welfare programs. So, instead of citizen A's new tax dollars coming back to him, they will go to citizen B or citizen C, themselves not taxpayers but tax consumers. Thus, these taxes would be no different from any others—out of one person's pocket to line another's.

THE SO-CALLED COMPROMISE ENERGY BILL IS NO BETTER

You would think, in light of the taxpayer reaction to the President's proposals that Congress would have fashioned a better remedy. It has not, and that is particularly true if you look at the impact the so-called compromise energy bill would have on the people, economy and cost of living, working, and doing business throughout New York State.

What would that impact be? And Why?

New York State is the most heavily dependent State in the country upon petroleum. Overall, 64 percent of the State's energy needs are met by oil products, as compared to 45-percent nationally. That is one-third higher than the national average. Our costs could be pushed up by the energy compromise by that amount compared to costs of producing in other States.

New York State now consumes more middle distillate oil—for home heating—and residual fuels—for utilities, schools, hospitals, and industry—than any other State in the Nation. There are nearly 2 million oil burners in the State, heating 56 percent of all the homes.

Therefore, any plan to conserve energy by raising the price of oil and its products will fall disproportionately on the backs of New Yorkers, making it more expensive for business and industry to operate and expand in the State, thereby contributing to the pressures which drive them out.

There are many examples of this.

The crude oil equalization tax would discriminate against the State because of that heavy dependence on oil as a fuel. That discrimination would be in the form of higher prices paid by New Yorkers, since our principal form of energy used—petroleum—is greater than other forms used by other States. The COET is also inequitable since it most burdens those least able to pay and is ineffective as a means of serious conservation. It is also inflationary. In short, its enactment would make it more difficult to live and work in New York.

Proposals for oil import fees—or import quotas—are equally discriminatory against New Yorkers. Each would considerably raise the cost of gasoline and home heating oil, as well as other petroleum products, essentially making permanent the OPEC price. They would also signal a major step toward protectionist trade policies, the likes of which have not been seen since the enactment of the Smoot-Hawley Act, the trade barrier act which perpetuated the Great Depression.

The compromise bill would also assure that incrementally priced interstate boiler fuel customers in New York State would experience rapidly escalating delivered natural gas costs, rising about 120 percent over the next 5 years. These increased costs would be passed on to consumers of the products manufactured in plants with such boiler facilities.

There is much more in the hundreds of pages of the compromise bill which would be bad for New York, too.

WHY THE PRESIDENT AND CONGRESS ARE MISSING THE MARK

Since 1973, energy prices have risen sharply. The public has responded by insulating homes at a record clip, and by switching to smaller cars. Businesses are installing computers to regulate heating, cooling, and air circulation in office buildings, saving one-third or more of their fuel requirements. Industrial plants are recapturing waste heat, recirculating it to pre-heat materials about to be processed, or to heat the factory or to help generate steam for power production. The public is far ahead of the energy bill proposed by the President and Congress in conserving energy.

On the conservation front, this bill is obsolete. But, if the energy bill does little for conservation, does it redeem itself by stimulating production? No.

On the production front, the energy bill is a disaster.

The bill establishes 18 categories of gas, with definitions so complicated, and redtape so tangled, that the only additional energy produced will be generated by lawyers in the heat of debate and argument before courts all over the country. Intrastate wellhead prices and incentives will actually be reduced under the bill for years. How can the Congress think that drilling and gas production will not be disrupted? Particularly hard hit will be small producers who will be unable to cope with the confusion.

Because the energy bill fails to bring forth anything like the amount of gas which could be produced under decontrol, the people of New York will face sharply higher prices and will be penalized more than consumers in most other States. Why? Because New York is paying more than most other States to support half-empty pipelines—pipelines which could be filled by decontrolled gas at a big saving in per unit transportation charges, and a big saving in the use of higher priced oil, electricity, and liquified gas from overseas.

Consider the following report by the Wall Street Journal of June 21, 1977:

Yes, it sounds like a free lunch, having the wellhead price of natural gas rise, yet having the cost to the consumer fall. But a lot happens to a cubic foot of natural gas from the time it enters the pipeline in Texas or Louisiana until it burns under a frying pan in Brooklyn. When the Brooklyn customer pays his gas bill, only 20 percent of it goes to buy gas. With the other 80 percent he buys pipelines. Whether his bill goes up or down depends principally not on the cost of gas but on whether the pipelines operate efficiently.

Consider. The price paid at the wellhead averages 45 cents per thousand cubic feet (mcf). The Brooklyn Union Gas Co. charges its residential customers $3.38 per mcf for heating and cooking and $5.78 for only cooking. Just four years ago, when the average wellhead price was 25 cents, Brooklyn Union was charging $1.72 and $3.42 for comparable services. Thus while the wellhead price went up by only 20 cents, the cost at retail went up by $1.66 and $2.36.

The reason for this lies mostly in pipeline costs. In the U.S. there's about $40 billion worth of pipeline on which principal and interest has not been paid. The pipeline companies, regulated by the FPC, are permitted to charge enough to pay off the debt, along with operating costs and a small profit. Say gas costs 52 cents, and the pipeline is being amortized at 10 percent a year. If only one cubic foot of gas moves through the system, the customer at the end will pay $4,000,000,000.52. If two cubic feet move through the system, the retail price plummets to $2,000,000,000.52.

The point is that if the pipeline is not full, each cubic foot bears a higher transmission burden. In 1973, the pipeline was full. Now, because it was against the law for the pipeline company to pay more than 52 cents and nobody would sell gas at that rate, the pipeline supplying Brooklyn Union runs half empty. The cost goes from 50 cents per mcf to $1.00 per mcf for all the pipeline customers. Brooklyn Union has its own pipeline network to pay off and must, in the same fashion, spread these charges over an underutilized distribution system.

Then too, it gets colder in Brooklyn, and when winter comes and there is no extra gas in the pipeline, Brooklyn Union must kick in its synthetic gas plant. Last year about 12 percent of the gas Brooklyn Union's customers burned was synthetic, which costs $4 per mcf to produce. Some New England utilities paid as high as $6 per mcf for peak-period gas, because the pipeline supplying them was not permitted to pay more than 52 cents. These high costs, of course, are rolled into the price of the gas under the frying pan.

Without new supplies resulting from higher prices, Brooklyn Union's 1980 price would be $4.45 per mcf. But if the pipeline were kept full with new gas costing $2.50, Brooklyn Union's retail price would be $3.98. If new gas came in at $1.50, the retail price would be $3.31.

Though the whole country will benefit from these efficiencies, the effect on retail prices for each region depends on how much pipeline they must pay for. Higher wellhead prices would probably mean higher retail prices for some sunbelt customers close to the gas, but the Northeast would clearly benefit. Deregulation of new gas would truly be a free lunch for New England, New York and the Atlantic States, and especially for their financial hub, New York City.

Not only would the delivered price of gas not rise for New York under decontrol. In addition, New Yorkers who will be denied gas under this bill, but who could get gas under decontrol would save a fortune in the cost of other fuels if we had deregulation.

Nationwide, the savings from making fuller use of the established pipeline system, and the savings from replacing high cost substitute fuels with gas, could amount to tens of billions of dollars. New York's share of that savings would be well in excess of our share of the gas market. That is why the energy bill misses the mark for the country in general, and for New York in particular.●

HON. MORGAN F. MURPHY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, May 19, 1978, I was unavoidably absent from the House. Had I been present, I would have voted on matters coming before the House as follows:

"Nay" on rollcall No. 339, on a motion to recommit the bill H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act; and "yea" on rollcall No. 340, final passage of the bill H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interests Lands Conservation Act.●

A TRIBUTE TO BILL LEAR

HON. BARRY M. GOLDWATER, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Speaker, "Can't do" was not a part of his vocabulary. "Can do" was his mission in life. He was Bill Lear, one of the most remarkable people it has ever been my privilege to know.

When the rollcall of American inventors is taken, he will assume a position with the likes of Fulton, Edison, Bell, Morse, Goddard, and the Wright brothers.

Bill Lear is what America is all about. He loved this country. He loved free enterprise. He loved to see people working, making a decent living and producing goods and services for the betterment of mankind.

He is gone now, but what a legacy he left us. Every time a school child has an idea in a science class for a new invention, Bill Lear will be looking over his and her shoulders. And he will be saying "hang in there, don't give up, it'll come to you if you have faith and dedication." And no one experienced the inventive genius of youth more than Bill Lear, who at the age of 13 invented a successful battery charger.

It is hard to believe that Bill Lear has left us. I must admit that I always looked forward with the greatest anticipation to his latest invention. Maybe it is because I love to build things, to tinker with engines, to find ways to solve mechanical problems or just look over the horizon for a new gadget that makes life a little easier for us all.

Bill was always looking over the horizon. Maybe it was because he was born in that great American river town, Hannibal, Mo., the home of Mark Twain. And like the lovable characters of Mark Twain's remarkable pen, Huck Finn and Tom Sawyer, Bill Lear was always looking for a new adventure, a new experience.

He never stopped. Leukemia had him in its terrible grip; yet, just a few days before his death, Bill Lear announced to the world that he had finished the design of the Lear fan, a turbopowered plane that will be the first aircraft made of plastic.

People will scoff at that design and say it cannot be done. They scoffed when he invented a business jet aircraft and today the Lear jet is an important part of this Nation's aircraft inventory. Ask any Air Force pilot who served in the Korean war about Bill Lear, and he will tell you that his invention of the automatic pilot for jet fighters made the mission easier and improved chances of bringing him home alive.

I could run on forever about his inventions, his incredible feats as a pilot, and just plain accomplishments. For instance, the next time one of my colleagues puts the eight-track stereo tape in the car tapedeck, think of Bill Lear. He invented it. In fact, he actually coinvented the car radio, a device that has become an inescapable part of our lives, especially those of our teenage children.

He was not always successful. He invented a steampowered car that worked but was not economically feasible for the American people. But that did not stop Bill Lear. Nothing stopped him from realizing the American dream. If he invented a "turkey," he had a unique way of transforming it into a porterhouse steak.

Bill Lear has left behind a beautiful and great lady, his wife, Moya. He has 7 children and 11 grandchildren to carry on the family name. To Moya and his children, I express my profound sympathy at this sad time. To the American people I say that you have lost a remarkable man, a man whose productive genius has improved our lifestyle and contributed mightily to the industrial growth of our country.

He packed a lot of life into his 75 years. I will miss him, and I commend the memory and career of Bill Lear to the attention of my colleagues and a grateful Nation.●

A–10 AN IMPRESSIVE AIRCRAFT

HON. GOODLOE E. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, today an amendment was again offered to the DOD authorization bill which would have reduced the funds for the A–10 close air support airplane. This amendment was defeated by a voice vote of 2 to 1. I am pleased that Congress has again shown its support for this highly successful airplane by defeating this crippling amendment.

I would like to take this opportunity to reiterate my strong support for this impressive aircraft which has proven itself highly capable of fulfilling the important close air support missions for which it has been designed. Earlier this year I went to Luke Air Force Base in Arizona to observe the training of pilots for the A–10 and to be briefed in the airplane and watch a demonstration of its capabilities. I am pleased to be able to report that the A–10 is a success from every perspective. Its technical proficiency in providing close air support for ground troops and destroying enemy tanks will make an important contribution to our defense needs, particularly in view of the armored buildup facing our NATO allies. Moreover, the number of features designed into the plane to improve its survivability are very impressive. The production of the airplane is ahead of schedule and virtually all of the increase in the cost of the plane is attributable to inflation. In base year (1970) dollars the price of the plane is stable.

It has now been the judgment of Congress and the Defense Department and several Presidents that the A–10 is a well-designed, successfull-produced highly effective, and quite economical solution to a very basic and important defense need—close air support. I am pleased that Congress today reaffirmed the belief of the majority of Americans that we must maintain a strong national defense by defeating this amendment.●

CAMPAIGN FINANCING MYTHS

HON. JOHN B. ANDERSON

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. ANDERSON of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, when the House takes up the rule on the Federal Election Commission authorization bill, H.R. 11983, I intend to urge defeat of the previous question so a substitute rule can be offered which would make in order the offering of a partial public financing amendment for House general election campaigns beginning in 1980. This is virtually identical to the Foley-Conable amendment made in order by the rule to the Federal Election Campaign Act Amendments on March 21. That rule was defeated not so much because it made in order a public financing amendment, but because the bill it made in order contained provisions which would obviously harm the Republican Party more than the Democratic Party. That controversial, partisan provision is not contained in the pending FEC bill and so we will have a clear opportunity to vote on the merits of public financing of congressional elections.

Late last week I received a copy of a memorandum being sent to selected congressional districts by the U.S. Chamber of Commerce on our public financing amendment. Because that memo contains some very misleading statements, I am at this point including in the RECORD a copy of the memo along with my response to the chamber. I commend these documents to the reading of my colleagues to assist them in responding to any letters from chamber members in their district.

The materials follow:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
May 5, 1978.

To business members in selected congressional districts.

From Hilton Davis, Vice President, Legislative Action.

Subject: Taxpayer Subsidies for Congressional Election Campaigns.

Last year, the Senate rejected taxpayer financing of Congressional election campaigns.

But bad ideas—expensive ideas, anti-taxpayer ideas, let's-take-care-of-ourselves-first ideas—die hard in Washington. Efforts now are being planned in the House to slip this one through the side door because there is a hard core of liberals who consider campaign fund-raising to be "demeaning" and who want to "free Congress from the special interests." Their scheme: open the door of the U.S. Treasury—despite the fact that it is already $700 billion in the red and facing a $53 billion deficit this fiscal year and a $60 billion deficit next year.

One thing must be kept in mind about the Congressman who favor public financing. It is not that they don't want to use your money to get reelected; they just don't want to have to ask you for it!

Your Representative needs to know you are capable to making up your own mind about whose campaign you are going to support.

And, if you are concerned about inflation, as the vast majority of citizens are, tell him you want less federal spending, not more—and this is a great place to start.

Status and action needed:

We do not know for certain when the House will take up this issue, or how it will be done. But there is little doubt that an effort will be made. These campaign subsidies have long been a major goal of Common Cause—they are greatly desired by many Congressmen—they are a goal of labor union leaders—and they are supported by President Carter.

Under these circumstances, we must assume House action sometime in the very near future. However, since the House Administration Committee has not approved a bill for campaign subsidies and is not expected to do so, proponents will have to bring up the legislation as an amendment to some other bill on the House floor. Right now, one such vehicle is H.R. 11983, a bill that authorizes funding for the Federal Election Commission. Democratic leaders may ask the House Rules Committee to send that bill to the House floor under a rule that would allow specifically for the offering of a floor amendment to add the provision for campaign subsidies. This FEC authorization bill may reach the House floor about May 10.

It is essential, therefore, that you let your Representative know now—by mailgram or phone call—how you feel about campaign subsidies . . . and that you want him to oppose any move to pass such legislation, whether by amendment or any other ruse.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
May 24, 1978.

Mr. HILTON DAVIS,

DEAR MR. DAVIS: My attention has been called to your memorandum of May 5, 1978, sent to "business members in selected congressional districts," on the subject of "taxpayer subsidies for congressional election campaigns." Since your memorandum contains several misstatements and misunderstandings about our public financing amendment, I thought you'd appreciate learning more about the amendment from one of the authors.

First, you state that proponents of partial public financing favor the concept on the grounds that they don't want to have to ask people for campaign funds. Nothing could be further from the truth: in order for a candidate to qualify and receive Federal matching payments, he would have to demonstrate an ability to raise small contributions from a large number of people. Since only the first $100 of a contribution from the same source could be matched, a candidate would have to receive contributions from at least 500 contributors to receive the maximum of $50,000 in matching funds. Without public financing a candidate tends to rely more on wealthy individual contributors and special interest groups: for example, a candidate could raise the same $100,000 from 50 contributors of $1,000 each and 10 political action committees contributing $5,000 each.

Second, you imply that public financing deprives people of making up their own mind about whose campaign they are going to support. Again this is false. No taxpayers' funds would be used for the matching payment program unless those taxpayers so designate on the $1 checkoff box on their income tax forms. Moreover, there would be more incentive for voters to contribute to the candidates of their choice, knowing their small contribution would be doubled by a Federal matching payment.

Third, you imply that public financing is somehow an inflationary, budget-busting concept. Again this is not so. Sufficient funds are already available from the dollar checkoff to finance House general election campaigns. The estimated cost of the program is $25 million every two years, or 25 tenthousandths of 1 percent of the total Federal budget.

I hope these comments on our amendment have disabused you of any mistaken notions you might have about public financing of congressional campaigns. Our primary purpose in offering this amendment is to encourage greater, not less, public participation in campaigns through small contributions; to make candidates less dependent on wealthy contributors and special interest groups for campaign financing; and to place a reasonable ceiling on campaign spending ($150,000 for those accepting matching funds) as an alternative to the ever-escalating, runaway campaign spending that is becoming more the rule than the exception.

I would further hope that the Chamber of Commerce would reassess its own position on partial public financing of congressional campaigns. The success of this concept in the 1976 presidential elections has demonstrated its validity and vitality. We should not only be willing to learn from the mistakes of the past (which led to the enactment of public financing as an alternative to abuses disclosed in the Watergate scandal), but be willing to learn from and build on our successes, which public financing has proven to be. I think it would be consistent for the Chamber to support this concept since it is voluntary for taxpayers and candidates alike, it encourages greater participation and competition in the process, and it enhances the integrity of our system of government and free enterprise by removing the public perception that large contributions from a wealthy few individuals and interest groups buy special influence and favors.

With all best wishes, I am

Very truly yours,

JOHN B. ANDERSON,
Member of Congress.●

ARE IRISH PRISONS HAVENS FOR BARBARISM?

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the 105 House and 1 Senate Member Ad Hoc Congressional Committee for Irish Affairs I have grown increasingly concerned about reports I continue to receive and read about conditions for political prisoners housed in jails under British control.

In its May 6 edition, the Irish Echo, the largest Irish American newspaper called for an investigation into one of the more notorious facilities, the Long Kesh Prison. This prison has been the scene of a major protest involving some 300 prisoners who have charged mistreatment at the hands of prison officials. To quote the Echo editorial:

> There is every indication that prisoners are being treated in similar fashion to the way Soviet dissidents are treated in Soviet labor camps in Siberia.

This in a democratic nation?

The prison situation took on an even more serious tone with the suspicious death of 27-year-old Brian Maquire, a prisoner at the Castlereagh facility. His cause of death was listed as an apparent hanging but few believe this especially in light of repeated instances of police brutality exercised in the prison. This has been investigated by Amnesty International which will soon be issuing a report.

This is very much the type of situation I was investigating when I visited Ireland in 1975. I sought and was refused permission by the Irish Government to visit the Portlaoise Prison where reports of prisoner mistreatment were brought to my attention. The refusal of the Irish Government heightened my suspicions about conditions which were later confirmed by the European Commission and Courts of Human Rights which cited Britain for inhumane treatment of prisoners. Britain admitted their guilt and pledged to cease.

Yet reports indicate that these violations are ongoing. In the coming weeks, the Ad Hoc Committee will be seeking a complete but impartial investigation into the Long Kesh Prison and the death of Mr. Maquire. We view this matter with the gravest of concern and intend to get a complete report. We also intend to review the matter with the Department of State and if these charges are proven true we would expect the President as the apostle of human rights around the world to at long last speak out.

At this point in the RECORD I wish to insert the Irish Echo editorial entitled "Investigate Long Kesh":

INVESTIGATE LONG KESH

An investigation into the operation of the Maze Prison (Long Kesh) in Northern Ireland should take place immediately.

There is every indication that prisoners there are being treated in similar fashion to the way Russan dissidents are treated in Soviet slave labor camps in Siberia.

The world is reluctant to believe that in this day and age the government of the United Kingdom—Great Britain—could possibly condone this type of prison within its jurisdiction.

The fact of the matter is it does. And only outside agencies can do anything about it—particularly if the government of the Republic of Ireland does not protest about conditions in the prisons of Northern Ireland:

We appeal to the International Red Cross, Amnesty International, the United Nations and other international bodies to look into the treatment of prisoners in Long Kesh.

Also, let's ask our President about it. What happened to your human rights campaign, Jimmy? Doesn't it apply to Irishmen and women imprisoned by a foreign nation in their own land?●

COMMENTS ON NUCLEAR LICENSING REFORM

HON. MORRIS K. UDALL

OF ARIZONA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. UDALL. Mr. Speaker, the Interior Committee's Subcommittee on Energy and the Environment is conducting comprehensive hearings on the administration's proposals to reform the nuclear licensing process. I believe these hearings will provide the information we need to determine how we might best move toward the goal of making the nuclear licensing process efficient, predictable, and capable of protecting the public health and safety.

On May 12, the subcommittee received important testimony from the commissioners of the Nuclear Regulatory Commission. A statement presented by Commissioner Peter Bradford contained some thoughts which I believe are particularly deserving of consideration by my colleagues.

Mr. Bradford expressed concern that the legislation in its present form seeks to expedite the regulatory process at the cost of limiting public participation and a full consideration of the issues. I am impressed by his observation that the legislation in its present form reflects the attitudes of those who believe the current nuclear hiatus has resulted from actions taken by critics motivated by a desire to change America's lifestyle rather than by a concern about nuclear safety. I agree with Commissioner Bradford; the low state of the nuclear enterprise results primarily from a premature commitment to an unproven technology whose promoters promised achievements that could not be realized.

An enormous financial commitment was made prior to resolution of major problems of nuclear waste management and reactor safety. Moreover, the commitment was based on the assumption that electric power demand would expand at a much higher rate than is actually occurring. The late recognition of the magnitude of the problems and the costliness and elusiveness of solutions is the primary cause of our dilemma, which is exacerbated by a massive erosion of public confidence.

While the present picture is bleak, I am nevertheless optimistic that fission power has a role in our energy future. I believe that candor of the kind demonstrated by Mr. Bradford will help clarify what that role should be. I commend Mr. Bradford's statement to my colleagues:

TESTIMONY OF PETER A. BRADFORD, COMMISSIONER, U.S. NUCLEAR REGULATORY COMMISSION

I would like to be able to support this bill, or at least not to oppose it. A great deal of time and effort by people whose judgment I respect has gone into it. Furthermore, it contains some provisions that seem to me to be useful and others that are no worse than harmless. Under these circumstances, I would not oppose the overall thrust of the bill were it not for three provisions. The first limits the NRC's use of adjudicatory hearings in matters arising under the National Environmental Policy Act; the second provides for extensive construction activity to go forward under some circumstances without the need for the plant in question having been specifically determined; the third states that issues that could have been raised in a previous proceeding may not be raised in any subsequent proceeding even if they were not raised and are therefore still unresolved.

Before returning to these three concerns, I want to speak about the context in which this legislation arises, for that contex says a lot about what the bill should contain. The proposed legislation comes from an Administration commitment to the effect that "Reform of the nuclear licensing process is clearly needed. The present process is unsatisfactory to all participants: industry, intervenors, and the federal government. The President . . . has proposed that reasonable and objective criteria be established for licensing and that plants that are based on a standard design not require extensive individual licensing."

Together with this Presidential commitment, the legislation comes before the Congress at a time when demand for additional nuclear power plants has declined sharply. Consequently, some suggest that the legislation is needed to send the industry a message of encouragement. This does not seem to me to be a legitimate legislative function, but it is in any case amply fulfilled this year as in many others, by other specific legislation and by the still substantial nuclear share of the federal energy research and development budget.

Lastly, the legislation was shaped during a time when the licensing process was under a cloud resulting from a series of court judgments to the effect that NRC procedures were not adequate to deal with the legally required issues. That cloud has since been lifted by the Supreme Court, so there is less need than there ever was for legislative modification of the recent lower court decisions.

As the Chairman's statement indicates, I support most of the provisions of this bill. I do not feel that it addresses some of the most important issues confronting nuclear power, but the provisions on early siting, standardization, and intervenor funding clarify and strengthen Commission authority in useful ways. The Commission has also indicated support for the delegation of NEPA responsibility, though in a form different and less complicated than this bill contemplates. Each Commissioner would undoubtedly assign different priorities to these measures, but we feel that they can be so administered as to improve nuclear licensing.

I cannot say the same for the three points that I mentioned earlier and which I will now discuss specifically.

First, Section 103 of the bill would produce a significant change in the Commission's NEPA hearings. It would provide that NEPA related issues should be heard in informal hearings, that is without such basic tools as discovery, subpoena powers, cross-examination, or witnesses put under oath. Only the factual and legal issues that the licensing board deems "essential to the outcome of the proceeding" would be heard in an adjudicatory format. This section is unfortunate for several reasons.

First, adjudicatory hearings, which the NRC currently uses for all contested powerplant licensing issues, are a better way to get an accurate assessment of complex factual issues. If they are run effectively, they will not take significantly longer than informal hearings, but they will be a much more reliable decisionmaking tool. They are more reliable because they permit direct confrontation between the views of different parties under circumstances that allow each party a maximum of opportunity to probe the assumptions and the weaknesses of the other's position. Informal hearings, by contrast, allow the parties to make statements that contain untested allegations and assumptions and that need not face cross-examination. Within limits, this favors the witnesses who are most careless with the truth. In any clash of statements the chances of the fallacious ones prevailing, especially if they are sufficiently financed to be repeated by several witnesses, improve in direct proportion to the informality of the proceeding. As one of the officials who must pass judgment based on the records that will be built at these hearings, I ask you in the strongest terms not to change the current adjudicatory format.

Reliability is not, however, the only basis for my concern. The provision does not make all NRC powerplant licensing hearings informal. It does so only with respect to hearings under the National Environmental Policy Act. Unfortunately, the distinction between NEPA hearings and health and safety hearings rests on a distinction between environmental and safety issues. While that distinction has not posed a problem in NRC proceedings to date, it is necessarily artificial, for human health is inseparable from the environment. Furthermore, some environmental issues come before us not merely under NEPA but under other environmental laws which have compelled adjudicatory hearings for all contested issues. If a legal distinction is made between NEPA issues and all others, the question of whether the correct type of hearing has been held will be a new and significant issue for the courts to decide, and Congress will have reopened a variant of the issue that the Supreme Court just told the lower courts to leave alone. The problem is made even more difficult by the provisions of the legislation that delegate NEPA to the states.

A third concern with this provision is that it will vest new responsibility and discretion in NRC licensing boards. They will have to decide what issues arise only under NEPA and are essential to the outcome, and they will have to evaluate and penetrate the imprecisions of the informal record. In vesting such increased discretion, Congress should consider the fact that many of our Licensing Boards are not currently held in high regard. They have some individually excellent members, but as a whole, the Licensing Boards have been strongly criticized by intervenors and industry alike. In addition, these Boards have often been rebuked by the Appeals Boards that oversee their work for failing to comply with fundamental agency decisionmaking standards.

The second provision in the bill that seems unsound to me is the proposed Section 193(e) that allows extensive construction in some cases without a definitive finding that the power is needed. The construction may be considerably more extensive than is contemplated by our current Limited Work Authorization procedure. While the bill provides that the costs of this construction should not prejudice subsequent decisionmaking, such prejudice is almost inevitable. It is simply not likely that a meaningful need for power proceeding, especially one involving alternative sources, can take place if $100 million is already spent on a nuclear plant. No hardship results from requiring a finding of need for the particular unit before construction commences. To do otherwise is to force the Commission and/or the relevant state agencies to choose between declaring very large sums misspent or staging compromised need for power hearings.

While the law addresses this problem by saying that the NRC or the state may prevent early construction, this provision is of little use to concerned citizens if the state and the Commission should not be inclined to take such a step.

The importance of a sophisticated need for power analysis is well illustrated by the situation that has existed in New England in the last two or three years. Utility customers have had to support investment that has produced reserve margins of more than 40% for some utilities. The Connecticut Public Utilities Control Authority has recently urged Northeast Utilities to cut back its commitment to additional future capacity.

Excess capacity produces high consumer costs of its own, and these costs are ignored in the analysis of the costs of delay that are cited as supporting this provision's bias in favor of construction first, questions later.

The third provision that I feel must be modified is in Section 189a(2)(c) found in Section 103 of the bill. It requires that anyone seeking to raise several types of issues at proceedings for construction permits or operating licenses or renewals of permits must show that "no opportunity for hearing" on the issues in question existed at an earlier hearing or that information not previously in existence had been discovered. When this Committee heard from the Department of Energy, the claim was made that this concept embodied only the well settled legal principles of res judicata and collateral estoppel and that the effect of this section would be to encourage early resolution of issues. None of those statements is correct.

The legal principles exist, and they are useful, but they are significantly different in normal application from this bill. Furthermore, the bill as written actually encourages concealment rather than resolution of many issues. What collateral estoppel and res judicata provide is that no party may raise an issue if it has already been raised by any party and decided by the tribunal. Furthermore, current NRC practice already provides that a party is normally obliged to make his contentions known in a timely manner or forfeit them. This bill goes a significant step beyond these principles. It says that a person seeking to raise an issue must, unless he shows "significant new information" likely to cause the facility to be in violation of the law or NRC regulations, somehow show that no one could have raised the issue at a previous hearing.

A hypothetical example will illustrate just how unfair this provision might be. Let us say that the Public Service Company of Arizona, to pick one at random, follows the early siting provision and gets a site approval in 1983. In 1985 a citizen of New York moves to Arizona and settles near the site. Unbeknownst to him, the NRC is at that time in the process of approving six different standard designs. In 1988, Public Service of Arizona takes one of the six standard designs and starts construction on the site. The hypothetical citizen feels that a different cooling tower would produce less fog and that the transmission lines will have a disastrous impact and should be rerouted. Neither issue was raised in either of the earlier hearings, in which he would not have been involved. Both issues could have been raised but, by design if you will, were not mentioned by the utility or uncovered by the Licensing Board. Under conventional application of res judicata and collateral estoppel, these issues could still be raised. More importantly they should be raised and resolved. Under the legislation before you, they cannot be raised, and the DOE witnesses' testimony that this extraordinary result stems from conventional legal principles stretches those principles past the breaking point. Furthermore, far from encouraging early resolution of issues, this provision as drafted encourages their concealment, for if they escaped unnoticed at the first hearing, they cannot come up again in the absence of significant information not in existence at the time of the earlier hearing. The way to encourage early resolution of issues is to provide that issues actually considered in previous hearings may not be relitigated. Taken together with the principle that a party must raise his issues at the appropriate stage of a proceeding or forfeit them, this different standard is needed to make the legislation conform to the testimony of its sponsors.

As I have said earlier, parts of this legislation are desirable. Intervenor funding in particular is necessary to a full presentation of the issues in some proceedings. To those who say that this proposal favors some "special interests groups" and their views in NRC proceedings I would point out that our research program, not to mention DOE's routinely contracts for millions of dollars of work that applicants can use directly in their license applications. Indeed, some of this money goes directly to the reactor vendors and architect engineers who will use it in standard design applications. If funding "special interest groups" to help their participation in the licensing process contravenes the intent of Congress, this research needs to be reviewed and redirected.

Committed as I am to intervenor funding and however much potential I may see in early siting and standardization, the Commission can move in these directions on its own, albeit not as clearly as this legislation contemplates. Nevertheless, I would urge that the Congress not enact these gains if it meant accepting the limits on public participation discussed above. Those limitations only make sense if one accepts the view that nuclear power's troubles flow from misguided citizen groups asking too many questions. No responsible study supports this proposition, and several studies rebut it.

In short, the abridgements on public participation contemplated by this bill are part of a "love it or lose it" attitude toward which some industries, especially energy industries, are inclined as part of efforts to blame their troubles on their critics. Without detracting from the contribution that I hope nuclear power can continue to make toward meeting the world's real energy needs, I would suggest that the industry's troubles come mostly from a different direction—a direction that this bill does not address.

Much of the problem lies with the commitments, pressures and expectations spawned by the grave overestimates of nuclear needs and possibilities that once emanated from the AEC and from ERDA. As bureaucratic and institutional prestige became committed, one almost rational step at a time, to stated and perceived national goals that had very little to do with real national interests, truth and other people's money were the first casualties. The truth took a beating in silenced concerns and rigged or suppressed studies. Conclusions were expressed in assurances of safety so absolute that the industry and the Commission can now be embarassed into shutdowns by occasional showings that assertedly impossible accident sequences are merely very highly improbable. Massive financial commitments were made by utility ratepayers and by taxpayers to a nuclear future clearly in excess of anything that the nation really needed within the time it was to be provided. Alternatives, including some nuclear alternatives, were given short shrift. As criticism grew, those who participated in the initial misjudgments behaved as though openminded reevaluations would be admissions of previous errors. Instead they blamed nuclear power's troubles on delays and losses of confidence caused by its critics, whose patriotism and integrity and allegiance to the American dream were subtly or not-so-subtly called into question.

If one is to understand the ways in which large governmental entities can become overcommitted to casual and ultimately self-justifying definitions of national well-being, our energy past is important both as a map and as a warning. The limitations on hearings and issues in this legislation can be described as an extension of that past—a desire to avoid real issues that is based on an ill-informed exaggeration of dimly perceived dangers. The savings in time ascribable to the hybrid NEPA hearings, the omitted need-for-power determination, and the limitations on raising new issues are negligible. The losses in reliability of the hearing process are large. These proposals may offer solace of a sort to those present DOE officials who were frustrated at the AEC by NEPA, by intervenors and by the courts during nuclear power's happier hours five years ago. They have no other logic. They can do very little good and may do considerable harm. Neither this Committee nor the Congress should endorse them in anything like their present form.●

THEA S. KLEIN RETIRES AFTER LONG SERVICE TO NEW YORK'S PUBLIC SCHOOLS

HON. S. WILLIAM GREEN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, many New Yorkers remember with affection and gratitude those teachers and principals in our city's public schools who have been the cornerstone of their educational experience. At this time I wish to commend one of these New York educators, Mrs. Thea S. Klein, who has faithfully served the city in the public schools of Manhattan for nearly one-half century.

Mrs. Klein is a lifelong New Yorker. Before she began her service to the city, Mrs. Klein attended New York public schools herself and graduated from Hunter College. She also did graduate work at City College, Columbia University, and received a master of arts degree from Hunter College.

Thea Klein is retiring this year as principal of Public School 402, which is located on East 81st Street in the 18th Congressional District. Her long career has included the following positions of: Elementary school and special education teacher, elementary school assistant principal, elementary school principal, principal of the "400" School for Hospitalized Children, and coordinating principal of the "400" schools.

Service to the city's public schools is clearly a tradition in the Klein family. Mr. Arthur Klein, her husband, served for 50 years with the New York Board of Education as a teacher, principal, and member and chairman of the board of examiners. Mrs. Klein's mother was also both a teacher and principal for nearly 50 years.

I would like to take this opportunity to applaud Mrs. Klein and her family for their professional excellence and dedication to New York's children, and to wish Mrs. Klein much happiness as she retires this June.●

STEELWORKERS SUPPORT EFFORT TO ADOPT INTERNATIONAL STANDARDS FOR ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION, WORKER SAFETY AND HEALTH

HON. HENRY S. REUSS

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. REUSS. Mr. Speaker, on May 1 I introduced House Concurrent Resolution 591, calling on U.S. trade negotiators to work toward international standards for environmental protection and the safety and health of workers.

The reason for such standards would be to minimize the competitive trade advantages one country may gain over another by having much lower standards in these areas. The lower costs of production are of course reflected in lower prices in world markets.

There is always pressure in this country to forego the environmental and workplace standards we think desirable on the grounds that other countries with lesser standards could undersell us. Rather than backtracking on our own standards, it would be far preferable to persuade other nations to raise theirs.

The Trade Act of 1974, which authorized the current round of GATT negotiations, calls for negotiation toward more uniform fair labor standards. Such standards are not defined, however. This resolution would express the will of Congress that the negotiations include environmental protection and health and safety standards for workers.

A number of colleagues have offered to cosponsor the resolution, and I invite others to join in this effort.

The United Steelworkers of America, in a letter to me May 12, from legislative director John J. Sheehan, expressed the need for this resolution very well. He wrote:

> We have long felt that this is a very important matter for a number of reasons—the need to minimize unfair competitive advantage for foreign producers; the need to remove an incentive for plant runaways; and the simple moral commitment we should have for public and worker health throughout the world.

Mr. Sheehan addressed this issue as early as October 31, 1975, in a statement before the International Conference on Heavy Metals in the Environment, at Toronto, Canda.

After recounting the rapid progress made in this country on environmental and workplace standards, Mr. Sheehan noted that economic dislocation was minimized by approaching controls on a national basis, so that one State would not be tempted to compete economically against another through lower standards. Then he continued:

The problem, however, is also international in scope. In the world economy of today, two fairly recently developed trends facilitate the international flight of industrial investments. One is the rapid growth of the multinational corporations. The multinationals are structured so as to divert their investments on a global basis to the area of lowest cost and greatest profitability. Social requirements, including environmental controls, which the host country imposes upon its industries are bound to be given careful consideration.

The second trend is the growing urge of the less developed nations to concentrate upon their own rapid economic growth. The more they perceive the need for speed in development, and the more they see that speed as being dependent upon diverting investments away from industrialized countries, the less need they are going to see for environmental control.

Brazil, for instance, has openly and actively campaigned for foreign investment specifically on the basis that they are not concerned about pollution at this point. They may have been more open than others in their efforts, but their feelings are not uncommon.

This situation may be especially true regarding the regulation of heavy metal emissions. These emissions are heavily associated with many of the basic industries, such as ferrous and nonferrous metals, which are often considered essential for a growing industrial base. Therefore, many of the countries undergoing development may be particularly reluctant to require nonproductive investments by these industries.

Undoubtedly the ideal solution is to establish and enforce uniform international standards. Logically there should be no other goal—not only for the plant runaway problem but also for the humanitarian, public health needs (assuming the standards would be based on health requirements). To this end, activities such as the International Labor Organization's efforts to develop recommended international standards should be greatly expanded. But realistically, we are a long way off from having ILO standards, or any other international standards being uniformally adopted on any large scale, let alone from having them uniformally enforced. The motivation is simply too unequal among countries. We learned long ago that voluntary compliance could not work as the basis for occupational safety and health protection in the United States. The problems involved with trying to apply voluntary compliance among countries on a world-wide basis are far more complex.

Nevertheless, we must not allow the reluctance of some countries to work as a constraint on others in their environmental control efforts. If one country decides that action is needed to protect public health, it should not be inhibited from taking that action on the basis that other nations might not take similar action. The active nation should not have to face the threat that its control actions will play a role in the flight of its industry to a non-active country.

That type of dilemma rescurrects the jobs vs. environment scare tactic—the "smoke means jobs" mentality—that we have finally been overcoming in recent years. We may have to accept the notion of socially acceptable risk in setting compliance timetables, but foreign trade considerations should not have any weight in the determination of an acceptable risk. To put it the other way around, there ought to be certain minimum prerequisites in the exercise of the right to engage in international trade. Since highly industrialization nations must now begin to regulate their own growth, national interests will demand that the new growth problems, created by domestic societal responsibilities, not be exacerbated by unfair—"unenvironmental"—foreign competition.

A case in point might be our domestic ferroalloy industry. Regardless of environmental controls, that industry is extremely vulnerable to competition from foreign imports, and the relocation of U.S. production facilities in foreign countries has already begun. Naturally there are great pressures that the abatement requirements on this industry be eased on the basis that stringent requirements will only accelerate its demise. Yet a significant easing of the requirements could have adverse health effects upon the employees of that industry and upon the communities in which they are located.

Somehow we need to find a way to impose the necessary control requirements on an industry in this kind of situation, and yet isolate the adverse effects of those requirements from the industry's status in the world market. In other words, we need to find some way of offsetting the effects that standards have on world commerce without trading away the standards. . . .

House Concurrent Resolution 591 pursues this goal by asking our trade negotiators to include environmental and health standards among the international fair labor standards to be adopted. The resolution follows:

H. CON. RES. 591

Whereas, to the extent that the costs of preventing environmental pollution and protecting the safety and health of production workers are borne by producers, such costs must be recovered through increased product prices; and

Whereas, differing national standards with respect to environmental pollution and occupational safety and health may operate to the trade disadvantage of nations which adopt responsible and humanitarian policies in these areas; and

Whereas, section 121(a)(4) of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. § 2131(a)(4)) requires the President to take such action as may be necessary to bring trade agreements into conformity with principles promoting the development of an open, nondiscriminatory, and fair world economic system, including the adoption of international fair labor standards: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress that in carrying out his duties under section 121 of the Trade Act of 1974 (19 U.S.C. § 2131), the President should seek to bring about the adoption and application of trade agreements in such manner and form as to include environmental and safety and health standards among the international fair labor standards to be adopted.●

GORDON B. NASH, JR.

HON. MORGAN F. MURPHY

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. MURPHY of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend congratulations to one of my constituents, Mr. Gordon B. Nash, Jr., who was recently selected by the Attorney General of the United States to receive the John Marshall Award for outstanding professional achievement in the trial of litigation.

This award, named for the fourth Chief Justice of the United States, is a highly coverted honor. It is designed to recognize outstanding professional achievement by attorneys of the Department of Justice. Only one award is granted in the area of trial of litigation each year.

I extend my sincere congratulations to Mr. Nash, whose family and friends are justly proud of him for earning this distinguished award.●

THE CALIFORNIA TAX REVOLT

HON. BARRY M. GOLDWATER, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. Speaker, on Monday I shared with my colleagues in the House the efforts of many angry taxpayers in California to constitutionally limit the taxing power of our State legislature.

In today's edition of the Wall Street Journal, associate editor Jude Wanniski has written an excellent piece on this initiative. I am having this editorial reprinted in the RECORD, and believe the Members of the House will find it indicative of the mood of property owners in my home State:

THE CALIFORNIA TAX REVOLT

SACRAMENTO.—There is a raw edge to life in California these last days of May, a rising sense of quiet panic as June 6 approaches—Election Day, the day Californians finally come to grips with Proposition 13, the exhilarating adventure in democracy arranged by Howard Jarvis.

The name Jarvis is everywhere. As you travel from one end of the state to the other, you fairly swim in Jarvis, a vast, boiling sea of anxiety and debate. The name, which belongs to a 75-year-old tax crusader, is probably uttered a dozen times a day by every citizen of the state over the age of 10.

If you don't know by now, Mr. Jarvis is cosponsor of a ballot initiative that would limit property taxes to 1% of market value and limit reassessment increases to 2% a year as long as the property isn't sold. The initiative also would require a two-thirds majority in state and local governments to enact new taxes of any kind. The other cosponsor of the measure is Paul Gann, a 65-year-old former real estate salesman. The initiative is known nationally as the Jarvis-Gann amendment, but here in California they simply refer to it as "Jarvis."

Conditions in California are prefect for a tax revolt. First, because of the nature of the tax mechanism in the state, the dollar inflation manufactured in Washington has a peculiar impact on California. Second, the political class has failed to understand the flaws in the mechanism and how they automatically produce oppression. Last and most important, there is in California the avenue of the initiative. The people themselves can force their representatives to act more correctly, not out of a sense of obligation, but for sheer political survival.

Here, to begin with are some numbers California state and local governments spend roughly $40 billion. Local governments rely chiefly on the property tax, expected to yield $12 billion in the year starting July 1.

Should Proposition 13 pass, property tax receipts would drop to about $5 billion. The $7 billion loss has inspired a general hysteria among local public officials and employes, who foresee a wholesale closing of schools and contraction of public services.

DEEP CLOVER

On the other hand, the state is in deep clover. In a "progressive" moment when he was governor, Ronald Regan scaled the personal income-tax rates up to 11%. In the last several years of inflation, Californians have been propelled into these higher tax brackets, with a river of tax revenues flowing into Sacramento. Even after merry spending, with big raises for themselves and state employes, the legislators saw the surplus grow. With a modicum of frugality, the $4 billion surplus could hit $7 billion in the next year or so.

Had there been no inflation, there would be no problem and no Jarvis. Instead of gushing into Sacramento as inflated revenues, money would have remained in the after-tax incomes of the people, providing greater incentives to work, produce and invest. Instead, the reverse occurred, shrinking the nonproperty tax base and forcing more of the burden of local services on property. At the same time, the Washington-built inflation had a fiendish impact on California's local taxing mechanism.

In California, the state sets the property tax rate and the county tax assessors determine assessed valuation. The state rate has stayed the same, but for several years the assesments have climbed faster than they have anywhere else in the nation. The main reason is that since 1971 the assessor is bound by new state law to use the latest sale price in fixing all neighborhood values. Say a group of 50 homes sold originally for $50,000 and one now sells for $150,000. All other homes are bumped to an equivalent value, and because the assessor has no flexibility on rate, local property revenues soar, to be squandered by local governments on palatial buildings, lavish arts subsidies, bridle paths and, in Los Angeles, buying up railroads.

The problem is most severe in Southern California. Housing prices have been bid sky-high, partly as a result of the influx of well-to-do people who moved to the area to live out their lives on ample savings in sunshine that can't be taxed. At the same time, this process has squeezed the young managers, engineers and other professionals who form the productive base of the area. Their houses, purchased for $50,000, are now worth $150,000—nominally a nice increase. But their after-tax incomes, perhaps $30,000, are whacked another $5,000 in property tax.

Given other fixed expenses, they have little discretionary income left. They live in high-priced homes whose furniture and carpeting are getting shabbier by the day. They eat chicken instead of steak, drink beer instead of scotch. Finally, in disgust, they sell, perhaps moving to Houston, further diminishing the productive base in California.

Jarvis would change all this.

Initiatives are, next to war and revolution, the least efficient political tools. The citizenry, which expects its paid representatives to work things out, would rather be bowling or golfing than debating public finance. The initiative, though, is a wonderful thing to have when the political class systematically fails to do its jobs.

In California, most of the political leadership of both parties, from Gov. Jerry Brown on down, as well as corporate, banking and civic leadership, has failed utterly in what seems to be a simple political task.

Here the people of California are building enormous surpluses in one bank account at the same time they are being squeezed pitifully on their other accounts. The solution is to shift resources from the one to the other and adjust the taxing mechanism to see it doesn't happen again. The state, though, doesn't want to give up its tax bonanza. Local politicians don't want to lose their property-tax bonanza. All loathe Jarvis because it reminds them that these resources belong not to them but to the people. Indeed, the entire Establishment is arrayed against Jarvis, including the Business Roundtable and the "conservative" newspapers of San Diego. Those in control fear their system is threatened when the people take matters into their own hands.

The only reason Jarvis will not pass in a landslide is that the Establishment is frantically peddling the idea that chaos will result if Jarvis passes. The voter must consider the possibility that Gov. Brown, Assembly Speaker Leo McCarthy and the other chief anti-Jarvis leaders will, out of pique, incite chaos by standing back and doing nothing except insist that the people's problems are not the state's. So far, this is precisely the governor's posture, which is why he has had a precipitous decline in popularity.

Mr. Brown would surely be knocked off this fall if he had a strong pro-Jarvis opponent. But the influence of the Establishment is so pervasive that there are none. Among the GOP contenders, former L.A. Police Chief Ed Davis is the most aggressively pro-Jarvis and has been endorsed by Howard himself. But Chief Davis, like Mr. Jarvis an old-school conservative, has yet to learn that Proposition 13 will not force austerity on the state as he pictures it. There is no GOP candidate arguing that Jarvis will mean more, not less, revenue to state and local governments. Prof. Neil Jacoby of the UCLA Business School makes this argument, as does Prof. Arthur Laffer of the USC Business School. Both see Jarvis expanding the tax base.

Mr. Jacoby argues that there will be a building and renovation boom once people can be sure they won't be penalized for adding a new porch in their house or committing funds for a new factory. Not only would this boost the property tax base—helping to offset any direct revenue loss from lower property tax rates—but it would stimulate personal and business income, thus expanding the income tax base.

EARLY SUPPORTER

One of the most impressive public officials in the state is Assembly Minority Leader Paul Priolo. Mr. Priolo for years has understood the nature of the problem and has been shunned in attempts to correct the taxing mechanism. An early supporter of the Jarvis bill, for the correct reasons he now spends his time trying to get his legislative colleagues to plan for a post-Jarvis transition. His bill, to disburse most of the state surplus to local education boards on a simple formula, would buy a year's time for the legislature to work out new mechanisms. But he is now spurned by those who wish to keep alive the idea that Jarvis means chaos.

The latest Field poll shows Jarvis in the lead, 42 percent to 39 percent. But since then, the Los Angeles County assessor has released the year's new assessments. There were hysterical women all over Los Angeles, reading their new tax bills and calculating they would be forced to rearrange their family lives to much lower standards. Even much of the working press seems to have been won over to Jarvis, moved by the clear injustices of the system and their own property taxes.

If Jarvis passes on June 6, the hysteria will abate and California will be sunny and relaxed again. The political class will be forced to put aside any thought of chaos and retribution and buckle down to a serious transition, listening, it is to be hoped, to Mr. Priolo for a change. Speaker McCarthy, an intelligent and powerful man who has so far played hardball, seems privately ready to soften should Jarvis pass. He knows this is no local matter, that the whole world will be watching this exicting experiment in democracy. California often fancies itself the center of the planet. On June 6, Howard Jarvis and Paul Gann have arranged that it will be.●

"NATIONAL PORT WEEK"

HON. JOHN M. MURPHY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. MURPHY of New York. Mr. Speaker, we have 169 of the required 218 cosponsors for a House Joint Resolution which authorizes the President to proclaim the week of September 17–23, 1978, as "National Port Week."

The United States is first in world trade. As such, the Nation's ports provide a vital service in the transfer of this cargo.

For the benefit of my colleagues who have not cosponsored our legislation, please consider what the American port industry provides in direct and indirect benefits to the economy:

Employment for 1,046,800 Americans—each 600 long tons carried in America's foreign trade sustain one job in the national economy.

Generates annual personal income of $19.2 billion and business income totaling $7.4 billion.

Produces Federal taxes of $10.4 billion.

Stimulates some $4 billion in State and local taxes.

Accounts for gross sales within the total national economy of $56 billion and a $30 billion contribution to the GNP.

These are Maritime Administration figures that are based on a Department of Commerce commissioned study of the maritime industry.

The following Members are cosponsors of this joint resolution:

Mr. Alexander, Mr. Bafalis, Mr. Baucus, Mr. Bingham, Mr. Burke of Massachusetts, Mr. Burleson of Texas, Mr. Del Clawson, Mr. Downey, Mr. Duncan of Oregon, Mr. Ertel, Mr. Flynt, Mr. Forsythe, Mr. Gilman, Mr. Hanley, Mr. Harsha, Mr. Hyde, Mr. Minish, Mr. Pritchard, Mr. Rangel, Mr. St Germain, Mr. Simon, Mr. Snyder, Mr. Waggonner, and Mr. Walgren.

On behalf of our country's ocean and inland ports, I welcome the addition of these Members to our present list of cosponsors.

A list of all 169 Members who have cosponsored "National Port Week" resolutions follows:

Mr. Addabbo, Mr. Akaka, Mr. Alexander, Mr. Anderson of California, Mr. Annunzio, Mr. Ashley, Mr. AuCoin, Mr. Bafalis, Mr. Baucus, Mr. Beard of Tennessee, Mr. Benjamin, Mr. Bevill, Mr. Biaggi, Mr. Bingham, Mrs. Boggs, Mr. Bonior, Mr. Bonker, Mr. Bowen, Mr. Breaux, Mr. Brooks, Mr. Burgener, Mr. Burke of Florida, Mr. Burke of Massachusetts, Mr. Burleson of Texas, Mr. John Burton, Mr. Phillip Burton, Mr. Carney, Mr. Don Clausen, Mr. Del Clawson, Mr. Clay, Mr. Conte, Mr. Corman, Mr. Cornell, Mr. Cornwell, Mr. Corrada, Mr. Cotter, Mr. D'Amours, Mr. Robert W. TUITION TAX CREDITS—WHO IS SERVED BY THE NONPUBLIC SCHOOLS?

HON. WILLIAM D. FORD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. FORD of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, in recent discussions of tuition tax credits for the parents of elementary and secondary schoolchildren, anecdotal evidence has been presented indicating that some nonpublic schools have large enrollments of minority and low income students. This is no doubt true in the specific cases that are cited. However, in debating tuition tax credits we will be making national policy, and our decisions ought to be informed by the facts concerning the national situation in the enrollment of minority and low income students in nonpublic schools.

Fortunately, we have some excellent data available on this subject. In 1976, the Department of Commerce conducted the Survey of Income and Education. From the survey one learns the following concerning who attends nonpublic elementary and secondary schools in this country:

Mostly middle and upper class children: in 1975

Only 4 percent of all children from families with incomes less than $5,000 were in private schools;

17 percent of all children from families with income above $25,000 were in private schools;

25 percent of children from families with incomes above $50,000 were in private schools.

Proportionately more white children than from other races: 17 percent of all white children attend private schools while only 5 percent of all minority children do so.

I hope that these facts will enable Members to put in context who is served by the nonpublic schools generally.●

SINISTER CHILDISHNESS

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, it may sound contradictory to speak of sinister childishness, and yet this is exactly the term which comes to mind when we examine the thrust of the recent Sun Day episode.

On the one hand, the planned "festivities" were so childish as to invite scorn. It is inconceivable that the dedication of a sundial in Houston be taken seriously as showing the way to America's future. One is amazed that they did not, at the same time, rediscover the clothesline. Efforts to appeal to youth with modern forms of pagan Sun worship were received more tongue-in-cheek than they were made, which we may regard as a refreshing sign of sanity.

The childishness earns the modifier "sinister" when we consider that the long range goal of the Sun Day braintrusters is to block energy production, then reduce it level by level until Americans have been pushed back to something like the energy consumption levels of 1910. Nuclear energy is their major target, but fossil-fuel-fired generating plants are not far behind on their hit list.

SOLAR POWER NOT REALISTIC OPTION FOR NEAR FUTURE

(By M. Stanton Evans)

"Sun Day" in the Nation's Capital was on a Wednesday; and it began with the inflation of a hot air balloon—as eloquent a commentary on the subject as one is likely to see in print.

The idea of Sun Day, of course, was to promote reliance on solar energy and other so-called soft technologies for the power needs of our society. It's a pleasant-sounding idea, but one with potentially unpleasant consequences for the vast majority of Americans. Maybe someday solar energy will be feasible for society as a whole, but at the moment it's a plaything of the well-to-do and the artsy-craftsy types.

The great expense of solar energy on a widespread basis has been suggested by Peter Beckmann, editor of Access to Entry. "The laws of physics," Beckmann observes, "cannot be beaten . . . and one still has to use a square meter of area to expose it to one kilowatt of solar power." Solar power can be converted to useful energy only by gathering and focusing it, which requires such large devices as collector panels of enormous size.

"The biggest drawback of solar energy," Beckmann writes, "is its diluteness—only 1.36 kWm^2 in space (at Earth distance) where there is no night and day and no atmosphere (let alone clouds). Large collecting areas are thus needed to generate the power that can be generated in compact facilities by other methods.

"There are, however, some applications where solar energy can be economically harnessed—those where not much energy is needed and sufficient collecting area is available. Heating and cooling homes is a possibility, though often only on the economic fringe. Heating water to boil a secondary working fluid for turbine-generated electric power is technically feasible, but the cost is about double that of conventionally generated electricity, and other methods are even more costly."

This subject is also discussed by energy experts Lawrence Rocks and Richard Runyon in their authoritative study, The Energy Crisis (Crown Publishers). In New York City, these authors note, "assuming a 10 percent conversion efficiency, we would need a panel about seven by seven feet to light a 100-watt bulb. To provide one billion watts of power [the size of an average New York power plant], we would require a panel, if shaped as a square, about four miles on each side. To provide electrical power for New York City would require a solar panel 15 miles on each side."

Rocks and Runyon further note that if U.S. electrical needs by 1980 rise to 500 billion watts, we would require about 8,000 miles of sunshine-collecting surface to supply the necessary power. Using mirrors to collect the sunlight would require the nation's entire 1970 production of aluminum (10 billion pounds) rolled out in sheets. The authors estimate the cost of electricity from solar cells at 500 times the present cost of electricity, though this is based on economic relationships as of 1972 and has doubtless been reduced since then.

* * * of the soft energy people is a fine-tuned, individual energy source for each household, relying on its own solar converter, windmill, or other personal device. This, of course, would be even more expensive than the mass-electricity approach.

In a recent study called Soft vs. Hard Energy Paths (Charles Yulish Associates, Inc.), Daniel W. Kane of the Council for Energy Independence estimates that solar heating panels for 64 million American households would cost $364 billion, while personal windmills as a backup energy system for each household would cost an additional $520 billion.

Kane comments that "natural gas prices would need to increase by three times or more before solar panel heating truly becomes barely economical to the homeowner. If the U.S. government and/or industry were to invest $364 billion in large-scale coal gasification plants to produce synthetic natural gas for home owner use, the 'problem' of natural gas shortages would essentially be solved."

At these price levels, solar power is obviously not a current option for most of us, and is unlikely to be so in the short-term future. If it is to become feasible despite these costs, it will do so because alternative systems have grown even more expensive. That can be accomplished, if ever, simply by deregulating the prices of oil and natural gas and letting them seek their market level. If scarcity makes these fuels expensive enough, sun power could conceivably be economic. If not, there is no need for government policy to promote reliance on the sun.

The real enemy of the sun people, of course, is not oil and gas, but nuclear power. By most available indices, it is nuclear power which represents the realistic long-term substitute for fossil fuels. The technology already exists and is waiting in the wings to take its place in our energy drama, but it has been bitterly resisted by the environmentalists and self-styled consumerists. Down deep, it is fear of nuclear energy and a desire to block its development that motivates such happenings as Sun Day, and the romantic quest for soft supplies of energy in general.●

PROGRAM ON VOLUNTEER ARMY RILES PRIVATE TO GENERAL

HON. WILLIAM A. STEIGER

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. STEIGER. Mr. Speaker, elsewhere in this RECORD, I have given my assessment of the ABC–TV documentary, "The American Army: A Shocking State of Readiness." It was in my view, a shoddy piece of work and a disservice to our men and women in uniform.

Following that program, two Louisville Courier-Journal reporters talked with soldiers stationed at Fort Campbell, Ky., to get their analysis of the documentary. From private to general, they were riled.

It is important to have the views of these soldiers about what the Army is really like. A close reading of the article by Bill Powell and Howard Fineman of the Courier-Journal is far more informative about the state of today's Army than was the ABC show. I hope it will receive the attention of all who care about the Nation's defense forces. The article follows:

PROGRAM ON VOLUNTEER ARMY RILES PRIVATE TO GENERAL

FORT CAMPBELL, Ky.—From private to general, the 101st Airborne Division was riled by the ABC portrayal of the volunteer soldier.

"I was very disappointed. The report was unanimously negative," Maj. Gen. John N. Brandenburg, commanding general of the nation's only air assault (helicopter) division said at a news conference yesterday.

In Washington, Maj. Dale Keller, an information officer at the Pentagon, said the program had some practical, good points. The problem, he said, wasn't what the documentary discussed but what it didn't.

The tone of the ABC report was that American Army forces in Germany were too weak, under-equipped and ill-organized to withstand any major thrust into Western Europe by the Russians.

Keller acknowledged that ABC had accurately reported the history of serious equipment shortages and repair problems in the European command.

What it didn't note, Keller said, was the improvement made since the Vietnam War and the Arab-Israeli War of 1973 drained equipment and attention from Europe.

"The status of equipment and readiness in Europe is now genuinely and generally good," Keller said.

In 1975, he said, 75 percent of the reports from Europe on equipment showed a good "state of readiness." By last month, he said, the figure had risen to 90 percent.

Keller said that ABC had raised a valid question about whether the reports were completely truthful. But he said the report failed to give the Army's response.

"There probably are some people who try to hide things in those reports," he said, "but overall we think they're valid."

The reason, he said, is that officers have an interest in accurately reporting equipment problems. If they don't report the problems, he said, they don't get more money or new materiel.

As for the quality of the volunteer Army's soldiers, Keller said that the ABC report failed to note the subtleties of the situation.

It is true that the dropout rate is higher than during the draft years, he said. But, in part, he said, this was a deliberate policy to weed out unfit candidates.

Another reason for the higher dropout rate, he said, was that applicants sign up for longer hitches—three or four years, compared with two in the draft.

Brandenburg, who has been commander of the 101st division and of Fort Campbell since March, said he didn't like ABC's reference to the volunteer soldier as a "loser."

"It is my impression that our troops (in Germany) would do quite well in meeting a Russian onslaught across the border," Brandenburg said.

Brandenburg also said troops of the 101st were much better educated than the ABC program "might lead you to believe."

Ninety percent of the enlisted men of the division at Fort Campbell in southwest Kentucky have a high school diploma or a General Education Development certificate, he said.

Brandenburg, who led combat troops in Vietnam during the draft, said "the soldiers we have now are as good as the ones I commanded then." He added that they may be "in even better physical condition."

Numerous Fort Campbell soldiers randomly polled yesterday said they resented the program. Not one agreed that the volunteer Army was a "loser."

Some typical comments included:

Pfc. Stephen Conner, 22, said any impression that the soldier "can't or won't fight makes me mad.

"I'm nothing but a clerk. But if a war started, I would not be behind a desk. I know how to fight and how to use our equipment," he said.

Spec. 4 James Cox, 21, said he didn't "like the program one bit." He said he was proud to be in the Army, although he did not plan to make it a career.

"I know a volunteer Army would not be enough in wartime. But, I tell you, it is unbelievable the way the men here train. It is super," Cox said.

Staff Sgt. Mike Lamkin, 34, a veteran of 14 years in the service, said "the ABC program just showed the bad parts or made the good parts look bad. Our soldiers are better and smarter than they were portrayed to be."

Sgt. Chistopher Owens, 26, who has been in the Army eight years, said "some of the program was true." He said it is no secret that economic conditions are poor for the Americans in Europe and that "some prejudice persists." But the helicopter crew chief said "some things were overly dramatized.

"You have all kinds in the Army. You had all kinds in Vietnam, in Korea and in World War II," he said.

Staff Sgt. George Stein, 29, who has been in service 12 years, said he had served with American forces in Italy and that he did not think there were enough troops representing the North American Treaty Alliance there. He also acknowledged that some soldiers could not support themselves and their families properly on Army pay.

But he said the average soldier "just doesn't come in off the streets because he can't find a job or wants to quit school. Everybody knows you have a better chance to get an education in the Army than you have on the streets," he said.

Spec. 4 Curtis Barker, who at 21 has been in service 20 months, said "what I saw on television is not what I see at Fort Campbell.

"Sure, lots of our people are not well educated, but lots of people in civilian life, and doing good jobs, aren't either," he said.

Barker said "lots of men who were in the old CCC (Civilian Conservation Corps) during the Great Depression simply because they were poor and had to have jobs went on to make good soldiers in World War II.

"They were used to keeping their noses to the grindstone. They knew how to live together, in barracks, and how it was to fight for survival. They hit the beaches. They won as many medals as anyone else. And I don't believe Alvin York (World War I hero) had enough education to speak of," he said.●

STOP FEDERAL GUN REGISTRATION

HON. DAVE STOCKMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. STOCKMAN. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing legislation to insure that the Department of the Treasury does not implement a nationwide gun registration proposal without specific instruction from the Congress.

The Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms has proposed regulations that would require the application of a unique identifying serial number to every gun manufactured or imported in the United States. Currently, firearms bear a number which identifies only the manufacturer. The unique number would indicate the manufacturer or importer, production or importation year, firearm model and caliber or gage, and the serialized number of the particular model made or imported during a given year. This standardization, the Bureau claims, would tremendously assist law enforcement officials in accurately identifying recovered and confiiscated firearms, eliminate confusion in tracing weapons associated with the crime, reduce the time needed to trace these weapons—from several days to hours or minutes—and improve chances of successful prosecution.

But the requirement of the unique serial number, in combination with BATF's centralized computer capability, creates the potential for a de facto centralized gun registration system in this country. Under authority of the Gun Control Act of 1968, the Bureau may require the submission of form 4473 information, including name and address of a firearm purchaser, which must be divulged to the dealer at the time of purchase. The danger—a well-founded one, in my view—is that the Bureau has the capability, if not the inclination, to store in its computerized files vast numbers of these reports. This would create a national gun registration system.

Mr. Speaker, these regulations are yet another in a long string of efforts by the bureaucracy to circumvent the will of the Congress and to deprive the American people of their rights. The Congress has never voted to permit any kind of national gun control law, and for numerous good reasons.

The resolution that I am introducing today would eliminate all doubt about whether the BATF has the authority to implement nationwide gun registration without an express instruction from the Congress. It would block the implementation of any such regulations that have the effect of creating a central Federal computerized gun registration file. I hope that an overwhelming majority of my colleagues will join me in sending this clear signal to the BATF.

In closing Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my great dismay at the lack of honesty represented by these proposed regulations. If the President and his administration want a Federal gun control law, they should come to the Congress and ask for it by name. Trying to achieve the same result through the back door can only damage further the confidence of the American people in their democratic form of Government.

Text of resolution follows:

H.J. RES. 940

Joint resolution disapproving proposed regulations of the Department of the Treasury requiring centralized governmental registration of firearms

Whereas the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms of the Department of the Treasury, on March 21, 1978, proposed regulations:

(1) requiring quarterly reports of all firearms transactions in federally licensed commerce, including reports on sales to individual citizens, with said reports to be centrally maintained by Government computer;

(2) requiring the placing of additional serial numbers on all firearms manufactured or imported into the United States, identifying the firearms as to importer or manufacturer, importation or manufacturing year, model, and caliber or gage, and the serialized numerals of the models; and

(3) making certain other changes in existing Federal firearms regulations; and

Whereas these regulations, if permitted to become effective, could be construed to permit centralized Federal registration of firearms; and

Whereas the Congress has consistently refused authority for such registration as demonstrated by the House of Representatives defeat of three proposals to require the registration of firearms during consideration of the 1968 Gun Control Act; and

Whereas the Congress has enacted no legislation since 1968 which might be construed as conferring authority upon the Treasury Department to implement centralized Federal registration of firearms; and

Whereas the proposed regulations could permit by regulation what Congress has refused to authorize by legislation: Therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That—

(1) the Department of the Treasury does not possess authority to retain on file, in excess of the minimum time necessary to complete a request for trace of a firearm, any of the information currently required by law to be reported at the time of purchase and recorded on Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco, and Firearms Form 4473;

(2) the Department does not possess the authority to require submission of Form 4473 information except as presently permitted under law; and

(3) the Department shall seek explicit congressional authorization before proposing any rules or regulations for the consolidation of centralization or transfer to the Government of records required to be maintained under existing Federal firearms laws.●

HOW I WOULD HAVE VOTED

HON. DON BONKER

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. BONKER. Mr. Speaker, due to previous commitments in my congressional district, I was unable to be present for the final passage of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act.

Had I been present, I would have voted "no" on the motion to recommit the bill and "yes" on final passage.●

HONORING HELEN CREHAN, EUGENE SCHLESINGER, AND ALLAN R. IDE

HON. MARK W. HANNAFORD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. HANNAFORD. Mr. Speaker, the Long Beach, Calif., Chapter of the National Conference of Christians and Jews has chosen three distinguished Americans as the recipients of its 15th annual Humanitarian Awards. I thought you and the other Members of the House assembled here today would like to join the chapter in honoring the recipients—Helen Crehan, Eugene Schlesinger, and Allan R. Ide. They will receive their awards in Long Beach on Thursday, May 25.

Mrs. Crehan is a well known and highly respected Long Beach businesswoman. An active member of the American Business Women's Association, she has in past years been president and vice president of the Long Beach chapter of ABWA, which named her "Woman of the Year" in 1969. Mrs. Crehan owns Tom's Restaurant in Long Beach and has been operating it successfully for the past 22 years. She has an abiding interest in the future of downtown Long Beach and has made significant donations of time and effort to a number of civic organizations and commissions which share her concerns.

Eugene Schlesinger is a self-made man who fled both Hitler and the Communists for the promise of America. Hard-working Schlesinger saw that promise fulfilled. He owns the Center Meat Co. of Fullerton, which operates several retail and wholesale meat markets in the Southland. Mr. Schlesinger's considerable contributions to the Jewish community and to Long Beach at large are overshadowed only by the list of honors he has received from various local and national groups.

Mr. Speaker, the third honoree, Mr. Allan R. Ide, is currently president of the Metropolitan Stevedore Co. in Wilmington. A native Californian, Mr. Ide joined the Seabees at the start of World War II and performed his duty in the South Pacific theater. He serves on the boards of numerous community organizations, including several which are concerned with health care. He has a deserved reputation as a philanthropist, and some of his gifts have benefited the American Red Cross, Goodwill Industries, and the City of Hope, to name but a few. Mr. Ide is the director of the Long Beach Chapter, National Conference of Christians and Jews.

The chapter says that its awards are bestowed on the basis of substantial contributions to the community in furthering the cause of brotherhood and human relations. Mr. Speaker, I cannot think of three more qualified individuals, and I know you will join me in congratulating these outstanding public citizens.●

EFFECT OF 1969 TAX REFORM ACT ON FEDERAL TAX REVENUE FOR 1969

HON. BILL FRENZEL

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. FRENZEL. Mr. Speaker, in the discussion relative to H.R. 12111, the Investment Incentive Act of 1978, there has been some dispute with regard to the impact of the Tax Reform Act of 1969 (69 TRA) on the stock market during calendar 1969. The dispute centers on the effective dates of the capital gains provisions of the 69 TRA.

More specifically, the provisions of the 69 TRA phased up the alternative tax on long term capital gains in excess of $50,000 for individual taxpayers. The maximum tax rate on the included half of long-term capital gains above $50,000 was increased to 29.5 percent in 1970, 32.5 percent in 1971 and 35 percent in 1972 and later years. The alternative tax rate on corporate long-term capital gains was increased to 28 percent in 1970 from 25 percent and to 30 percent in 1971 and later years. In addition the 69 TRA generally reduced to 50 percent the use of capital losses to offset ordinary income for taxable years beginning after December 31, 1969.

A minimum tax which included in its base, in the case of individuals, one-half of net long-term capital losses was also first imposed by the 69 TRA for taxable years ending after December 31, 1969.

In light of these effective dates, detractors from the Investment Incentive Act of 1978 contend that the 69 TRA did not have a negative effect on the stock market during calendar 1969. However, the facts relevant to this issue are clear. The 69 TRA placed a significant cloud over taxpayers with unrealized capital gains during calendar 1969 even though the 69 TRA was not effective in final form until 1970.

The public knew that these capital gains tax changes were adopted by the Ways and Means Committee and it was widely believed they would be effective from July 1969 forward. A press release dated July 25, 1969, issued by then chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, Wilbur D. Mills, states in relevant part:

The tentative decisions since July 11, 1969, for drafting purposes are as follows:

A. CAPITAL GAINS AND LOSSES

The Committee tentatively decided to modify the tax treatment of capital gains and losses in the following manner:

(1) It was tentatively decided to require that net long-term capital losses be reduced by 50 percent before they may be deducted from ordinary taxable income. Net short-term capital losses would continue to be deductible in full, and the present overall limitation of $1,000 on the amount of capital losses which may be offset against ordinary income also would continue to apply. . . .

(3) It was tentatively decided to extend the long-term capital gains holding period from six months to one year. Thus, long-term capital gains treatment would be accorded only to gains on capital assets held for more than one year.

(4) It was tentatively decided, in the case of individuals, to eliminate the alternative long-term capital gains tax computation. The alternative capital gains tax presently provides a maximum tax rate of 25 percent on long-term capital gains. Under this tentative decision, one-half of an individual's net long-term capital gains would in all events be included in taxable income and, accordingly, would be taxed at the regular tax rates.

There was no effective date stated in the press release of July 25, 1969. However, some time between July 25, 1969, and before August 2, 1969, when the committee filed its report on the 69 TRA, the committee published a document entitled "Summary of Principal Decisions on Tax Reform Subjects." The summary states in relevant part:

A. Capital gains and losses

The committee adopted without substantive change its tentative decisions, effective January 1, 1970, except that the provision eliminating the alternative tax is applicable to transactions occurring after July 25, 1969." (Emphasis added).

Similarly, the committee report indicates that changes relative to the alternative tax for corporations were effective July 31, 1969.

Thus it can be clearly seen that from late July or early August 1969, the effect of the decisions of the Committee on Ways and Means were a matter of public record—the alternative capital gains tax would be substantially cut back, effective for transactions occurring after July 25, 1969, for individuals or after July 31, 1969, for corporations.

The financial world was doubtless aware of what was occurring at the Ways and Means Committee. This is evidenced by newspaper articles which appeared at the time of the committee's actions.

On July 23, 1969, the Wall Street Journal carried an editorial titled "The Attack on Capital Gains." The editorial, generally, attempts to refute arguments in favor of higher capital gains taxation rates. A week later on July 30, 1969, the Wall Street Journal, on page 2, carried an article titled "Senate GOP Still Mulling 5-Month Surtax Pushed by Democrats; Deadline Seen Near." The article stated:

Meanwhile, the House Ways and Means Committee continued final drafting of its comprehensive tax-reform bill scheduled for House action next week. The Committee adopted, with few changes, a series of decisions announced earlier as being only tentative. It will take up other reform items today.

The Committee decided that transactions after last Friday will be ineligible for the 25-percent alternative tax rate on long-term capital gains. Earlier, the Committee had said this alternative rate would be eliminated but hadn't set an effective date." (Emphasis added).

Similarly, the New York Times on Sunday, August 3, 1969, carried a front page article titled "Liberals To Seek a Larger Tax Cut in Middle Levels." Continued on the inside of the paper the article was accompanied by a summary of the major items in the House bill; it stated:

A higher tax on long-term capital gains for those at the upper end of the income scale was voted by the Ways and Means Committee. . . .

The Committee has proposed elimination of the alternative 25 percent rate, and thus would make the tax on long-term capital gains progressive all the way up through all the tax brackets.

A long-term capital gain today is defined as appreciation in value of property from the time it was bought until the time it was sold, provided it was owned at least 6 months. The Committee proposed to change the mandatory holding period, in order to receive the favorable treatment, to one year.

The extension of the mandatory holding period to one year has greatly disturbed Wall Street, which fears many stocks that otherwise would have been traded will simply go off the market while their owners wait for the year to elapse. . . .

The Treasury Department which did not recommend either of these changes is more concerned over the increase in the capital gains tax at the top of the income scale. It is not that the changes are necessarily thought to be wrong, but simply that the Treasury wants to take a leisurely look at (sic) whole subject of capital gains taxation—with an eye to comprehensive revision—and feels that it is foolish to make piecemeal changes now.

Again on August 5, 1969, the Wall Street Journal on page 4, stated:

The alternative maximum capital-gains tax rate of 25% would be eliminated for individuals, effective on transactions after last July 25. This provision is expected to increase federal revenue by $360 million a year.

The holding period that's required before the sale of an asset is eligible for capital-gains tax treatment would be lengthened to one year from the current six months. This change would apply to taxable years beginning after last July 25, and would increase annual federal revenues by $150 million after next year.

The corporate tax rate on long-term capital gains would be increased to 30% from 25%. This change would apply to transactions after last July 31, and would increase annual revenues by $175 million a year.

On Wednesday, July 30, 1969, the Washington Post stated:

Capital Gains. The holding period would be extended from six months to a year. Gains from property held less than that would be subject to the higher ordinary income-tax rates. The alternative maximum capital gains tax of 25 per cent would be repealed. This means that the rate for top-bracket taxpayers could rise to 38½ per cent. Estimated annual revenue gain: $350 million.

On July 21, 1969, Barron's stated:

TAX REFORM SERIOUS

On the important capital gains issue, the committee has reached tentative agreement to lengthen the required holding period from six months to one year. A companion proposal being favorably considered would provide that each dollar of net long term capital loss could offset only 50 cents of ordinary taxable income, making tax treatment of capital losses consistent with that of capital gains.

Investors were not shielded from these changes in the taxation of capital gains until action by the House-Senate conference was completed on December 19, 1969. However, from July 1969 to mid-December there was little question but a well-advised investor would have been aware of the potential tax implications of the House committee's action.

Lest there be any question about the impact of these tentative decisions by the Ways and Means Committee one could look to the newspaper articles which followed the committee's tentative 1969 vote to include interest on municipal obligations within the minimum tax base. The municipal bond market immediately hit the skids. The business and finance section of the New York Times, on July 30, 1969, on page 47 stated:

TAX UNCERTAINTY HURTS BOND SALES—NEWARK AND CHICAGO REJECT OFFERS AS MAJOR CITIES ENCOUNTER HIGH RATES

Major states and cities ran into great difficulty yesterday in selling their bonds.

This financial market, normally a quiet, efficient mechanism for handling hundreds of millions in new securities each week, was described as shaken to its foundations by uncertainty over the future tax status of interest income from bonds that historically has been tax-exempt. . . .

KEY PROPOSAL

The key proposal rocking the tax-exempt bond market would impose a minimum income tax on individuals and corporations now taxed lightly, if at all.

Similarly, the August 3, 1969 edition of the New York Times carried an article titled, "'Reform' Hits Tax-Exempt Market;" it states:

These problems [higher interest rates on municipal bonds] were caused by tentative proposals by the House Ways and Means Committee to impose Federal taxes on income from state and local government bonds, long exempt for taxation. The proposal was part of a reform program that would establish what has become known as a 'minimum tax' on individuals with large amounts of income currently taxed lightly, if at all. . . .

The prospect of this change in Federal income taxation threw the municipal bond market—a term that includes the market for all local government securities—into a tailspin last week. Prices plummeted and interest rates shot up to their highest levels in American financial history. Many investment bankers dropped out of the bidding for these bonds, and state and city controllers complained bitterly of the higher costs they had to accept.

A similar article appeared in the August 3, 1969 edition of the Los Angeles Times which states:

The municipal bond picture remained fuzzy last week as dealers and investors awaited final action on tax reform measures proposed in Congress.

The tax-exempt bond prices experienced gains late in the week on news that banks and corporate investors would be excluded from the suggested formula for taxing at least a portion of interest from the currently tax-free municipals."

From the above it is clear that, while the 69 TRA was not effective during calendar 1969, it had a significant impact on taxpayers during that year.●

IN FAVOR OF ALASKA BILL

HON. PAUL N. McCLOSKEY, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, due to business in my district, I was not present to vote last Thursday and Friday on H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest

Lands Act. Had I been here, I would have voted in favor of those amendments accepted by the House, and for final passage of this most important conservation bill of the century.●

RESULTS OF MY 1978 QUESTIONNAIRE

HON. GENE SNYDER

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to share with my colleagues the results of the 1978 edition of my annual questionnaire. Seventeen thousand of the citizens of the Fourth Congressional District of Kentucky took the time to pass along their opinions to me this year and since the issues dealt with are all national in scope, my colleagues here in the House should find them quite interesting.

The tabulations are self explanatory. Unfortunately, space will not permit a listing of the responses to question number 12 which was not really a question but rather an invitation for additional comments. It is unfortunate because the thoughtful remarks penned in by so many of the respondents would do a lot to reinforce my standing contention that we would be in better shape if more of us took the time to listen to the people we represent.

Although the results of this questionnaire are based on the opinions of the people of the Fourth Congressional District of Kentucky, it is highly unlikely that the views reflected in the tabulations are confined to the boundaries of this one district. It would seem much more likely that these opinions are shared by many people throughout the country.

Questionnaire results follow:

RESULTS 1978 QUESTIONNAIRE

(All answers are in percentage)

(1) One of the points that has tied up the Energy Bill is a disagreement over the regulation of natural gas prices. Should the Federal Government continue to control the price of natural gas? Yes, 53; no, 40.4; no answer, 6.6.

(2) The Panama Canal Treaties are now being considered by the Senate. Do you favor the ratification of these treaties? Yes, 14; no, 80.6; no answer, 5.4.

(3) Do you favor a tax credit or tax deduction for parents who send children to college? Yes, 61.6; no, 35; no answer, 3.4.

(4) Should Congressional elections be funded by Federal tax money? Yes, 15.6; no, 82; no answer, 2.4.

(5) Should we establish a separate Department of Education with cabinet status? Yes, 24.6; no, 67.6; no answer, 7.8.

(6) President Carter has proposed a tax cut, but at the same time he is proposing to spend half a trillion dollars with a deficit of more than 60 billion dollars. Should we cut taxes without cutting spending first? Yes, 6.8; no, 90.6; no answer, 2.6.

(7) Should the Federal Government declare war on smoking as suggested by HEW Secretary Califano? Yes, 19.8; no, 77.8; no answer, 2.4.

(8) The Food Stamp program has always been controversial. Now it is suggested that the government should give cash instead of food stamps. Do you approve of this proposal? Yes, 2.4; no, 97; no answer, 0.6.

(9) Should we erect tariffs and trade restrictions to protect our industries from foreign competition? Yes, 64.6; no, 28.2; no answer, 7.2.

(10) This year we expect to spend over five billion dollars on foreign aid. President Carter would like to see this amount increased considerably over the next few years. Do you agree with him? Yes, 2.4; no, 95.8; no answer, 1.8.

(11) Do you think a balanced budget should be one of the top priorities of this nation? Yes, 90.4; no, 7.8; no answer, 1.8.●

SENATOR ZELMAR MICHELINI

HON. DONALD M. FRASER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. FRASER. Mr. Speaker, today I pay tribute to my friend and colleague, Uruguayan Senator Zelmar Michelini. Today was the second anniversary of his tragic assassination in Buenos Aires. Just 3 years ago, I and other Members of Congress were scheduled to meet with Senator Michelini here in Washington to discuss with him the situation of human rights in his country. Apparently afraid that he would prove too credible and articulate a witness, the Uruguayan authorities invalidated his travel documents. They prevented him from leaving Argentina, where he had lived in exile since the June 27, 1973, coup that closed the Uruguayan Parliament.

Senator Michelini never made it to Washington after that. A year later he was assassinated along with former Speaker of the Uruguayan Chamber of Deputies Hector Gutierrez Ruiz, in circumstances that implicate both the Argentine and the Uruguayan Governments. Although the abductions of both men occurried in downtown Buenos Aires and were witnessed by numerous members of the Argentine security forces, no one intervened to help them. All efforts by friends and relatives to establish their whereabouts were obstructed. President Videla's expressions of "official concern" were not communicated to the proper authorities. Three days after they disappeared, the bullet-ridden bodies of both victims were discovered in an abandoned car.

These facts have been related to me personally by former Uruguayan Senator Wilson Ferreira Aldunate, a survivor of that tragic episode who was fortunately not at home when his would-be assassins came looking for him. Senator Ferreira and I have spoken together on several occasions about these and other violations of human rights for which the Government of Uruguay is responsible. Delivered shortly after the murder of his colleagues, Senator Ferreira's testimony before our subcommittee was of great value in congressional deliberations regarding the discontinuation of U.S. military aid to Uruguay.

Senator Michelini was a tireless and eloquent defender of human rights. From his seat in the Uruguayan Parliament, he demanded time and again that allegations of torture be investigated; that those responsible be held accountable; that the Uruguayan Constitution be upheld. During his exile in Buenos Aires, he continued his struggle for justice and democratic rights. Believing that responsibility for human rights transcends national borders, as a public figure he sought the assistance of his colleagues abroad; at the same time, he advocated the creation of international mechanisms that might guarantee adherence to standards recognized in principle, yet ignored in fact, by many governments. Privately, the Senator assisted countless Uruguayans who came to him on a personal basis with their problems. A compassionate man, he never forgot that oppressed peoples are not abstractions—concrete human lives are affected when human rights are violated.

Perhaps the high personal price the Senator had to pay for his defense of principles made it easier for him to understand the suffering of each Uruguayan he met. The last years of his life were full of attempts to intimidate him. Especially cruel and painful to him was the torture of his oldest daughter Elisa—a political prisoner and alleged subversive—in reprisal for her father's political activities. And especially courageous was his refusal—even then—to be silenced. Nor did Senator Michelinis tragedy end with his murder. Only weeks after he was assassinated, an exiled daughter, Margarita, disappeared in Buenos Aires. Margarita and her husband turned up 5 months later in Montevideo, along with over 20 other Uruguayans—all of them abducted and tortured in Buenos Aires, then illegally deported to their country of origin to be tortured and imprisoned there. It is a sad indication of the state of human rights in Argentina and Uruguay that international organizations are still attempting to locate 40 other Uruguayans whose whereabouts remain unknown following their disappearance in Argentina. In that group are several small children.

Unfortunately, as a victim of repression Zelmar Michelini is not unique among legislators or among Uruguayans. We should not forget that many of our colleagues abroad suffer persecution, imprisonment, and death simply for seeking to do the job which we do here without risks to our personal safety. Nor should we forget that Senator Michelini's country, once known as the "Switzerland of South America," today has the highest per capita ratio of political prisoners of any country in the world. In a total population of only 2½ million, 1 in 500 is in prison; 1 in 50 has been arrested; over half of those arrested have been brutally tortured.

Happily, Senator Michelini shared with his fellow countrymen not only suffering but also a love of democracy which, having reasserted itself throughout Uruguayan history, augurs well for the eventual restoration of democratic freedoms in Uruguay. Many of us in the U.S. Congress have expressed our belief in the Uruguayan people by insisting that their human rights are our concern; by supporting a cutoff of military aid to Uruguay; and by voting into existence a growing body of human rights legislation by means of which we can stand up for our shared principles abroad.●

OPEN SCHOOL'S SUCCESS FAILS TO SPARK BOARD

HON. WILLIAM M. BRODHEAD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. BRODHEAD. Mr. Speaker, in recent years, the public school systems of many of our older major cities have faced growing difficulties. Aging facilities, rising costs, and declining populations have made it nearly impossible to operate these systems efficiently.

However, in my own district, the Detroit school system has operated a most successful open school project at the Burgess Elementary School which has resulted in a long waiting list of parents who wish to enroll their children. One of the reasons for the success of this project is the total involvement of parents in the day-to-day operation of the school. While the Detroit School Board has been reluctant to start additional open schools, the success of the Burgess School makes such a decision more and more desirable.

The project was recently described in the Detroit Free Press by writer Thomas BeVier and I offer his story to my colleagues as a possible solution to some of the problems of our troubled school systems:

OPEN SCHOOL'S SUCCESS FAILS TO SPARK BOARD

(By Thomas BeVier)

One of the Detroit public schools' most successful innovations has failed to blossom because of scant interest and a lack of material support by school administrators.

It is the open school program, which features unregimented instruction with children from up to three different grade levels learning together.

For the last three years, in what has become sort of bizarre rate of spring scores of parents have pitched tents and camped overnight outside Region 4 offices to enroll their children in the school system's only open school, conducted—along with a traditional school—in Burgess Elementary at 24601 Frisbee.

This May there were only 34 kindergarten openings for the next year at the open school and six places scattered in grades one through eight. There is a waiting list of more than 200.

The long line of parents is the most visible sign of the open school's success since it began in 1972. The line also raises the question: Why do public school administrators fail to provide ample opportunity for the alternative form of education in the face of apparent success and demand?

"It doesn't make sense," said Mrs. Jacqueline Campbell, whose son has gone to the open school for four years. As a parent, she proselytized for several years for expansion of the program. Finally, almost in exasperation, she ran for election to the Region 4 school board and won.

"How can you possibly not spread something that is good?" she asked. "They say it's because of lack of housing, but I don't accept that."

"If I had room, I'd have another one (open school)," said John F. Hauck, Region 4 superintendent.

Mrs. Campbell and a number of other open school supporters say that there has never been a shortage of verbal support from administrators but that material support, such as housing and staff, has been in short supply.

The open school did not originate in Detroit at the initiative of administrators. In fact, they resisted it in the beginning before bowing to pressure from parents who rallied behind a kindergarten teacher who had taught traditionally for 20 years before learning of the open school concept while she was an exchange teacher in England.

The teacher, Laurajean Milligan, began teaching with the open method in 1972. The next year it was made a regional program with children bused to it from throughout northwest Detroit.

"I never could go back to the traditional way of teaching," Miss Milligan said.

A significant difference between a traditional classroom and the open school is that children from up to three grades are grouped together.

"The older children help the younger children," Miss Milligan said. "The older children become teachers as they reinforce their own learning."

She said teaching in the open school is more difficult for teachers because there is no set program to follow. "It requires more imagination on the part of the teacher," she said.

Achievement tests show that the average scores of open school students are slightly above the national average and considerably above the city average.

Miss Milligan, a woman of seemingly endless energy and good humor, directs the program without benefit of title.

"Part of the success is due to the interest of the parents," she said.

Indeed, if there is one overwhelming difference between the open school program and ones found in traditional schools, it is in the amount of parental involvement. Parents work as aides to teachers, hold auctions to raise money for field trips and lobby continually with school officials. And they are irritated with the system.

"We represent a threat to the system," said Mrs. Aaron Bresnay, chairman of the Burgess School's parent committee. "I don't think the administration really wants to work with parents."

She and other parents see the system as being highly politicized and they behave accordingly.

In their view, one that is not disputed by administrators, the program has been in effect long enough to establish it as a success. They are irritated that administrators have shown little interest in what they are doing and that their open school has not been utilized for in-service training of teachers so other such schools can be established.

None argue that the open school should entirely replace the traditional way of teaching. "We know there are some children who require a more disciplined learning experience," said Mrs. Karen Majorov, who has two children at Burgess. "But the open school should be available to those who think it would be best for their children."

Perhaps their arguments are beginning to be heard.

Dr. Melvin Chapman, the deputy superintendent at the Detroit Board of Education whose duties include alternative programs, admits that "we have not done enough."

"The problem is that we've had other priorities," he said. "I believe it will be expanded."●

MONEY HAS A NEW MEANING TODAY

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker even the Atlanta Journal & Constitution, like the proverbial blind hog, occasionally finds an acorn. Such an acorn is Prof. James Green of the University of Georgia, who writes what I feel, are some of the finest columns in the country on economic and financial matters. In point of fact, one of his most recent columns, which appeared in the Sunday, May 14, 1978, edition, outlined why we as Americans are contending not with a money problem, but, with a paper problem, that is to say, a monetary system based upon a printing press and a promise, not backed by gold or silver. This paper money continually aggravates the problems of our economy as he very succinctly pointed out. The column follows:

MONEY HAS A NEW MEANING TODAY

Today we work for and spend money. Right? No, wrong. Money in its traditional meaning is gone. Too many Americans don't really understand this. They don't recognize who has been fooling around with their money nor what has happened to it and to them.

The Federal Reserve creates what we now call money based on the government's promise to pay (IOU's). Commercial banks create money based on private promises to pay (IOU's). Monetized debt, then, is what we now call money.

Look carefully at any bill in your wallet. This is a Federal Reserve note.

Stated on it is "This note is legal tender." But "tender" for what? An IOU? If it is tender for nothing more than a promise to give another piece of paper just like it, is it really a legal and binding contractual obligation?

Originally the Federal Reserve note was not designated as legal tender nor was it lawful money? Why? Because it was not redeemable for anything of value. It still isn't.

Honest money was defined by Locke as "some lasting thing that men might keep without spoiling, and that by mutual consent men would take in exchange for truly useful, but perishable supports of life."

Good representative money, the gold and silver certificates which circulated widely a few years ago stated: "Will pay to the bearer on demand gold (silver) or lawful money at any Federal Reserve Bank." These certificates were substitute (representative) money and were redeemable. When the government revoked redeemability the floodgates to economic instability, persistent inflation and capital confiscation were open wide.

ROOSEVELT DEVALUED DOLLAR

President Franklin Roosevelt devalued the dollar by 40 percent Jan. 31, 1934, raising the price of gold from $20.64 to $35 an ounce. Suits were filed charging confiscation of property without due process of law when American citizens were no longer allowed to hold gold as a private possession. The Supreme Court, however, sustained the seizure of gold and the abrogation of gold contracts. In legal jargon, the court ruled that "the issue of money is a political question to be determined by Congress." Here lies the answer as to "who has been fooling with your money." Now let's see what has been done to it and to you.

In its wisdom Congress has changed the basic essence of money. We have been moved from hard, commodity money which had intrinsic value in itself to substitute money which was redeemable into good money to fiat paper money with neither redeemability nor intrinsic worth.

Given worthless pieces of paper called money, your savings have been confiscated. Since 1939 Americans have saved some $4,430 billion (in 1972 dollars) in savings accounts, insurance and pension funds, trusts, bonds of all kinds and mortgages. Of this, inflation has destroyed $2,078 billion of your saved-up purchasing power.

DISCIPLINE IS GONE

In the first 192 years of our nation's growth to 1967, we created $350 billion of more or less good money to grease the wheels of our economic expansion. In just 10 years we have more than doubled the supply of worthless fiat money. The broad measure of money supply now stands at $820 billion . . . up $470 billion. This is irresponsible. Monetary discipline is gone.

In 10 years, consumer prices have doubled. Housing prices have doubled. Medical care cost has doubled. The purchasing power of your dollar has been cut in half.

Worthless paper money without intrinsic value spawns inflation, debases the nation's currency and confiscates your capital. Webster defines what the Congress is doing to us as embezzlement, theft and fraud. Webster is right.●

VERONICA THORNE

HON. GLADYS NOON SPELLMAN

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mrs. SPELLMAN. Mr. Speaker, Henry Adams once said, "A teacher affects eternity; she can never tell where her influence stops." Those words have very special meaning, for I know that Mrs. Veronica M. Thorne has affected the futures of hundreds of children, and her very positive influence will serve as a motivating guidance throughout their lives.

Mrs. Veronica Thorne is a beloved teacher at the Mutual Elementary School in Calvert County, Md. Her dedication to her profession, coupled with her love and concern for her students, have endeared her to both children and parents, alike. For over 12 years, Mrs. Thorne taught in the St. Marys County school system, and because of her commitment to bringing better education into the schoolroom, she served on special committees on social studies, science, and mathematics, developing curriculum guides to be used by the teachers. Mrs. Thorne is now rounding off her fourth year of teaching in Calvert County.

As a wife—she is married to Earl Thorne, vice principal of a middle school—and mother of two straight "A" students, Cynthia and Christine, Mrs. Thorne found time to be a contributing member of her community, involving herself in worthwhile, beneficial projects. She is currently serving on the advisory committee to the county commissioners, the board of parks and recreation, the board of Calvert County Branch of the American Cancer Society, the board of the March of Dimes, treasurer of the Calvert High School Athletic Booster's Club, president of the parent club of the Calvert Strutter's Marching Group, and a member of the Calvert High School Band Booster's Club.

Mrs. Thorne's classrooms are so busy, as well supervised classrooms should be. There are interesting corners where guppies and mealworms reside, where science projects and live plants attract the attention and interest of inquisitive minds. Each child feels very important in the love and comfort Mrs. Thorne extends, and isn't it nice to know that the morning finds students anxious to be there and not begrudgingly present. She inspires them to achieve at their own paces and to the best of their capabilities. And each child knows that he has her complete support and encouragement. Armed with that, they cannot fail.

I am especially honored to detail for my colleagues the accomplishments of Mrs. Thorne. We hear so much today of shortcomings of our schools. I want to call attention to one of the strengths—a truly dedicated and talented teacher.

Mr. Speaker, I am heartened that we have educators such as Veronica M. Thorne in our school system, and I am thankful she is affecting eternity by touching the children.●

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS REPORT SHOOTS HOLES IN CAPITAL GAINS STUDY ON THE "STEIGER AMENDMENT" TO TAX BILL

HON CHARLES A. VANIK

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. VANIK. Mr. Speaker, on May 16, I inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD the entire text of a Library of Congress report that I had requested on the projections made in a private capital gains study. The Chase Econometrics model had predicted all sorts of economic benefits if the Steiger amendment to the still-pending tax bill was adopted. The Steiger amendment proposes to change tax treatment of capital gains to pre-1969 levels.

The Library report concluded that the basic assumptions of the Chase study were in some cases impossible to understand, and in at least one case actually false.

I want to make clear that despite what proponents say the amendment will do, there is little or no proof at all that they are correct. I implore Members of the House to carefully look at this piece of major tax alteration before they decide it is the panacea it is presented to be.

While its projected benefits are extremely attractive, the projections they are based on are simply useless. I urge my colleagues to review the Library of Congress report inserted in the May 16 CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 14006.●

THE HISS CASE REVISITED

HON. ROBERT K. DORNAN

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. DORNAN. Mr. Speaker, 40 years ago this House was shaken by revelations of one of the most sensational espionage cases in history. The personalities involved in this matter have become the objects of what must be regarded as one of the most bitter controversies in the history of this Republic.

A committee of this House launched an investigation into the background of Alger Hiss, and revealed that his machinations on behalf of the Soviet Union had penetrated the highest levels of the U.S. Government. Since that time, there have been charges and countercharges, accusations, and recriminations. A steady stream of essays, articles, and books have taken up the cudgels of one party or the other. But no work has more definitively answered the questions raised by the conflict than Prof. Allen Weinstein's monumental volume, "Perjury: The Hiss Chambers Trial."

Professor Weinstein has carefully analyzed and weighed the evidence. And he has pronounced Alger Hiss guilty as charged. This finding is most significant, Mr. Speaker, because Professor Weinstein originally intended to write his book exonerating Hiss.

Surely one of the reasons for the length of the controversy was the reputation of Mr. Hiss himself. Alger Hiss was a brilliant young Washington lawyer, a product of the finest schools, a man whose connections reached into the stratosphere of Washington's social register. Hiss was a major figure in the Roosevelt administration. He played a variety of critical roles in the conduct of our foreign policy. He was present at the ill-famed Yalta Conference. He was present at the founding of the United Nations. Few men were in a better position to know the innermost secrets, plans, or projects of the United States overseas. With such friends, connections, and such an impressive social or academic background, no man could have enjoyed a higher confidence, in his loyalty and dedication to the public service of the United States. And few men could have been in a better position to most viciously render assistance to the secret service of America's most hateful enemies.

The chief witness against Alger Hiss was Whittaker Chambers, a comparatively drab and unimpressive figure. At first, the charges Chambers leveled against Hiss seemed preposterous and even ludicrous. An ugly duckling had cast mud at the swan. A dirty little street urchin had spat in the face of a Prince. In his book, "Witness," Chambers remarked:

It was not invariably, but in general, the "best people" who were for Alger Hiss and who were prepared to go to almost any length to protect and defend him. It was the enlightened and the powerful, the clamorous proponents of the open mind and the common man, who snapped their minds shut in a pro-Hiss psychosis, of a kind which, in an individual patient, means the simple failure of the ability to distinguish between reality and unreality, and, in a nation, is a warning of the end.

Mr. Speaker, the sophisticated defenders of Hiss had forgotten the warning of Scripture that the Prince of Darkness often comes arrayed in all the finery of an Angel of Light.

Years have passed and the roles have changed. It is ironic that Richard Nixon, a former Member of this House who had done more than any other Congressman to bring Hiss to justice, languishes in disgrace. While Nixon's star was sinking, Hiss' star seemed to be rising. We were being prepared for another attempt at a sacrilegious Hiss resurrection. We were being softened up for the eventual "coming-out" of one of Washington's "persecuted heros." Far too many liberal intellectuals wanted to believe in their heart of hearts that Hiss was a martyr of the McCarthyite wave that swept over the Nation, a man who endured the villainies of a "social outcast" like Chambers, a "viper" like Nixon, and a volatile public opinion whipped up into a vicious frenzy by demogogic politicians.

I imagine that there are some twisted minds who believe that the transgressions of J. Edgar Hoover, Joseph McCarthy, and Richard Nixon somehow approximate the crimes of Alger Hiss. That cannot be surprising. We live in an age when a Daniel Ellsberg can steal Government secrets and be roundly hailed as a hero, however, briefly. Jane Fonda can cozy up with the North Vietnamese torturers of American prisoners of war, hundreds of whom are still missing, and still she is welcomed back onto the merry-go-round of tinsel town.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, times and circumstances change. But I cannot help but be reminded of the fine lines of the Poet T. S. Eliot:

The world turns and the world changes,
But one thing does not change
In all of my years, one thing does not change,
However you disguise it, this thing does not change:
The perpetual struggle of Good and Evil.

Mr. Speaker, the Hiss-Chambers controversy was such a struggle. Our supreme duty is to recognize such a struggle when it occurs, and take sides. Whittaker Chambers wrote a book which John Kenneth Galbraith once described as poetic. It was surely poetic, in the sense that poetry is a means by which we penetrate more deeply the truth of the human condition. Chambers expressed the fear that we in the West had lost our will to survive. He once remarked that, in breaking with the Communist movement and exposing Alger Hiss, he changed from the winning side to the losing side.

Chambers knew that the Communist revolutionary is impelled by a faith that transcends every other consideration. Hiss was cold and ruthless, hardly the pathetic persecuted figure he has been, and is, made out to be. In "Witness," Chambers wrote:

I wondered at Hiss's inhumanity even while I understood its causes. In Communism the individual is nothing.

Our failure is the failure to recognize that the world is still moved by faith, even if there are those among us who have long since abandoned their own. Communism is such a faith. It is a fighting faith, presenting itself as antithetical to the entire Western Judeo-Christian tradition. The Communist is not a romantic, a misguided humanist, or a somewhat more authoritarian version of the Socialist. He is a disciplined visionary, who holds in contempt those who view him as anything less. Hiss and Chambers had a perfect understanding of one another. They had both once shared the same fighting faith. They were men whose hearts and minds were steeled to fight and win the ultimate war with Western civilization. That is why Chambers, emerging from his own dark night of the soul, expressed such horror and revulsion at his own crimes. And that, Mr. Speaker, is why Alger Hiss will forever remain an aging, but impenitent revolutionary, a man who will carry his deception to his grave. He will doubtless harbor the same contempt that all true Communist revolutionaries harbor toward the liberal intellectuals who plead for tolerance toward him and his comrades.

Mr. Speaker, I hope that we will have learned from this tragic episode in our history. Mr. Weinstein's book ought to serve as a reminder that the Communist revolution can also be pursued in business suits. We must also remember that the strength of communism is not simply calculated in terms of Soviet military might, the sophistication and extent of its underground apparatus, or in the number of fools and charlatans it is able to recruit or bribe into its service. It is a faith that must be fought with a faith, a faith in personal freedom, and a confidence in the potential of our own civilization. We must remember with St. Paul that—

We wrestle not against mere flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against rulers of the darkness of this world, against the spiritual wickedness in high places.

Mr. Speaker, intellectually honest men will agree with Mr. Weinstein. The verdict on Alger Hiss and his career is—guilty as charged.

I commend the profound observations of Mr. D. Keith Mano of National Review in his recent review of Professor Weinstein's book; and I insert it into the RECORD as part of my remarks:

THE LAST TRAITOR

(By D. Keith Mano)

This is Brechtian: absurd: a typewriter. Sixty pages, seventy, and still I read about it: one goddam typewriter. Isn't my time worth more than that? A typewriter: Alger Hiss's Woodstock N230099, with which, single-space, on unerasable bond, the social legend of America was revised. Katydid noise: two-finger clacking in a 1930s night: Woodstock Nation. Watergate tape; bridge at Chappaquiddick. Things arbitrate and draw men down.

Hiss/Chambers, like menarche, was the gate of our fitful pubescence: from it a dark fertility rose. If you don't know the story—cast and hand props and plot—don't ask me to summarize now. I haven't patience or words enough here. Without rancor, with Breughel single-brush-hair love for detail, with strong unembellished style—for embellishment is partisan—Allen Weinstein has made a dig, stratum after stratum down, artifact and shard, separating intrusive burial from authentic trace of human habitation. His book is stupendous and illegal: it has put Alger Hiss in double jeopardy. Exclusive interviews; documents never before released; to this conclusion: "the body of available evidence proves that he did in fact perjure himself when describing his secret dealings with Chambers, so that the jurors in the second trial made no mistake in finding Alger Hiss guilty as charged." It is irrefutable, done with: say good night, Gracie: gone.

Yet it is refuted already. Irving Howe for the New York Times Book Review: "Weinstein has significantly added to the evidence pointing to Hiss's participation in an espionage apparatus . . . nevertheless . . . none of this makes it certain that Hiss did what Chambers said he had done." And one week later in the NYTBR, a full-page ad for The Nation and Alger Hiss: "Whatever his original motives and aspirations, Professor Weinstein is now an embattled partisan hopelessly mired in the perspective of one side, his narrative obfuscatory, his interpretations improbable, his omissions strategic, his . . ." But why go on? Poke the Hiss mimosa at any place and all its leaves close. I'd react similarly, I suppose, to "proof" that Christ was resurrected by deep heart massage. But Hiss . . . What lame Christs some of us have.

I was seven when Hiss came to trial. Weinstein limns a time I never knew. It has been U.S.–U.S.S.R., super-rivals, since I have cared about the world outside my brow. By page 200 or so, I understood that pro-Soviet espionage need not—for a weak, self-absolving mind—have been anti-American: in the mid-Thirties at least. Most of what Hiss stole, about German and Japanese preparation, was secret but not all that crucial to U.S. defense. The air didn't yet sizzle with polarity: a man could fellow-travel and remain American and leave only ten or fifteen stretch-marks on his liberal imagination. By August of 1945, though, Popular Fronters with any moral strength were surfacing like bombed fish: guilt- or Stalin-sick, afraid, apathetic, spent.

Communist infiltration before World War II succeeded in large measure because U.S. security was primitive and lax. You could even feel compassion for the GPU, if you were so disposed. They had to coddle romantic, frivolous, neurotic Left-liberal types: I'd rather have an orangutan for my amanuensis. Chambers was clownish and unstable. Hiss: sentimental, undisciplined. Bykov, their ranking Soviet contact, was an ass who gave Bokhara rugs to his people—as one might in some IBM sales incentive program. By 1938, Amtorg, the Soviet industrial espionage apparatus, had tried filching trade secrets from my family's cement firm: for bathtub crack filler, no less. Which, when you consider Russian plumbing, then and now, would have been an uncertain coup.

I don't minimize the significance of Hiss/Chambers. Dred Scott was not more important: possibly less. But what mean pivots for an era to turn on: typewriter and second-hand car and pumpkin and rug: they diminish us. It's a question of style. Ultimately Weinstein's magisterial book will come up short: truth will come up short. Because a fact is a small machine: a made object: facere: in all cases, though in Hiss/Chambers most explicitly so. Your liberal mind has need of high passion, sentiment, great ideas. The Hiss lobby is, by not too wide an extension, I think, a late Luddite revolt against industry and man's contriving brain. That Alger Hiss—suave, bright, noble—should be brought low by metal and microfilm seems enormous and unjust. We traffic in two modes of experience here. The evidence is irrefutable: but so, by its peculiar lights, is Hiss's relentless denial. Even I, who wish Alger Hiss nothing but the finest misfortune, was worn headsore with detail. Had Hiss confessed in 1949, he would in all probability have gone free: and we with him. Thirty years later the nation is still punch-drunk from contention. I can handily assert that no public figure—no liberal public figure anyhow—will ever be indicted as a traitor again. We haven't the stamina for it.

Something happened then. Sun rot ate the weave of confidence. I wasn't there: and I'm not the only Seventies conservative who'd like to understand. Where did American certainty go? How does one people move with such bluff resolve from Joe McCarthy to Daniel Ellsberg: a pendulum swung clean off its hinge? "More than any other factor, Alger Hiss's conviction gave McCarthy and his supporters the essential touch of credibility, making their charges of Communist involvement against other officials headline copy instead of backpage filler." It was a moment brutally seized. I suppose, after so many New Deal years, you could fault no Republican or conservative for zeal that might, here and there, shade toward base opportunism. Hiss in jail could win elections. But it was—if not morally, then strategically—a catastrophic mistake. ". . . guilt over past radical associations and beliefs hung plainly on the shoulders of many of Hiss's critics in the literary and scholarly communities. To them the Case dramatized the failure of their own previous radical CP affiliations or flirtations with Stalinism. Their essays revealed the deep uncertainties of a penitential liberalism, the emergence of a new self-questioning .. ."

But not many men have a real aptitude for guilt: it's a dying trade. After a while antibodies in the mind rush out. For better or worse, American thought has been rough-hewn in this century by articulate Left-liberal folk. Most were in sympathy with Hiss at first, yet few were Party-line Communists and fewer still had the subversive strength of his convictions. Gullible, yes; foolish often, still. McCarthy and his supporters (I probaby would have been one) gave them no space for penance, just abject surrender. And they—intelligent, cohesive, media-wise, desperate finally—were the wrong people to corner. It was time for amnesty; some greatness of spirit. Hindsight, I know, and hard to enforce. But I know, as well, that Hiss's imprisonment eventually hurt the Right more than the Left.

Before Weinstein we spoke of a "rehabilitated" Hiss: campus lecturer, victim-hero, amateur innocent. But it wasn't Hiss, it was the groundsill of our thought that had undergone a drastic warp—thought "rehabilitated" by Left intellectuals in order to discharge their irritating post-Hiss guilt. It's a stark, almost unimaginable leap from McCarthy to Ellsberg: yet it occurred. In the process our concepts of espionage, of national security, of nation itself were put up for sale. Individual conscience is set today against national conscience: if, indeed, national conscience can be said to survive at all. In that sense Perjury is irrelevant, because Hiss is no longer on trial. Unable to spring Hiss, Left intellectuals indicted treason, the crime, in his stead. National loyalty, on which any operative definition of treason must depend, was made a distant second to personal conscience. There are no traitors now: just, well, men with differing points of view. In leak-ridden 1978, Alger Hiss would use, not Whittaker Chambers, but Jack Anderson as his courier to Moscow.●

HON. CHARLES J. CARNEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Speaker, on the afternoon of Thursday, May 18, 1978, and on Friday, May 19, 1978, the House of Representatives voted on amendments to, and on passage of, the "Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act," H.R. 39. Due to official business in my congressional district, I was unable to be present on the House floor for some of these votes. Had I been present, I would have voted "nay" on rollcall No. 336, and "yea" on rollcall No. 340.●

ARMSTRONG-KEMP AMENDMENT HELPS HALT IRS PLAN TO TAX EMPLOYEES' FRINGE BENEFITS

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, for some time it has been very clear that the Internal Revenue Service has been and is planning to issue regulations requiring that all employees' fringe benefits be made taxable. I first helped bring this to the attention of the House last August. At that time I put forth a resolution together with Senator HATCH disapproving of this action with large bipartisan support which the Ways and Means Committee incorporated into legislation preventing the IRS from issuing such regulations before July 1, 1978.

Since the Ways and Means deadline is rapidly approaching the IRS has pressed forward with its plans. Since I believe that the Congress still needs more time to deal with this problem, Congressman BILL ARMSTRONG and I offered an amendment to the Treasury Department appropriation for fiscal year 1979 which was adopted and which would prevent the Treasury Department from using any funds for the implementation of regulations to include fringe benefits in gross income for tax purposes.

Although this is a temporary solution, both Congressman ARMSTRONG and myself are prepared to fight any effort by Treasury to tax fringe benefits. The reason for this is quite simple: it is nothing more than a backhanded effort to raise taxes on the working people of America without going through the Congress.

What are the major fringe benefits? They are such things as free parking spaces, travel passes for airline and rail employees, telephone discounts for telephone company employees, company run day-care centers for working mothers, subsidized meals in company cafeterias, free checking accounts for bank employees and discounts for employees in general. Although I would agree that such things are income, broadly defined, they have never previously been subjected to taxation and it is extremely unfair to suddenly subject them to taxation now after people have planned their financial affairs around them. It is well known, for example, that in recent years many union contracts have been emphasizing increases in fringe benefits above increases in wages during negotiations with management. Obviously this is because of the tax-free nature of such benefits. Thus if such benefits were made taxable it would, in effect, destroy the basis of almost every union contract in the country, leading to great hardship.

The following article from the Wall Street Journal summarizes some of the issues regarding fringe benefits and calls the Armstrong-Kemp amendment a setback to the IRS attempts to tax employees' fringe benefits.

HOUSE PANEL ACTS TO BLOCK TAXATION SOON BY THE IRS OF FRINGE BENEFITS AS INCOME

WASHINGTON.—The controversy over taxing fringe benefits is heating up again.

A key House committee has acted to block the Internal Revenue Service from issuing regulations anytime soon that would require certain fringe benefits to be taxed as income.

The House Appropriations Committee approved by voice vote an amendment to a routine Treasury Appropriations bill that would bar the Treasury Department from using money in the bill "to issue or administer regulations providing for the inclusion of fringe benefits not included as of July 1, 1978, in gross income."

The amendment, which was offered by Republicans William Armstrong of Colorado and Jack Kemp of New York, is designed to extend in effect a verbal agreement between the Treasury and the House Ways and Means Committee. Under that pact, the Treasury agreed that the IRS wouldn't issue final regulations before July 1.

Although it's uncertain whether the amendment will become law, the House panel's move is a setback for IRS Commissioner Jerome Kurtz. The IRS chief, who is out of the country and didn't comment on the action has pushed hard to tax fringe benefits.

"If Congress feels fringe benefits should be taxed, then Congress and not some administrative agency should act, "Rep. Armstrong said after his amendment was approved. Rep. Kemp declared: "The IRS proposals to tax fringe benefits will affect virtually every working American and will raise the real tax burden for each one by at least $240 per year."

As explained by one of Mr. Armstrong's aides, the amendment would be effective for a 15-month period—from July 1 through Sept. 30, 1979, when fiscal 1979 ends.

AMENDMENTS FUTURE UNCLEAR

The amendment will go to the House floor June 7. A congressional staffer said yesterday that it's "by no means assured that it will stay in the bill."

Mr. Kurtz has made his general views on the fringe benefit issue extremely clear. "The statute says all income is taxable, and I believe that's right," he said earlier this year. "I believe that's the way an income tax ought to be administered. And all income includes income in kind as well as in cash."

The IRS commissioner has noted that the tax code specifically exempts "the biggest fringe benefits"—group medical insurance, pension plans and group life insurance. Among the fringes that might be subjected to taxation under an IRS regulation are free plane rides for airline employes, free tuition for children of college teachers, free parking spaces in company lots, subsidized lunches in employe cafeterias and annual, company-provided medical exams.

INTENTIONS REMAIN OBSCURE

However, the exact intention of the IRS—if it is allowed to issue such a regulation—remains obscure. Mr. Kurtz said on CBS-TV's "Face the Nation" in late March:

"What I would like to do is to develop regulations which would carry out what the code says, but at the same time recognize that there are very difficult administrative problems. Many of these items are very small and aren't worth the trouble."

Mr. Kurtz's stated aim has been to issue fringe-benefit rules "in proposed form" sometime this summer. They would then be available for public comment before being issued in final form.

In the closing days of the Ford administration, then-Treasury Secretary William Simon was prepared to decide whether fringe benefits should be taxed as income. But after a storm of protest from airline and other employes, he relented and issued a statement declaring that the Treasury Department was "no longer considering" taxing certain employe benefits as income.●

OBSERVATIONS ON THE CANADIAN HEALTH CARE EXPERIENCE

HON. CLAUDE PEPPER
OF FLORIDA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, the enactment of a national health insurance program is among the foremost goals of the Carter administration, and it certainly has been among my own highest priorities for many years.

The administration has indicated that we will have a proposed bill before the year is out, so action appears to be relatively imminent.

Considerations of national health insurance have time and again elicited comparisons to the Canadian health care program. I have felt it would be helpful to those of us who will be involved in the development and enactment of a health insurance program to better understand the Canadian system and to have the benefit of their experience in a matter which so deeply concerns all Americans.

Mr. Richard Lehrman, who serves with the Select Committee on Aging, which it is my privilege to chair, has prepared an excellent paper which explores the Canadian health care program, and I wish to have included, at this point in the RECORD, the first of four parts of this paper, which is entitled: "Observations on the Canadian Health Care Experience":

OBSERVATIONS ON THE CANADIAN HEALTH CARE EXPERIENCE

The Canadian experience with national health insurance has been a largely successful one. The keynote of its success is the accomplishment of the major goal of the health insurance program—the removal of financial barriers to medical care. With the advent of national medical coverage in 1966, in addition to the national hospital coverage enacted a decade earlier, Canada became the next-to-last major industrialized country to provide the population with a national health program.[1] The only such country that, to a great extent, leaves its population vulnerable to financial catastrophe as a result of medically incurred expenses, is the United States.

National health insurance as practiced in Canada provides some very crucial lessons for any similar program proposed for the United States. Canada provides for the medical needs of almost its entire population, while only the elderly, disabled, and the very poor are covered in America by Medicare and Medicaid. Yet, surprisingly, health expenditures as a percentage of Canada's GNP are actually lower than those of the United States.[2] Because of the similarities between Canadian and American government and society, as well as health care approaches, the Canadian health care system merits our consideration.

Despite the fulfillment of its major goal, the Canadian health care system is not without its deficiencies. The largest of these, cost control, plagues most countries that have a national health program. Yet, of five western industrialized countries with such a program, the United States, which does not have a national program, spent a greater portion of its Gross National Product than three, and was outspent only by Sweden and West Germany.[3] Thus, skyrocketing medical costs are not restricted to nations with national health insurance.

The causes of the accelerating cost increases in the Canadian Health Insurance Program appear to have their roots in the Federal-Provincial Cost-Sharing structure in effect until early 1977. The previously utilized structure accounted for the tendency of the system toward overinstitutionalization.[4] The former cost-sharing system also accounted for the maintenance of costly and unneeded facilities that served to make the system more vulnerable to the inflation of hospital and physician costs.[5] An offshoot of this phenomenon, that in turn helped to perpetuate it was the fostering of an attitude that the government is wholly responsible for a person's health.[6] This attitude, as well as the former financing structure, contributed to the numerous unnecessary medical procedures and duplicative hospital and clinic facilities. Finally, the politicized nature of National Health Insurance budget decisions often works at cross purposes with the goals of NHI.[7] What may be useful to an American version of National Health Insurance is an analysis of the deficiences, and the formulation of policies designed to avoid or correct them.

HISTORY

Canadian health care legislation owes its form and content to a constitutional division of powers between the provinces and the federal government, which generally reserves health care to provincial jurisdiction.[8] The scheme had its roots in the 1975 Federal-Provincial Conference on Post-War Reconstruction. The Conference proposed Federal-Provincial cost sharing to cover the expenses of hospital, medical, dental, pharmaceutical and nursing services for all Canadians.[9] The concept was accepted in principle; plans and construction grants were enacted.

From a similar concept of providing government-financed health care, the evolution of Health Care in Canada followed a parallel, but different progression from that of the United States. The United States began extending protection gradually to a host to benefit groups, that is, various segments of the population that have been defined as in need of attenion at the federal level.[10] These segments have been categorically defined (aged, veterans, poor, blind, disabled, federal employees) in terms of groups for whom there is a national obligation.[11] By contrast, Canadian national health care began with hospital coverage, followed a decade later by full scale coverage of physicians' charges.[12] This coverage extended to the entire Canadian population. The progression of health care coverage in Canada has special significance regarding the cost factor that will be discussed later below.

Although several provinces produced legislative initiatives aimed at broader coverage of their populations, only Saskatchewan actually proceeded on its own to adopt a "benefit" approach to the problem of financing of health services.[13] In 1974 a newly elected government began a hospitalization plan for all residents of the province financed by a combination of general tax revenues and compulsory premiums.[14]

By 1955, Alberta, British Columbia, Ontario, Newfoundland, and Saskatchewan had enacted "province wide hospital insurance schemes which both bailed hospitals out of financial hot water and proved very popular."[15] By early 1956, specific federal proposals for a shared cost program of health insurance to be introduced on a phased basis were placed before the provinces.[16] The first benefits were to provide for hospitalization and diagnostic services to the population as adopted province by province. The Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act was passed later that year, with the five provinces having signed agreements to participate.[17] The act provided for federal cost sharing at an average of 50 percent, depending upon the wealth of the province.[18] That is, the federal government share varied inversely with each province's per capita spending on covered medical services, the highest subsidy being about 80 percent.[19] By 1961, all provinces and territories had agreements adopting provincial health insurance programs plus federal cost sharing.[20] Thus, by this time, this basic group of benefits (hospitalization) was available to all Canadians.

The progression of health care coverage in Canada adheres to certain patterns. Constitutionally and traditionally, health and social programs are provincial responsibilities. The federal guidelines which do exist are general, and the provinces receive federal help merely by adhering to them. In social policy areas, several provinces will generally initiate programs with their own funds. Federal legislation assuring cost-sharing is developed once national consensus on the value of the program exists.[21]

New beneficiary approaches by Newfoundland and Labrador in 1957 and 1958 provided broad coverage for all children under 16 years of age. Continuing its pattern of heading the pack in health care, Saskatchewan implemented the Medical Care Insurance Act on July 1, 1962.[22] Alberta, British Columbia, and Ontario added benefits for selected beneficiary classes in the succeeding five years. However, the costs of health care began to rise at an ever-increasing rate.[23]

In 1964, a Royal Commission on Health Services was appointed at the national level to "inquire into the report upon the existing facilities and the future need for health services for the people of Canada and the resources to provide such services, and to recommend such measures, consistent with the constitutional division of legislative powers in Canada, as the Commissioners believe will ensure that the best possible health care is available to all Canadians."[24]

The Royal Commission Study, as the most important analysis of Canadian health services to date, provided the impetus for more recent developments. The most important of its recommendations—universal coverage for medical (as opposed to hospital) care—became the Canadian "Medicare" in 1966. The Canadian version of Medicare applied to almost the entire population. Thus by 1968 almost all Canadians were covered by a combination of hospitalization and physician benefits.

During the later 1960's, however, costs continued to soar. In 1968, the federal-Provincial Report on the Cost of Health Services "blew the whistle on mounting health care costs."[25] According to Vayda, "the federal government had no control over costs generated by the system—costs that increased far more rapidly than the growth of the Gross National Product. So, an increasing proportion of federal tax revenues . . . (went) . . . to pay for health care services."[26]

The Provincial governments, also dissatisfied with the increasing costs, instituted controls to constrain hospital budgets which included: refusal to budget for inpatient, outpatient, and or laboratory and radiology volume increases; moratoriums on physical plant construction or renovation; refusal to budget additional funds for new services; mandated bed closings; limiting salary increases which would be funded; ordering reductions in the budget base; and manipulating inflation projections.[27]

After a brief stabilization, prices began to rise again.[28] New modes of thought regarding cost control resulted—in effect declaring that perhaps the solution to the problem of rising costs was not a mere "tightening of the belt". In 1974, Marck Lalonde, the Minister of Canada Health and Welfare, authored a national report entitled "a New Perspective on the Health of Canadians".[29] The main thrust of the report was a new emphasis on the distinction between health services and medical services.[30] In a New Perspective, Lalonde, warns that Canadians cannot expect more medical care to make them healthier.[31]

Footnotes at end of article.

The principal underlying factors in the causes of early deaths (motor vehicle accidents, heart disease, lung cancer and suicide) are (1) self imposed risks, and (2) the environment.[32] In effect, the Lalonde report states that it is wasteful for the government to continue paying hospital and doctor bills without taking action to prevent some of these costs by cleaning up the environment and by trying to change lifestyles.[33]

Thus, the focus of cost-control measures turned to prevention, as well as giving provincial administrators incentives to cut costs by curtailing the building of newer hospitals as well as closing some of those already builtin measures which were politically unpopular. Due to the decentralization of health care in Canada, however, the federal government could not intervene directly in the provincial organization or management of health care services in an effort to hold down costs. Therefore, the Federal Government utilized the only mechanism in its power for controlling cost. In 1975, Canada notified the provinces that existing cost-sharing under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act would be terminated within five years.[34]

The new law that governs federal contributions to the cost of provincially operated hospital and medical care insurance plans, as well as extended health care benefits, was enacted in late 1976. Parliament passed Bill C-37, culminating years of negotiations between Canada and the provinces. The new financial arrangements under the bill addressed a few of the cost-related concerns associated with National Health Insurance previously, and should be of some interest regarding any considerations in the United States.

Comemncing April 1, 1977, federal contributions to the established programs of hospital insurance, medical care, and post-secondary education were no longer directly related to provincial costs but take the form of tax credit transfers to the provinces, associated equalization, and cash payments.[35] As contrasted to the former cost sharing, the tax credits are unrelated to the cost of care in a particular province.[36] At the outset the cash payments approximate the value of the tax credits, and are in the form of per capita payments, based on federal contributions for the programs in fiscal year 1975-76. However, these per capita payments will be escalated yearly in accordance with changes in the Gross National Product, and adjusted gradually over time so that all provinces at the end of five years will be receiving equal per capita cast contributions.[37]

In addition, Bill C-37 provides for extended health care services, in an effort to provide the provinces with financial assistance towards the cost of lower-cost alternatives to the insured services covered under the Hospital Insurance and Medical Care programs. In short, new emphasis toward provincial accountability, prevention, and alternatives to expensive hospital and physician care are the basics of the recent effort aimed at controlling the cost of Canada's health care program.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION

HON. DAVID L. CORNWELL

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. CORNWELL. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday and Friday, May 18 and 19, 1978, I was unavoidably absent from the House. Had I been present, I would have voted on matters coming before the House relating to H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act, as follows:

"Yea" on rollcall No. 330; "nay" on rollcall No. 335; "nay" on rollcall No. 336; "nay" on rollcall No. 338; "nay" on rollcall No. 339; and "yea" on rollcall No. 340, final passage of the bill.●

KAUNDA'S PEACE PRIZE

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, as soldiers of the French Foreign Legion parachuted into action in the Zairian copper town of Kolwezi on Friday, May 19, 1978, the man from whose country the attack was launched, Kenneth Kaunda, President of Zambia, was in Atlanta, Ga., to receive the Martin Luther King Peace Prize and to attempt to justify guerrilla wars of invasion against southern African countries on the incomprehensible grounds of "self-defense." In the context of the terror invasion of Kolwezi, unchecked if not actually supported by Kenneth Kaunda, sometimes known as the gentle giant of Africa, the words of Atlanta Mayor Maynard Jackson were particularly inappropriate, "We all can learn by his example the importance of resisting the forces of violence and hatred that still plague us throughout the world."

Two days earlier, the Domestic Zambian radio service carried an editorial comment on the Zaire invasion based on the statements of President Kaunda. Said the broadcast:

> * * * the civil war is most agonizing in that we are being dragged into something over which we know nothing about and over a people we have no concern. This is more so when it is reported that the rebels launched their attack on Shaba province (Zaire) from Zambia. * * *.
> What is also common knowledge is that Zambia has been concentrating all her forces on the border with Rhodesia, because Rhodesia is the common enemy of both Zambia and Zaire. Everyone also knows that the border with Zaire is so vast that even if we had the manpower to seal it, it would not succeed. It must be because of that the rebels must have chosen Zambia from where to launch their attack on Shaba province, knowing they would not be detected and barred by Zambian forces.

This facile excuse does not hold water. Kenneth Kaunda, who has ruled Zambia since it was given independence by the British in 1964 and who rules a one-party dictatorship—he outlawed the opposition party in 1972—has moved into close alliance with the Soviet Union's Africa policies during the past several years. Kaunda's principal political adviser has been widely reported in the European press to be the Soviet Ambassador in Lusaka, Solodatinov, the KGB's chief African affairs expert. Zairian President Mobutu has charged that the invading forces of the National Congolese Liberation Front—FNLC—led by Col. Nathaniel Mbumba, were accompanied by two companies of Cuban troops with Soviet advisers, and that they prepared for the raid in Angola. It is inconceivable that the Soviets would not have informed their Zambian ally of the mounting of the invasion so that excuses of "plausible deniability" could be prepared in advance.

Does not this coverup of Zambia's tacit support for the Cuban-trained FNLC terror gangs make a mockery of Kuanda's statement in Atlanta that:

Man can conquer by love. This must start with the recognition and acceptance of human rights as the principal road to peace.

The Zambian President followed his speech by leading the capacity crowd in singing the Zambian liberation anthem, "Tiyende Pamodzi"—Let's Go Forward Together—which is performed with clenched fist salutes. The emotion of the occasion appears to have nearly overcome President Kaunda who was accompanied during the awarding of the Martin Luther King Peace Prize by the U.S. Ambassador to the U.N., Andrew Young; by former Atlanta mayor Ivan Allen; Mayor Maynard Jackson; Mrs. Coretta Scott King and by other dignitaries from Atlanta. Kaunda was reported to have twice during his speech paused for long periods of time to compose himself and wiped tears from his eyes.

At this point it is appropriate to consider the purpose of the terror raid on Kolwezi by the Cuban-trained FNLC which clearly did not have the strength to permanently hold either Shaba Province or Kolwezi.

Operation Dove, as the terror invasion was dubbed by its Cuban military planners, was designed to disrupt and close down the copper mines and refineries located in Kolwezi. These refineries process about 75 percent of the copper and 95 percent of the cobalt mined in Zaire. Additionally, the Metalkat facility in Kolwezi produces all of Zaire's cadmium and zinc, and 65 percent of the Free World's supply of cobalt, a strategically vital mineral for heat-resistant alloys, comes from that province.

The terrorism against the families of the Belgian, French, and other European technicians was designed to drive out all those not slaughtered by the FNLC gangs. This has apparently been successful since many of those evacuated have said they will not go back to Zaire and again place their families in jeopardy. Since Zaire's economy is almost entirely dependent on exports of those minerals, the Cuban-Soviet "Operation Dove" terror raid has struck a dangerously severe blow at the pro-Western government of President Mobutu.

With the Kolwezi copper mines and refineries in a shambles, where are the next available sources of supply. Just coincidentally, perhaps, Kenneth Kaunda's Socialist economy is also dependent on copper exports. Dissatisfied with the amounts of his subsidies from British and American taxpayers while he plays political football with the Soviet Union in southern Africa, Kaunda has been pressing for large increases in aid and prices of copper. But Zambian copper had a Zairian competitor. But thanks to his Soviet and Cuban allies, Kaunda has no more competitors in Zaire. For permitting his country to be used as the staging area for the terror raid on Kolwezi, Kaunda reaps vast economic benefits and the Soviet Union achieves a vast political blow against the pro-Western government of a strategically vital nation.

Doubtless after Kolwezi, Kenneth Kaunda is now qualified for the Lenin Peace Prize.●

ALBERT ALLENBACK

HON. GOODLOE E. BYRON

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. BYRON. Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to honor the memory of a Washington County resident and highly respected citizen of Smithsburg, Mr. Albert Allenback.

Certain individuals touch the lives of people around them with great influence, and Al Allenback was a moving force in his community and State. It is with a great sense of personal loss that I note his passing.

Mr. Allenback was the executive director of the Community Action Council and president of the Community Services Council, and was very dedicated to the interests of social service organizations such as the Boys' Club, the Commission on Aging, and the Southeastern Washington County Health Center.

Although Mr. Allenback's contributions are too numerous to list here, his services will long be remembered and appreciated. He will be greatly missed by his wife, Wanda, family, friends, and coworkers. I know you will join me in extending the official sympathies of the House in honor of this unselfish and dedicated American.●

ALASKA LANDS—H.R. 39

HON. LARRY WINN, JR.

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. WINN. Mr. Speaker, my absence in the House of Representatives on Friday, May 19, prevented me from participating in the vote on final passage of H.R. 39, the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act. Several longstanding commitments in my congressional district on the 19th could not be changed or canceled when it became apparent that the House would be unable to conclude the business of H.R. 39 on Thursday, May 18. For the record, I requested to be "paired" in favor of H.R. 39. Had I been present in the House on Friday, my position would have been recorded as "yea" in support of this legislation.●

ALASKA NATIONAL INTEREST LANDS CONSERVATION ACT, H.R. 39—REMARKS

HON. JIM GUY TUCKER

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, May 24, 1978

● Mr. TUCKER. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, May 19, 1978, I was unavoidably absent from the House during the consideration of the Alaska National Interest Lands Conservation Act, H.R. 39. Had I been present, I would have voted "nay" on rollcall No. 339, on a motion to recommit the bill, and "yea" on rollcall No. 340, final passage of the bill.

I consider this bill, which preserves some 102 million acres of our last frontier, a balanced and reasonable attempt to insure that our children and their children can benefit from the spiritual and material riches of Alaska. I believe H.R. 39 is one of the most significant conservation measures on our era.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of the Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of all meetings when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in meetings as they occur.

As an interim procedure until the computerization of this information becomes operational the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committees scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Thursday, May 25, 1978, may be found in Daily Digest of today's RECORD.
